fure, he had greatest businesse. After hee had woonne by assault the city of New Carthage in Spaine, fome of his fouldiers brought a most beautifull damosell taken prisoner, and her they offered unto him: I would receive her willingly (quoth he) if I were a private person, but being as I am, a captaine generall, I will none of her. Lying at fiege before a certeine citie * fittiated in a low place, and over which might be seene the temple of Venu, he gave order unto them that by vertue of writs were to make appearance in court, that they should come and pleadbe. fore him within the find temple, where they should have audience the third day after; which hee made good, for before that day hee had forced the citie. When one demaunded of him being in Sicilie, ready to embarke and passe over to Africke, upon what considence hee prefuned to much to croffe the feas with his armada against Carthage : See you not to heere (quoth he) 300, men how they disport and exercise them selves armed all in militarie feats of armes, along an high tower fittuate upon the fea fide ? I tell you, there is not one of all this number, but if I bidde him, will runne up to the top of this tower, and cast himselfe downe from thence with the head forward. Being passed oversea, and soone after malter of the field; when hee had burnt the campes of his enimies, the Carthaginians fent immediately unto him an embassage to treat of peace; in which treatie it was concluded, that they should quit all their vessels at sea, abandon their elephants, and besides pay a good grosse summe of money: But so soone as Annibal was retired out of Italy into Africke, they repented themfelves of these capitulations and conditions, for the trust which they had in the forces and perfon of Anniball: whereof Scipio being advertised, faid unto them: That although they would 20 performe the articles of the forefaid agreement, yet the accord should not stand for good, unleffe over and above they paid 5000, talents, because they had sent for Anniball to come over, Now after that the Carthaginians had beene vanquished by him in open battell, they sent new embaffadors for to treat of peace againe; but hee commaunded them prefently to depart, for that he would never give them audience, unleffe they brought backe unto him lord Terentius, a knight of Rome, and a man of woorth and honor, who by the fortune of warre was taken prifoner, and fallen into the hands of the Carthaginians: now when they had brought Terentian, he caused him to sit close by his side in the counsell, and then gave he audience to the foresaide embaffadors, and graunted them peace. Afterwards when he entred Rome in triumph forthis victorie; the faid Terentius followed hard after his triumphant chariot, wearing a cap of liber-30 tie on his head, like an affranchifed flave, and avowing that he held his freedome by him: and when Scipio was dead, unto all those who accompanied his corps when it was caried from to sepulture, Terentine allowed to drinke a certeine kinde of mede, made of wine and honie; and for all other complements belonging to an honorable funerall, he tooke order with great diligence; but this was performed afterwards. Moreover, when king Antiochus faw that the Romanes were passed over into Asia, with a puissant armie to make warre upon him, he sent his embassadors to Scipio, for to enter into a treatie of peace: unto whom he answered: This you should have done before, and not at this present, now that your king and master hath already received the bit of the bridle in his mouth, and the faddle with the rider upon his backe. The Senat had graunted out a commission unto him that he should take foorth certains money out 40 of the publick cheft and chamber of the citie; but when the treasurers would not suffer him that day to open the treasury, for to be furnished from thence; he said: He would be so bold as open it himselse; Which (quoth he) I may well doe, considering that by my meanes it was kept fast that and locked first, for the great quantitie of gold and filver which I have caused to be brought into it. Petilius and Quintus, two Tribunes of the commons, accused him before the people, and laid many grievous matters to his charge; but he in stead of pleading his owne caule, and justifying himselfe, said thus: My masters of Rome, upon such a day as this, I defaired in battell the Carthaginians and Annibal, and therefore will I goe my felle directly from hence with a chaplet of flowers upon my head, up into the Capitoll to facrifice and give those unto Jupiter for my victorie; meane while, who foever will give his voice either for or against 50 me, let him doe as he thinketh good : and having thus faid, he went out of the court, and all the people followed after him, leaving his accusers to plead there their fill to the bare wals.

Apophthegmes of Kings, Princes and Captaines.

T. Quintius, immediately upon his comming to the management of State affaires, grew to fuch reputation and renowme, that before he had beene Aedile, Prætour, or Tribune of the common-weale, he was chosen Consull of Rome, who being fent as captaine and lieutenant generall for the people of Rome, to warreagainst Philip king of Macedonia, was counselled and perswaded to a parle and personall conference first with him: Philip for the better securitie of his owne person, demaunded of him hostages: Because (quoth he) the Romanes have heere many captaines belides you, but the Macedonians have none but my felfe: No marve' mdeed (quoth Quintius) that you are heere by your felfe alone, for you have done to death all your kinsfolk and friends. After that he had vanquiffed in battellking Philip, he caused proclamation to be made in the folemnitie of the Ifthmian games; That he restored all the Greeks to their auncient liberties and full freedome, to live from that day forward according to their owne lawes: and thereupon, the Greeks caufed all the Romanes to be fought out throughout all Greece, who had beene fold thither for flaves during the warres with Annibal, and having redeemed&bought them againe out of their mafters hands for 500, drams a poll, they prefented them unto him as a free gift: these followed him in his triumph, with caps upon their heads, as the cultome was of fuch flaves as were newly affranchifed & endued with liberty. The Acheans were minded and fully purposed to enterprise the conquest of the isle Zacint hus: But he admomished them not to goe forth of Peloponne fus, unleffe they would put themselves into evident danger, like unto the Tortoifes, when they firetch foorth their heads out of their fhels. When the brute was blowen over all Greece that king Antiochus came with a mightie power, infomuch as all men wondered & were affraid to heare what numbers there were of foldiors and fighting men, and what diverfitie of armors they brought with them; he made fuch a speech as this in the generall counfell of the Acheans: It was my chance (quoth he)upon a time to be lodged in the house of an old host and friends of mine within the citic of Chalcies, and as I sat with him at 20 supper, I marvelled how possiblie he could come by so many forts of venison which I saw ferved up to the boord before me; at last mine host answered that all was but swines slesh, and the fame altered by fundry kinds of fances and varietic of dreffing: Semblably (quoth he) be younot difinaid and troubled at this great armie of king Antiochus whom you heare named, his men at armes and horsemen armed at all pieces, his light horse, his petronels and archers on horsebacke, and his footemen, for all these be no more but poore Syrians, men borne to servitude and flaveric, and no better, differing one from another onely in diverfitie of harneis and weapons, Philopamon was at that time captaine generall of the Acheans, who had a number fufficient both of horse and foot, but he wanted money for their pay: whereat Quinting merily scoffing; Philopemon (quoth he) hath hands and feet enough, but he wants a bellie; which 30 jest was indeed the more pleasant, for that Philopamons body was in truth naturally so shapen and made fo flat, as if he had no belly at all.

C. Domitius, he whom Scipio the great left in his place, next after his brother L. Scipio in the warre against king Antiochia; when he had viewed the armie of his enemies standing in battel-array, the Romane captaines who were about him, counfelled him with all expedition to give them battell, but hee answered them thus: That they had not day enough to maffacre and hew in peeces fo many millions of men; to spoile also and make pillage of their tents and baggage, and then to returne when all was done into the campe for to refresh and looke to themselves; fo the morrow after he charged upon them and flue fiftie thousand enc-

P. Licinius, a Confull of Rome, in one battell of horsemen was vanquished by king Perfew, and lost about two thousand and eight hundred men, partly slaine, and partly taken prisoners in the field: after which victorie, Perseus sent unto the faid Confull, embassadours to treat of peace and attonement; in which treatie the condition which the vanquished propofed to the Conquerour was: That he should submit himselfe wholy and his whole estate, unto the Romans for to doe with them according to their will and discretion.

PAVLUS ÆMILIUS making fute for his fecond Confulship, was rejected and tooke repulse: but afterwards when it was seene that the warre against King Perseus was drawen out in length, and like to hold long, through the ignorance, floth and idlenesse of those captaines which were fent with the armie: the Romaines chose him confull for the second time; but he 50 faid unto the I con you no thank at al now, for that you have not elected me for to gratifie my felfe (because I sought for no office at this time) but in regard that your selves stand in need of a captaine. Being returned from the common place into his owne house, hee found a little daughter that he had, named Tertia, weeping and all blubbered with teares: What is the matter (quoth he) that my pretie girle crieth and weepeth thus: with that the childe: O father (quoth she) our Perseus is dead: (now a little puppie she had of that name:) In good houre be it spoken my sweet daughter (quoth he) I take it for a good offe and presage of happie fortune. When he was arrived and come into the campe, hee found much bibble-babble there, and vaunting braverie on everie hand of those fouldiors, who would bufily intermeddle in the affaires properly pertaining to the captaine, and in more matters than concerned them: hee willed x them to be quiet and still, not to be dealing in such things, but onely to looke well to their fwords, whether they were tharpe edged and well pointed: As for the reft (quoth he) I will obey and exe-provide therefore. Those that kept the night sentinels, he commanded neither to be are launce nor weare fword, to the end that knowing they had no meanes to fight, in case they should be furprifed by the enemic, they should be the more vigilant and carefull to with stand sleepe. After that he had paffed over the mountaines in Macedonie, and was newly entred into the campe, hee found his enemies readic ranged in battell-array before him: whereupon Scipio Nalica advised him to charge out of hand: If I were (quoth he) as young as you, I should be of the 10 fame mind that you are; but now long experience forbiddeth me to advance forward, all wears as I am upon any journey against mine enemies, being set strongly in ordinance of battell. After he had fully defaited Perseus in making feasts to his allies & confederates, for joy of victo. rie, he faid: That it belonged to one and the fame skill and experience, to know how to raunge a terrible battellagainst enemies, and to set out an acceptable feast for friends. Perseus being his prisoner, made earnest sute & humble supplication unto him, that he might not be lead in his triumph: That lies(quoth he)in your owne power ô Perfeus: by which words he gave him good leave to make himselfe away. Among the treasures of this king, there was found an infinit maffe of gold and filver, whereof he touched not one jot for his owne proper use ; onely to Tubero his fonne-in-law, who had married his daughter, in honor of his vertue he gave one 20 filver boul, weighing fine * lytres: where (by the way) this is to be noted, that (by report) this was the first piece of filver plate that ever came into the house of the AEmilii. Of four echildrenmales that he had, two of the eldest he had given away before from himselfe to be adopted into other noble families of Rome, and of the two youngest which remained behinde in his owne house and name; the one (being foureteene yeeres of age) died five daies before his triumph; the other (twelve yeeres old) changed his life five daies after: whereat the people forrowed, and tooke it verie heavily, bewailing & pittying his defolate estate: but he himselfe went into the common place to comfort them, faying: That now from hence foorth, he thought to be out of all feare and danger in the behalfe of the common-wealth, hoping that no infortunite would befall unto it: for that himselfe for them all, bare the heavie load of the envie attending to upon fo great prosperities which he had atchieved for the weale publike, y in that fortune had derived and call all despite upon his familie alone. C AT o the elder, in a folemne speech before the people of Rome, reprooving sharply their

9 Great prosperitie is to he julproud: grade, there-intemperance, riot and superfluous delicacies: I know full well (quoth he) that it is an hard matter to speake unto the belly which hath no eares. He faid also, that he woondered how such doth delay it a citie could long fland, wherein a fifh was fold deerer than an oxe. Alfo inveighing against the over-much libertie and power which generally was given to women: All other men (quoth hee) doe rule their wives, wee rule all men, and our wives rule us. It was a speech likewise of his: That hee had rather receive no favour and grace when hee had done any good fervice, than not be punished when he had committed a fault: I pardon moreover (quoth 40 he) all those, who upon error or ignorance have trespassed, z but I except my selfe. Furtherchathieth wife more, in folliciting and mooving the magistrates to chastice those who offended the lawes, he as themselves, plainely faid: That who foever had rule and authoritie sufficient to represse malefactors, if they did not execute the fame, were themselves the authors and commaunders of evill. He delivered these words moreover: That yoong men who blushed when they were rerprooved, pleased him better than those that looked pale : and that he could not abide that souldier, who inhis way as he walked, waggeth his hands; in fight flirreth his feet; and when he fleepeth fnorteth lowder than he holloweth as he encountreth his enemie. Item, that he was a bad ruler, who knew not how to rule himselfe. He was of opinion, that everie one ought to have more reverence of himselfe, than of any other person whatsoever; for no man was ever from himselfe, 50 Perceiving that many there were who made fute that their flatues might be erected: I had tather (quoth he) that men thould aske another daie, why there was no image fet up for Calo, than why he had any. He counfelled them who had power to do what they would, to spare and make much thereof, to the end that their libertie might last with them for ever. They who deprive vertue a of honour, take away vertue (quoth he) from youth. He was of advice that no

injuffice and wrong doing, if it brought no perill to him that committed it, yet it was dangerous to all others. He admonished old folke not to adde unto their age the foulenesse of vice: for that they had deformities enough belides. His opinion was, that anger and fury differed in nothing, but that the one endured longer than the other. He was woont to fay that they were not lighly envied, who knew how to use their fortune wisely and with moderation: For that (quoth he) it is not our person that is envied, but that which is about us. Also they who are earneil in ridiculous matters, make themselves laughing stocks in serious affaires. Over and befides, this was one of his fage fawes: That faire and commendable actions ought to meet with faire and laudable words to fet them foorth, to the end that they never be without the glory to to them belonging. He reprehended the citizens of Rome, for giving alwaies their voices to one & the fame person, at the elections of their magistrates: For it should seeme (quoth he) in so doing, that either you do not much efteem the honour of magistracies, or els that in your judgement you have not men sufficient enough & worthy to beare them. He made semblant upon a time, that he had in great admiration the strength of one who fold and made away his lands that lay along by the fea-coast, as being a man more mightie and puissant than the verie fea: For (quoth he) that which the fea undermineth, eateth & wasteth by little & little this good felow hath swallowed & devoured all at once. When he sood to be chosen Censor, & faw that other of his competitors & concurrents trudged up & downe, glavering, glofing and flattering to the people for to infinuate themselves into their good favour & grace: he contrariwise went crying 20 out. That the State & people had need of a rigorous & hard hearted physician, both to diffinember &cut off some part, and also to give them a strong purgation; and therefore they were not to choose one who was most gracious, but him that was most severe; thus whiles he made these remonstrances, he was himselfe chosen before all the rest. In teaching your men for to fight valiantle and with resolution, hee faid: That a word often-times frighted the enemic more than the fword, the tongue also more than the hand, and caused him to take his beeles and runne away. Whiles hee warred in Sp.ine against those who inhabit along the river Bartis, hee was in great danger, by reason of a great multitude of enemies who were in armes against him; neither could be be provided of aids upon a sudden, but from the Celtiberians, who for to fuccour him demanded two hundred talents: now the other Romane captaines would 30 not yeeld that hee should make promise unto those barbarous nations of this money for their hire and fallarie; but Cato faid: They were much deceived and out of the way; for if we winne (quoth he) we shall be able to pay them, not of our owne, but of our enemies goods; if we lose the day, there will be none left either to be paied or to call for pay. Having woon more townes in Spaine, than he had beene daies there (according as he faid himfelfe) he referved of all that spoile and pillage for his owne use, no more than he did cat and drinke; but hee divided and dealt to every one of his fouldiers a pound weight of filver, faying: That it were better that many should returne home out of warre with filver in their purses, than a few with golde; for that rulers and captaines ought not to grow rich themselves by their provinces and places of government in any thing but in honour and glorie. In that expedition or voiage of his, hee 40 had with him in his traine five of his owne fervitours; of whom, one there was who bought three prisoners taken in warre; but when he knew that his master had intelligence thereof, before that ever he came in his fight he hung and strangled himselfe. Scipio surnamed Africana, praied him to favour the causes of the banished and fugitive Acheeans, and to be good unto them, namely, that they might be recalled and restored agains to their owne countrey; but he made semblance as though hee tooke no great heed and regard to such affaires; and when hee faw that the matter was followed hotly in the Senate, and that there grew much speech and debate about it, he flood up and faid: Here is a great stirre indeed; and as though we had nothing els to do, we fit here & spend all the long day disputing about these old gray beard Greeks, and all forfooth, to know whether they shalbe caried forth to their buriall by our porters and corfe-50 bearers heere, or by those there. Posthumius Albius wrote certaine histories in Greeke, in the Preface and Proeme whereof, he praied the readers and hearers to pardon him, if he had committed any folcecifme or incongruitie in that language; but Cato by way of a mocke, scoffed at him, and faid: That he deserved indeed to be pardoned for writing falle Greeke, in case that by the bordinance and commandement of the high commission of the Amphyctiones, who were bestie doe, the chiefe Estates of all Greece, he had bene compelled against his will, to enterprise and goe in selfe have. hand with the faid histories.

folde, nor yet built: and it is for certaine reported, that in fo great an house and substance as his might feeme to be, there was never found but three and thirtie pound weight of filver plate, and two of golde, notwithstanding the city of Great Carthage was in his hand, and he had enriched his fouldiers more than ever any captaine did before him. Observing well the precept which Polybin gave, he hardly & without much ado would not returne out of the market place, before he had affaied to make in some fort one new friend and familiar or other, of those whom he met withall. Being but yet yoong, he was of fuch reputation for his valour and wifedome, that Cato the elder being demanded his opinion as touching others that were in the campe before Carthage, among whom he was one, delivered this commendation of him:

Right wife and fage indeed alone is he,

I hereft to him but flitting shadowes be. whereupon after his returne to Rome from the campe, they that remained behinde, called for him againe, not fo much by way of gratification and to do him a pleafure, but because they ho. ped by his meanes more speedily and with greater facilitie to win Carthage: now when he was entred to the very walles, and yet the Carthaginians fought from the callle, Polybim gave coufel to featter in the fea betweene (which was not very deepe betweene his campe and the faideafile) certaine colthrops of yron, or els planks befet with naile points, to overcast and spreadthe shallow shelves with sticking upon them, for feare lest that the enemies passing that armeor firth of the fea, might come to affaile their rampars; but he faid: It was a meere mockery, confidering that they had already gained the walles, and were within the citie of their enemies, to 20 make meanes not to fight with them. Finding the citie full of statues and painted tables which were brought out of Sicilie, he made proclamation, that the Sicilians from al their cities should come for to owne and cary away whatfoever had bene theirs; but of all the pillage he would not allow any one, either flave or newly affranchifed of his owne traine, to feize upon, nor fo much as buy ought, notwithstanding that there was driving and carying away otherwise on all hands The greatest and most familiar friend that he had, Lalius, lued to be confull of Rome; him helavoured and fet forward his fute in all that hee could : by which occasion hee demanded of one Pompeius, who was thought to make labour for the fame dignitic, whether it were true thathee was a competitor or no? now it was supposed that this Pompeius was a minstrels sonne that eld to play on the flute; who made answere againe, that he stood not for the consulthip; and that so which was more, hee promited to affift Lelius, and to get all the voices that hee could for him: thus while they believed his words, and expected his helping hand, they were deceived in the end; for they were given to understand for certaine, that this Pompieus was in the common hall labouring hard for himfelfe, going about unto every citizen one after another, requesting their voices in his owne behalfe; whereat, when all others tooke stomacke and were offended, seipio laughed apace, and faid: We are even well enough ferved for our great follie, thus to flay and wait all this whiles upon a fluter and piper, as if we had bene to pray and invocate not men, but the gods. Appins Claudius was in election and concurrence against him for the office of cenfourthip, faying in a braverie: That he used to falute all the Romans by name and by surname upon his owne knowledge of them, without the helpe of a prompter, whereas Scipio fearfeknew 40 one of them all: Thousaiest trueth (quoth Scipio) for I have alwaies beene carefull not to know many, but rather not to be unknown of any. He gave counfell unto the Romane citizens, at what time as they warred against the Celtiberians, for to fend both him and his competitout together into the campe, in qualitie either of lieutenants or of colonels over a thousand foot, to the end that they might have the testimonie of other captaines and expert warriours indeed, whether of them twaine performed his service and devoir better. Being created censour, hedeprived a yoong gallant of his horfe, for that being given excessively to feast and make good cheere, whiles the citie of Carthage was belieged, he had caused a certeine marchpaine to be made by pastry-worke in forme of a citie, and called it Carthage, and when he had so done, set it upon the boord to be spoiled and sacked (for sooth) by his companions; and when this youth 50 would needs know of him why he was thus difgraced and degraded, as to lofe his horse of service, which was allowed him from the State: Because (quoth he) you will needs rifle and pill Carthage before me. During the time that he was cenfour, he feeing one day C. Licinius as he passed by : Now surely I knew this man (quoth he) for a perjured person, but for that there is none to accuse him, I will not be both his judge and a witnesse also to give evidence against him. Being fent by the Senate a third commissioner with other Triumvirs, according as Ch tomachus faid: Mens to visit also and looke into the States of cities, nations, and kings: When he was arrived at Alexandria, and disbarked, as he came first to land, he went hooded as it were with his robe call over his head; but the Alexandrians running from all parts of the citie to fee him, requefled him to discover his head, that his face might be the better seene; and he had no sooner uncoveredhisvifage, but they alleried out with great acclamations, applauding and clapping their hands in figne of joy. And when the king himfelfe of Alexandria freined and frived with great paine, so groffe (so idle, and delicate he was otherwise) to keepe pace with him and the other to commissioners, as they walked, Scipio rounded Panatius foftly in the care and faid: The Alexandrians have reaped already the frure, and enjoied the benefit of my voyage, for that by our meanes they have seene their king to walke and go afoot. There accompanied him in this voiage a friend of his and a Philosopher named Panatius, and five servitors besides to wait upon him, and when one of these five happed to die in this journey, he would not buy another in a forcine countrey for to supply his place, but sent for one to Rome, to serve in his turne. It seemed to the people of Rome that the Numantines were invincible and inexpugnable, for that they had vanquithed and defeated fo many captaines and leaders of the Romans: whereupou they chose this Scipio Confull the second time for to manage this warre; now when many a luftic yoong gallant made meanes and prepared to follow him in this fervice, the Senat cut-20 peached them, alleaging colourably, that Italy thereby thould be left deflitute of men for the defence of the countrey, what need foever should be: fo they would not fuffer him to take that money out of the treasurie which was prest and ready for him, but assigned and ordened certaine monies from the Publicanes and fermers of the cities cultomes and revenues to furnith him, whose daies of paiment were not yet come: As for money (quoth Scipio) I stand not in such need thereof, that I should stay therefore, for out of mine owne and my friends purses I shall have sufficient to defray my charges, but I complaine rather that I may not be allowed to levie & leade forth my foldiors fuch as I would, and be willing to ferve, confidering that it is a dangerous warre which we are to wage; for if it be in regard of our enemies valour, that our people have so often beene beaten and foiled by them, then we shall finde it a hot peece of service and a hard, to encounter fuch; but if it be long of our owne mens cowardize, no leffe difficult will it be, because we are to fight with the slender helpe of such. When he was newly arrived at the campe, he found there great diforder, much loofeneffe, superstition, and wastfull superstuity in all things; fo he banished presently all diviners, prophets, and tellers of fortune; he rid out of the way all facrificing priefts, all bands likewife that kept brothel-houses he chased foorth: and he gave fireight charge that every man should fend away all maner of vessels and utenfils, fave onely a pot or kettle to feeth his meat in, a spir to roast, and a drinking jugge of earth; & as for filver plate, he allowed no man more in all than weighed two pounds: he put downe all baines and flouphes, but if any were disposed to be annointed, he gave order that every man should take paine to rubbe himselse; for he said that beasts who had no hands of their owne, 40 needed another for to rub and currie them: he ordeined that his foldiers should take their dinner standing, and cate their meat not hot and without fire; but at supper, they might sit downe who that lift, and feed upon bread or fingle grewell and plaine pottage, together with one finpledith of flesh either boiled or rost: as for himselfe he wore a cassocke or soldiors coat all blacke, buttoned close or buckled before, faying; That he mourned for the thame of his armie. He met with certaine garrons and labouring beafts belonging to one Memmius, a collonel of a thousand men, carying drinking cups and other place enriched with precious stones, and wrought curioufly by the hands of Thericles; whereupon he faid unto him: Thou halt made thy feife unfit to ferve me and thy countrey for these thirtie daies, being such an one as thou art, and furely being given to these superfluities, thou art disabled for doing thy selfe good all the daies 50 of thy life, Another there was, who shewed him what a trim shield or target he had, finely made and richly adorned; Here is a faire & goodly shield indeed (quoth he)my yoong man, but I cell thee, a Romane foldior ought to trust his right hand better than his left. There was one who carying upon his shoulder a bunch of pales, or burden of stakes for to pitch in the rampar, complained that he was over-laden. Thou art but well enough ferved (quoth he,) in that thou exist good to reposest more considence in these stakes than in thy sword. Seeing his enemies the Numan-lie off and tines how they e grew rash, desperate, and soolishly bent, he would not in that fit charge up-temperate, on them and give battell, but held off still, saying: That with tract of time he would buy the are disperse.

furety and securitie of his affaires: For a good captaine (quoth he) ought to doe like a wise phyfician, who will never proceed to the cutting or diffmembring of a part, but upon extremitie, namely, when all other means of phylicke doe faile: howbeit when he espied a good occasion and fit opportunitie, he affaulted the Numantines and overthrew them : which when the old beaten foldiers or elders of the Numantines faw, they rebuked and railed upon their owne men thus defaited, asking them, why they ran away and fuffered themselves to be beaten by those who had foiled them so often before ? but one of the Numantines answered; Because the sheep be the verie fame that they were in times past; mary they have changed their shepheard. After he had forced the citic of Numance by affault, and entred now the fecond time with triumph into Rome, he fell into some variance and debate with G. Gracehus, in the behalfe of the Senate 10 and certaine allies or confederates: whereupon the common-people taking a spleene and difpleasure against him, made such clamours at him upon the Rostra, when he was purposed to speake and give remonstrances unto them, that thereupon he railed this speech: There was never yet any outcries and alarmes of whole campes, nor shouts of armed men ready to give battell, that could aftonifh and daunt me; no more shall the rude crie of a confused multitude troubleme, who know affuredly that Italy is not their mother, but their stepdame. And when Gracehus with his conforts and adherents cried out aloud : Kill the tyrant there, kill him : Great reason (quoth he) have they to take away my life, who warreagainst their owne countrie; for they know that to long as Scipio is on foot, Rome cannot fall, nor Scipio stand when Rome is laid

CAECILIUS METELLUS, devising and casting about howto make sure his approches 20 and avenues for to affault a strong fort, when a Centurion came unto him and saide: With the loffe but of ten men you may be mafter of the piece: Wilt thou then (quoth he) be one of those tenne? And when another who was a colonell and a yoong man, demaunded of him what service he intended to do? If I wish (quoth he) that my wastcoat or shirt were privie to my minde, I would put it off prefently and call it into the fire. He was a great enemie to Scipio, fo long as Scipio lived; but when he was once dead he d tooke it very heavily, and commanded his ough not to be aumortall, owne formes to goe under the beare, and carrie him upon their owne shoulders to buriall, saying withall: That he gave the gods heartie thankes that Scipto was borne at Rome and in no

C. MARIUS being rifen from a base degree by birth unto the government of State, and all by the meanes of armes, fued for the greater Aedileship, called Curule; but perceiving that he could not compaffe it, made fute the verie fame day for the leffe : and notwithstanding that he went besides both the one and the other, yet he said: That he doubted not one day to be the greatest man of all the Romanes. Being troubled with the swelling of the veines, called Variees, in both his legges: he fuffered the chiturgian to cut those of the one legge, without being bound or tied for the matter, enduring the operation of his hand, and never gave one grone, or fo much as bent his browes all the whiles; but when the chirurgian would have gone to the other legge; Nay staic there (quoth he) for the cure of such a maladie as this, is not woorth the greevous paines that belongeth thereto. He had a nephew or lifters sonne named Lusius, who 40 in the time that his uncle was fecond time Confull, would have forced and abused a youth in the prime of his yeeres, named Trebonius, who began but then, under his charge to be areasmes: this yoong springall made no more adoe but flewhim outright; and when many there were who charged and accused him for this murder, hedenied not the fact, but confessed plainly that he had killed his captaine, and withall declared the cause publikely : Marim himselse being advertised heereof, caused to be brought unto him a coronet, such as usually was given un-An example to those who had performed in warre some woorthie exploit, and with his ownehand set it offingular ju- upon the head of this youth Trebonius. Being encamped very neere to the campe of the Tentones, in a plot of ground where there was but little water; when his foldiers complained that they were loft for water, and ready to die for very thirst, he shewed them a river not far off, run- 50 ning along the enemies campe: Yonder (quoth he) there is water enough for to be bought with the price of your blood: Then leade us to it quickly, answered his fouldiers whiles our blood is liquid and will runne, and never let us flay fo long till it be cluttered and dried up quite with drought. During the time of the Cimbrians warre he endued at once with the right of *or Camerines, free Burgeousie of Rome, a thousand men all * Camerines, in consideration of their good service in that warre; a thing that was contrarie to lawe: now when some blamed him for transgreffing the lawes, he answered and faid: That he could not hearewhat the lawes said, forthe great ruftling and clattering that harneis and armor made. In this time of the civill warre, feeing himfelfe en closed round about with trenches and rampars, and streight beleaguered he endured all and waited his best opportunitie, and when Popedius * Silo captaine gene - The forms rall of the enemies faide unto him: Marius if thou be fo great a warrior as the name goeth of or Sala. thee, come foorth of the campe, and combat with me hand to hand: Nay faith he, and if thou art fo brave a captaine as thou wouldest be taken, force me to combatif thou canst.

CATULUS LUCTATIUS in the forefaid Cimbrian warre, lay encamped along the river Athefis, and when the Romans faw that the Barbarians were about to paffe over the water, and to fet upon them, retired and diflodged prefently, what reasons and perswasions so-10 eyer their captaine could use to the contrary : but when he saw he could doe no good, nor cause them to flay, himselferanne away with the formost, to the end that it should not seeme that they tled cowardly before their enemies, but dutifully followed their captaine.

SYLLA, furnamed Falix, i. Happie, among other prosperities, counted these two for the greatest: the one, that he lived in love and amitie with Metellus Pius; the other, that he had not destroicd the citie of Athens, but faved it from being raced.

C. POPILIUS, was fent unto king Antiochus with a letter from the Senate of Rome, the tenor whereof was this: That they commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Arg ppt, and not to usurpe the kingdome which apperteined to the children of Ptolomaus, being orphans. The king feeing Popilius comming toward him through his campe, faluted him a farre off very 20 curreoutly: but Popilius without any refalutations or greeting againe, delivered him the letter; which Antiochus read, and after he had read it, answered him that he would thinke upon the matter that the Senate willed him to doe, and then give him his dispatch: whereupon Popilius drew a circle round about the king, with a vine rod that he had in his hand, faying : Refolve I advife you fir, before you passe foorth of this compasse, and give me my answer : all that were prefent woondered and were aftonished at the boldnesse and resolution of this man: but Antiochus prefently answered him: That he would doe whatsoever pleafed the Romans: then Popilius falured him most lovingly and embraced him.

Lucullus in Armenia went with ten thousand footmen and one thousand horse, to meet with king Tigranes, who was an hundred and fiftie thousand strong, for to give him battell: 30 the fixt day it was of October, and the very day of the moneth upon which before time the Romane armie under the conduct of one of the Scipioes had beene defeated by the Cimbrians: and when one faid unto him: That the Romans feare that day exceedingly, as being difinal and infortunate: Why (quoth he) even therefore ought we this very day to fight couragiously and valiantly, to the end that we may make this day to be joyfull and happie, which the Romans hold as curfed and unhappic: Nowwhen the Romans did most dread the men at armes of he bad them be of good cheere and not to feare: (For faith he) you shall finde more adoc to difpoile and difarme them, than you shall have in killing them: himselfe mounting first up to the top of a certaine little hill, after he had well viewed and confidered the Barbarians how they mo-40 ved and waved too and fro; he cried out with a loud voice unto his foldiers: My good friends and companions, the day is ours: and in very truth, they were put to flight all at once of their owne felves, without any onfet or charge given them; and in fuch fort Luculus followed the chase, that he killed in the verie rout, aboue one hundred thousand, and lost not of his owne but five men onely.

CNEUS POMPEIUS, surnamed Magnus i.the Great, was as well beloved of the Romans as his father before him was hated; who being yet very yoong, he fided to the faction of Sylla: and notwithstanding that he had no office of State, nor was so much as one of the Senate; yet he levied a mightic power of armed men from all parts of Italy: now when Sylla called him unto him, he faid: That he would not make shew of his soldiers unto his soveraigne and generall, 50 before they had made fome spoile and drawne bloud of their enemies; and in very deed he came not unto him with his power, before that hee had defaited in manie battels fundrie captaines of his enemies. Afterwards, being fent by sylla with commission of a commander into Sicilie, understanding that his fouldiours as they marched brake out of order and ranke, and would goe foorth to rob and spoile, and commit many riots by the way, he put to death all fuch as without licence departed from their colours, and went running up & downe the countrey: and as for fuch as he fent abroad with warrant about any commission or businesse of his , he fealed up their fwords within the feabberds with his owne fignet. He was at the verie point to have put all the Mamertines to the fword, for that they banded against Sylla; but Sthenis one of the inhabitants, an oratour, and a man that could doe much with the people, and leade them with his perswasive orations, said unto him: That it were not well, that for one mans fault he should cause so many innocents to die; for I (quoth he) am the onely man culpable, and the cause of all this mischiefe, having by my persuasions induced my friends, & with threats for. ced mine enemies to take part with Marius and follow his standerd: Pompeius woondering at this resolute remonstrance of his, said: That he was content to pardon the Mamertines, who suffered themselves to be ledde and perswaded by such a personage, as held the safetie of his owne countrey more deare than his owne life; and so he forgave the whole city and Stheniz himselse. After this, being passed over sea into Africa against Domitius, and having woonne the field, in a great battell, when his fouldiers faluted him by the name of Emperour or Sovereigne captaine generall, he faid unto them: That he would not accept of that honourable title, fo long as the rampar about his enemies campe flood; he had no fooner faid the word, but they ranne all at once to this service, notwithstanding it was a great showre of raine, plucked downe the pallaifada, mounted over the rampar, entred the campe and facked it. At his returne home, Spilla made exceeding much of him otherwife, and did him great honour, but among many other, he was the first man that stiled him with the furname of Magnus: howbeit, when he minded to enter triumphant into Rome, Sylla would have hindered him, alledging for his reason: That he was not as yet admitted and fworne a Senatour: whereat Pompeius turning to those that were prefent: It feemeth (quoth he) that Sylla is ignorant how there be more menthat worthip the fun 20 rifing than fetting: which words when Sylla heard, he cried out with a loud voice: Let him ti. nmph a Gods name, for I fee well he wil have it : and yet for all that, Servilius a man of the lenators degree, with food his triumph, & tooke great indignation against him; yea, & many of his own fouldiers fet themselves against him and dasht it quite, if they might not have certeinegists and rewards, which they pretended were due unto them: but Pompey faid with a clere & audible voice: That he would fooner leave triumph and all, than to be so base minded as to flatter and make court unto his fouldiers: at which words Servelius faid unto him: By this now I fee well (6 Pompeius) that thou art truely named Magnus, 1. Great, & worthy indeed to triumph. There was a custome at Rome, that the knights or gentlemen, after they had served in the warres the complete time fet downe and limited by the lawes, should present their horses in the market place 30 before the two reformers of maners, called Cenfours, and there openly recount and relateur to them in what warres or battels they had fought, and the captaines under whom they had borne armes, to the end that according to their demerits they might receive condigne praise or blame. It fo fell out that Pompeius being confull, himfelfe led his owne horse of service by the bridle, and prefented him before Gellius and Lentulus, cenfors for the time being; and when they according to the order and maner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had ferved in the warres fo many yeeres as the law required: Even all (quoth he) fully, and that undermy felfe, the fovereigne commander at all times. Being in Spaine, he light upon certeine papers and writings of Sertorius, wherein were many letters missive sent from the principall Senatours of Rome, and namely fuch as follicited and called Sertorius to Rome, for to raife fome innovati- 40 ons, and make a change in the State: these letters he flung all into the fire, giving them occasion and opportunitie by this meanes, who intended mischiese and were ill bent, to change their minds, repent and amend. Phraates king of the Parthians fent unto him certeine ambaffadors to request him that he would not passe over the river Euphrates, but to make it the middle from tier & bound betweene them both: Nay rather (quoth Pompeius) let justice be the indifferent le mit betweene the Parthians and the Romans. L. Lucullus, after he was returned from his warres and conquefts, gave himfelfe over exceffively to all pleafures, and to live most sumptuoutly, reprooving Pompeius for this: That hee defired alwaics from time to time more and more, great charges and emploiments even above his age, and unfitting those yeeres of his: unto whom Pompeius made this answere: That it was a thing more unbesceming olde yeeres, for a man to 50 abandon himselfe to delights and pleasures, than to attend the weightie affaires of the common weale. Upon a time when he was ficke, the Phylicians prescribed that he should eat of a blackebird; great laying there was in many places for that bird, but none could be found, for that it was not their featon nor the time of the yeere; but one there was, who faid that if he would fend to Lucullus, he might have of them, for he kept them in mue all the yeere long: And what needs that (quoth he) can not Pompey recover and live, if Lucullus were not a waster and a delicate given to belly-cheere ? and so leaving the Physicians prescript diet, hee composed and framed himselfe to ear that which was ordinary and might be found in every place. In regard of a great famine and scarsitic of corne and victuals at Rome, he was ordeined in outward thew of words, the grand purveiour or generall superintendent and over-seer for victuals, but in effect and authoritic, lord indeed both of sea and land: by which occasion he made voiages into Africke, Surdima and Sicilie, where, after he had provided a mightie deale of corne, he intended pretently to have returned with all speed to Rome; but there arose a terrible tempest, insomuch as the pilots and mariners themselves made no haste to goe to sea and set faile; but he in his owne perfon embarked first, and when he was on ship-boord, he commanded to weigh anker, saying with a loud voice: Saile we needs must, there is no remedie, but to live there is not such necessitie. When the quarrell betweene him and Cafar was broken out and fully discovered, there was one Marcellinus, (a man that before-time had bene advanced by him, & yet afterwards turned to the adverse part and faction of Cafar) who in a frequent affembly of the Senate, charged and challenged him to his face for many things, and spake spightfull words against him: Pompeius could not holde, but answered him thus: Bathest not thou Marcellinus, in this open place to miscall and raile upon me, who have made thee eloquent, whereas before thou couldft not speake at all? who have fed thee full, even untill thou be readie to cast up thy stomacke, where before thou wert hungry and ready to pine for famine? Unto Cate, who childe and reprooved him sharply for that he would never believe his words, when he fore-tolde him many times, that the puilfance and increase of Casars State, unto whom he lent his hand, would one day greatly prejudice 20 and hurt the weale-publicke, he answered: Your counfell indeed was wifer, but mine more loving and friendly. In speaking of himselfe freely, he said: That all offices of State he both entred fooner upon than he looked himfelfe; and also forwent them before it was expected that he would. After the battel of Pharfalia when he fled into Aegypt, and was to passe out of his gally into a little barke or fifther boat, which the king had fent unto him for to bring him to land, he turning unto his wife and fonne, faid no more but this verse out of Euripides:

> Who once in court of Tyrant ferve, become His fives anon, though free they thither come.

Being paffed over in this barke, after he had received one blow with a fword, he gave onely a figh and groane, and without faying one word, he covered his owne face with his garment, and 20 yeelded himfelfe to be killed.

Cicero the great oratour was mocked of some for that surname of his which alludeth unto a Cich-peafe; in so much as his friends gave him counsell to change his name; but hee contrariwife faid, that he would make the name of the Ciceroes more noble and renowmed, than the Catoes, the Catuli, or the Scauri. He offered unto the gods a goodly faire veffell of filver, in which he caused to be engraven his two fore-names, Marcus and Tullius in letters; but for the third, to wit, Cicero his furname, hee commaunded to bee emboffed or chaced the forme of a Cich-peafe. He faid that those oratours who used to straine their voices, and crie aloud in the pulpit, were privie to their owne weakenesse and insusficience otherwise, and had reconfe to this one helpe, like as creples and lame-folke to their horses for to mount upon. 40 Verres had a some diffamed for the abuse of his bodie in the source of his youth; and yet the faid Verres stucke notto slaunder Cicero and raile upon him, even to these broad and soule tearmes, as to call him a filthic wanton and a buggeror; whereto Cieero answered thus: Thou doest not know, that it were more seemely to rebuke thy children for this within doores in fome secret part of thy house close shut. Murcellus one day in debating and contesting with him faid: Thou hast brought more to their death by thy testimonies and depositions, than thou hast faved with all thy good pleading: I confesse as much (quoth Cieero againe) for I have more truth and fidelitie in meby farre, than eloquence. The fame Mesellus demaunded of him who was his father, reproching him (as it were) thereby that he was a new upstart, and a gentleman of the first head: Unto whom readily thy mother hath made this question more 50 hardon thy part to be answered: now was Metellus his mother thought to be an unchast woman and naught of her bodie; and Metellus himfelfe was dounted a vaine braine-ficke and flipperiefellow, given over to his wanton lusts and desires. This Merellus had caused to be set upon the sepulchre of one Diedorus, who had beenehis master sometime to teach him Rhetoricke, the portraiture of a crow in stone: whereupon Cieero tooke occasion to come upon him in this wife: A just recompence in deed and fit for him, because he hath taught this man to flie and not to speake. *V atinius was a lewd man, and his adversarie: now a rumour ran abroad that *oxioius. he was dead; but afterwards when he found it to be a false brute: A mischiefe take him for me

he was a

(quoth Cicero) that made this lie first. There was one supposed to be an Africane borne, who faid unto him: That he heard him not when he spake : I marvell at that (quoth Cicero) conside-Noting that ring thine cares be bored as they are and have holes in them. C. Popilius would have bene taken and reputed for a great lawyer, although he had no law in the world in him, and was befides a man of very groffe capacity: this man was ferved with a writ to appeare in the court for to beare witnesse of atrueth, touching a certeine fact in question; but he answered : That he knew nothing at all: True (quoth Cicero:) for peradventure you meane of the law, and thinke that you are asked the question of it. Hortensius the orator, who pleaded the cause of Verres, had received of him for a fee or a gentle reward, a jewel with the portraiture of Sphinx in *filver: it fell out fo, that Cicero chanced to give out a certeine darke and ambiguous speech : As for mee (quoth 10 Horten (iua) I can not tell what to make of your words, for I am not one that uleth to following dles and anigmaticall speeches: Why man (quoth Cicero) and yet you have sphinx in your house. He met upon a time with Voconius and his three daughters, the foulest that ever looked out of a paire of cies: at which object he spake softly to his friends about him:

This man (Iweene) his children hath begot In (bight of Phoebus, and when he would it not.

Fault us the forme of sylla was in the end fo farre endebted, that he exposed his goods to be sold in open fale, and cauled billes to be fet up on posts in every quartefour to notifie the fame: r Itisaplea- Yeamary (quoth Cierro) I like these billes and 8 proscriptions better than those that his father factories the published before him. When Cafar and Pompeius were entred into open warre one against an-20 tune & over- other: I know full well (quoth Cieero) whom to flie, but I wot not unto whom to flie. He found throw of fuch. cating less & great fault with Pompeius in that he left the citie of Rome, and that he chose rather in this case to imitate the policy of Themistocles than of Pericles, saying: That the present state of the world relembled rather the time of Pericles , than of Themistocles. Hee drew at first to Pompeius side, and being with him, repented thereof. When Pompey asked him where he had left Pifo his fonin-law; he answered readily: Even with your good father-in-law; meaning Cafar. There was one who departed out of Casurs campe unto Pompey, and faid: That he had made such halle, that hee left his horse behinde him: Thou canst skill (I perceive) better to save thy horses life than thine owne. Unto another, who brought word that the friends of Cafar looked four and umpleafant: Thou faieft (quoth he) as much as if they thought not well of his proceedings, 20 After the battell of Phar falia was loft, and that Pempeius was already fled, there was one Montas who came unto him, and willed him not to despaire, but be of good cheere, for that they had yet feven eagles left, [which were the standerds of the legions:] Seven eagles (quoth he;) that were fomewhat indeed, if we had to warre against jaies & jackdawes. After that Cefar, upon his victorie, being lord of all, had caused the statues of Pompey which were cast done, to be set up againe with honor; Cicero faid of Cafar: In fetting up these statues of Pompey, he hath pitched his owne more furely. He so highly effeemed the gift of eloquence and grace of well speaking, yea, and he tooke to great paines with ardent affection, for to performe the thing, that having to pleada cause onely before the Centumvirs or hundred judges, and the day set downe being necreat hand for the hearing and triall thereof; when one of his fervants Eros, brought him word that 40 the cause was put off to the next day, i he was so well contented and pleased therewith, that incontinently he gave him his freedome for that newes.

CALUS CAESAR, at what time as he being yet a yoong man, fled and avoided the furicof Sylla, fell into the hands of certeine pirats or rovers, who at the first demanded of him no great fimme of money for his ranfome, whereat hee mocked and laughed at them, as not knowing what maner of person they had gotten; and so of himselfe promised to pay them twise as much as they asked; and being by them guarded and attended upon very diligently, all the while that he fent for to gather the faid fumme of money which he was to deliver them, he willed them to keepe filence and make no noise, that he might fleepe and take his repose : during which time that he was in their custodie, he exercised himselse in writing aswell verse as prose, and read the so fame to them when they were composed; and if hee faw that they would not praise and commend those poemes and orations sufficiently to his contentment, he would call them senseless fots and barbarous, yea, and after a laughing maner, threaten to hang them: and to fay a truth, within a while after, he did as much for them: for when his ransome was come, and he delive red once out of their hands, he levied together a power of men and thips from out of the coalts of Asia, set upon the said rovers, spoiled them and crucified them. Being returned to Rome, and having enterprifed a fute for the foveraign Sacerdotall dignitie against Catalas, who was then a principall man at Rome; whenas his mother accompanied him as farre as to the utmost gates of his house, when he went into Mars field where the election was held, he took his leave ofher and faid: Mother you shall have this day your sonne to be chiefe Pontifice and high prieff, or elfe banished from the citic of Rome. He put away his wife Pompeia, upon an ill name that went of her, as if the had beene naught with Clodius: whereupon when Clodius afterwards was called into question judicially for the fact, and Cafar likewife convented into the court, peremptorily for to beare witnesse of the truth; being examined upon his oath, he sware that he never knew any ill at all by his wife: and when he was urged and replied upon againe, wherefore he had put her away? he answered: That the wife of C. Jar ought not onely to be innocent and no cleere of crime, but also of all suspicion of crime. In reading the noble acts of Alexander the great, the teares trickled downe his cheeks; and when his triends defired to know the reason why he wept: At my age (quoth he) . Alexander had vanquithed & fubdued Darius, and I have vetdone nothing. As he paffed along through a little poore towne fituate within the Alpes; his familiar friends about him, merrily asked one another whether there were any factions and contentions in that burrough, about superioritie, and namely, who should be the chiefe? whereupon he staid suddenly; and after he had studied and mused a while within himselfe: I had rather (quoth he) be the first here, than the second in Rome. As for hautie & adventerous enterprifes, he was wont to fay: They should be executed & not consulted upon: and verily when he passed over the river Rubicon, which divide th the province of Gaul from Italy, for to leade his 20 power against Pompeius: Let the Die (quoth he) be throwen for all: as if he would fay: * This . Or these. caftforit, there is but one chance to lose all. When Pompey was fled from Rome to the sea I have put at fide, and Metellus the superintendent of the publike treasurie, would have hindred him for ta-upon the dice, king foorth any money from thence, keeping the treafure house fast thut, he threatned to kill will of it. him; whereat Metellus feeming to be amazed at his adacious words: Tufh, tufh, (quoth he) good yoong man, I would thou thouldest know that it is harder for me to speake the word, than to doe the deed. And for that his foldiors staid long ere they were transported over unto him from Brundusum, to Dyrrhachium, he embarked himselfe alone into a small vessell, without the knowledge of any man who he was, purpofing to paffe the feas alone without his companie; but it hapned fo, that he was like to have beene cast away in a gust, and drowned with the waves of 30 the fea: whereupon he made himselfe knowne unto the pilot, and spake unto him aloud: Affure thy selfe and rest consident in fortune, for wot well thou hast C. afar a ship boord: howbeit for that time he was empeached that he could not crosse the seas, as well in regard of the tempeft which grew more violent, as also of his fouldiers who ran unto him from all sides, and complained unto him for griefe of heart, faying: That he offred them great wrong to attend upon other forces, as if he distrusted them. Not long after this he fought a great battell, wherein Pomperus hand the upper had for a time, but for that he followed not the train of his good fortune, he retired into his campe; which when Cafar faw, he faid: The victorie was once this day our enemies, but their head and captaine knew not fo much. upon the plaines of Pha falia, the very day of the battell, Pompey having arranged his army in array, commanded his foldi-40 ers to stand their ground, and not to advaunce forward, but to expect their enimies, and receive the charge; wherin Calar afterwards faid: He did amisse and grossely failed, for that therby he let flack as it were the vigor & vehemencie of his foldiors which is ministred unto the by the violence of the first onset, & abated that heat also of courage which the said charge would have brought with it. When he had defaited at his very first encounter, Pharnacesking of Pontro; he wrote thus unto his friends: I came, I faw, I vanquished. After that Scipio and those under his conduct were discomfitted and put to flight in Africke; when he heard that Cato had killed himfelfe, he faid: I enviethy death ô Cato, for that thou hast envied me the honour of faving thy life. Some there were who had Antonie and Dolabella in jealousie and suspicion, and when they came unto him and faid: That he was to looke unto himselfe, and stand upon his good guard; 50 he made them this answer: That he had no distrust nor feare of them, who ledde an idle life, be well coloured and in fo good liking as they: But I feare (quoth he) these pale and leane fellowes pointing unto Brutus and Cassus. One day as he fat at the table when speech was mooved and the question asked, what kind of death was best? Even that (quoth he) which is sudden and least ten into his owne hands; for that he entended to pay the Romans that which the faid Cafar had bequeathed unto them by his last will and testament: for he had left by legacie unto every citizen of Rome 75. * drams of filver; but Antonie deteined the faid fumme of money to himselfe. and answered yoong Cafar, that if he were wife he should defift from demanding any such monies of him: which when the other heard, he proclaimed open port sale of all the goods that came to him by his patrimonie, & in deed fold the fame; and with the money raifed thereof, he fatisfied the forefaid legacies unto the Romanes: in which doing he wan all the hearts of the citizens of Rome to himselfe, & brought their evill wil and hatred upon Antonie. Afterwards Rymetalees king of Thracia left the part of Amonius, and turned to his fide; but he overshot himfelfe formuch at the table, being in his cups, and namely, in that he could talke of nothing elfe, 10 but of this great good fervice, and casting in his teeth this worthy alliance and confederacie of his, so as he became odious therefore; infomuch as one time at supper Cafar taking the cup, dranke to one of the other kings who fat at the boord, faying with a loud voice: Treaton Ilove well, but traitors I hate. The Alexandrians after their citie was woonne, looked for no better than to fuffer all the extremities and calamities that might follow upon the forcing of a cityby affault: but this Cefar mounting up into the publike place to make a speech unto the citizens, having neere by unto him a familiar friend of his; to wit Arius, an Alexandrian borne; pronounced openly a generall pardon, faying that he forgave the citie: first, in regard of the great nesse and beautic thereof; secondly in respect of king Alexander the great their first founder. and thirdly for Aring his fake, who was his loving friend. Understanding that one of his Pro- 20 curatours named Eros, who did negotiate for him in Aegypt, had bought a quaile of the game, which in fight would beat all other quailes, and was never conquered himfelfe, but continued fill invincible; which quaile notwithflanding, the faid flave had caused to be rofted and to caten it: he fent for him and examined him thereupon whether it was true or no ? and when he confessed Yea, he commanded him presently to be crucified and nailed to the mast of his ship, He placed Arius in Sieilie for his agent and procuratour, in stead of one Theodorus: and when one presented unto hun a little booke or bill wherein were written these words, Theodornof Tharfis * the bauld is a theefe, how thinke you is he not? when he had read this bill, he didnothing else but subscribe underneath : I thinke no lesse. He received yeerely upon his birthday thus, it is cifrom Mecenas; (one of his familiar friends who converted daily with him) a cup for a prefent, 30 ther bald or Athenodorus the Philosopher being of great yeeres, craved licence with his good favour toretire unto his owne house from the court, by reason of his old age; and leave he gave him, but at his farewell, Athenodorus faid unto him: Sir, when you perceive your felfe to be mooved with ' choler, neither fay do nor ought before you have repeated to your felfe all the 24 letters in the Alphabet: Cefir heating this advertisement, tooke him by the hand: I have need still (quoth he) of your company and presence, and so reteined him for one yeere longer, saying withall this verfe,

The hire of filence, now I fee Is out of perill and jeopardie.

Having heard that King Alexander the Great at the age of two and thirtie yeeres, having per 40 formed most part of his conquests, was in doubt with himselfe and perplexed what to do and how to be employed afterwards: I woonder (quoth he) that Alexander thought it not a more difficult matter to governe and preserve a great empire after it is once gotten, than to winne and conquer it at first. When he had enacted the law Julia as touching adulterie, wherein is fet downe determinately the manner of processe against those that be attaint of that crime, and how fuch are to be punished who be convict thereof: it hapned that through impatience and heat of choler, he fell upon a yoong gentleman, who was accused to have committed adulterie with his daughter Julia, in so much as he buffetted him well and thorowly with his owne fifts: the yoong man thereupon cried unto him: Your felfe have made a law, Cafar, which or daineth the order and forme of proceeding against adulteries: whereat he was so dismaied & 50 abashed, yea and so repented himselfe of this miscariage, that he would not that day cat anic fupper. When he fent his nephew or daughters fonne Caim into Armenia, he praied unto the gods to accompanie him with that good will of all men which Pompey had, with the valiantiteffe of Alexander the Great, and with his owne good fortune. He faid, that he left unto the Romans for to fucceed him in the empire, one who never in his life had confulted twife of one thing, meaning Tyberius. Minding to appeale certaine yoong Romane gentlemen of ho nour and authoritie, who made a great noife and stirre in his presence; when he saw that for all his first admonitions he could do no good, he faid unto them: Yoong gendemen give case unto me an old man, whom when I was yoong as you are, a uncient men would give eare nato. The people of Athers had offended and done him fome difpleafure, unto whom her wrote in this wife: You are not ignorant (I suppose) that I am displeased with you, so otherwise I would not have wintered in this little ifle Aegina: and more than thus, he neither did nor faid afterwards unto them. When one of Euryeles his accusers had at large with all libertie and La centionfnesse of speech uttered against him (without any respect) what he would, he let him run on still, untill he came to these words: And if these matters (Ca/ar) seeme not unto you notorious and heinous, command him to rehearfe unto me the feventh booke of Thueydides: C.efar 10 offended now at his audacious impudencie, commanded him to be had away and led to ptilon; butbeing advertised that he was the onely man left of the race and line of captaine Brasidas hee fent for him, and after he had given him fome few good admonitions, he let him goe. P./s had builthim a most stately and magnificent house, even from the foundation to the roose thereof, which when Cafar faw he faid: It rejoiceth my heart exceedingly to fee thee build thus, as if Rome should continue world without end.

Lutarch had in the collection precedent among the Apophthegmes of renowned Greeks, mingled certaine notable fayings of King Agefilaus and other Laced emontans: but now he exhibiteth untous a treatife by it felfe of the fail Lacedemonians, who deferve no doubt to be registred apart by themselves, as being a people who fold other nations destitute of the true knowledge of God) least abused their tongue. In which regard also he maketha more ample description of their Apophihegmes, frewing sufficiently by so many pleasant speeches and lively reencounters, that it was no man well, if so finall a Saccase Stratta was) flourished so long being governed and peopled by men of such dexterity, and so well qualified in 40 the parts both of bodie and minde, and yet who knew better to do than to fay. Moreover, this Catalogue here is distinguished into source principall portions: whereof the first represented the woorthic speeches of Kings, Generall captaines, Lords and men of name in Lacedamon: the second containesh the Apophthegmes of such Lacedamonians, whose names are unknowen: the third describes heriefly the customes & ordinances which serve for the maintenance of their estate: and the fourth compitable certaine sayings of some of their women, wherein may be seene so much the more the valour & m. gnanumitie of that nation. As touching the profit that a man may draw out of thele Apophilic gives it is verie great in everiere spect: neither is there any person of what age or condition soever, but he may learne herein verie much, and namely, how to fleake little, to fay well, and to care himselfe vertuously, as the reading thereof will make proofe. We have noted also and observed somewhat in the margin, not particularising upon everie paint; but onely togive a taste and appetite unto the Reader for to meditate better thereof, and to apply unto his owne use, both it and all therest which he may there comprehend and un-

Lacedæmonians.

GESICLES a king of the Lacedæmonians, by nature given to heare and defirous to learne; when one of his familiar friends faid unto him: I woonder fir fince you take fo great pleafure otherwise to heare men speake wel and eloquently, that you do not entertaine to the famous fophister or rhetorician Philophanes for to teach you? made him this answer: It is because I defire to be their scholler, whose some also I am, that is, among whom I am borne. And to another who demaunded of him, how a prince could raigne in fafetic, not having about him his guards for the furetic of hisper-

Jon; Marie (quothhe) if he role his subjects as a good father governeth his children. A GESTLAUS the Great, being at a certaine feaft, was by lot chosen the mafter of the faid feaft; and to him it appertained to fet downe a certaine law, both in what manner and how much evericone ought to drinke; now when the butler or skinker asked him how much he should power out for everie one, he answered: If thou be well provided and have good store of wine, fill 20 out as much as everie man lift to call for, but b if thou have no great plentie of it, let everie gueft have able. There was a malefactor, who being in prifon endured constantly before him all maper of torments; which when he faw: What a curfed wretch is this and wicked in the higheltdegree, who doth employ this patience and refolute fortitude in the maintenance of fo fhamefull and mischievous parts, as he hath committed! One highly praised in his presence a certainemarecases were fler of Rheroricke, for that he could by his cloquent toong amplific finall matters, making them feeme great, wherupon he faid: I take him not to be a good fhomaker, who putteth on a big floe upon a litle foot. When one in reasoning & debating a matter upon a time challenged him, and faid: Sir, you gave your confent once unto it; and effloones iterating the fame words, charged him with his grant and promife: True indeed (quoth he) if the cause were just, I approved it in to good carneft & gave my promife; but if not, I did but barely fay the word & no more: but as the other replied againe and faid: Yea, but kings ought to accomplish & performe what soever they feeme once to grant, & it be but with the nod of the head: Nay (faid he againe) they are no more bound thereto, than those that come unto them are tied for to speake and demand all things just and reasonable, yea, and to observe the opportunity and that which fitteth and sorteth well with kings. When he heard any men either to praise or dispraise others, he said: That it behoved to know the nature, disposition and behaviour no lesse of those who so spake, than of the parties of whom they did speake. Being whiles he was very yoong, at a certeine publicke and festivall solemnitie, wherein yoong boies daunced (as the maner was) all naked, the warden or overfeer of the faid thew and daunce, appointed him a place for to beholde that fight, which was not verie 40 honourable; wherewith notwithstanding he stood well contented, albeit he was knowen to be heire apparant to the crowne, and already declared king; and withall faid: It is very well; for I will thew, that it is not the place which crediteth the person, but the person that giveth credit and honour to the place. A certeine Physician had ordeined for him in one sicknesse that he had, a course of physicke to cure his maladie, which was nothing easic and simple, but very exquisit, cutious and withall painfull. By Caffor and Pollux (quoth he) if my deftinie be not to live, I shall not recover though I take all the drogues and medicines in the world. Standing one day at the altar of Miner va furnamed Chalcences, where he facrificed an oxe, there chanced a loufe to bite him; and he was nothing difmaied and abashed to take the said louse, but before them all who were present, killed her, and swore by the gods, saying: That it would do him good at the heart, 50 to lerve them all fo, who should treacherously lay wait to assaile him, yea, though it were at the very altar. Another time, when he saw a little boy drawing a mouse which he had caught, out of a window, and that the faid mouse turned upon the boy and bit him by the hand, infomuch as thee made him leave his holde, and fo escaped, hee shewed the fight unto those that were present about him, and said: Loc, " if so little a beast and sillie creature as this, hath the heat to be revenged upon those that doe it injurie, what thinke you is meet and reason that men should doe? of those Greeks who did inhabit Asishe went to consult with the oracle of Jupiter within the soreft Dodona, as touching this deffeigne of his: and when the oracle had made answere according to his minde, namely: That if it pleafed him, he thould enterprise that expedition; he communicated the fame to the controllers of State called Ephori; who willed him alfo to goe forward, and aske the counfell likewife of Apollo in the citie of Delphos; and being there, he entred into the chapell from whence the oracles were delivered, and faid thus: O Apollo, art thou also of the fame minde that thy father is ? and when he answered, Yea; whereupon hee was chosen for the generall to conduct this warre, and fet forth in his voiage accordingly. Tiffaphernes, lieutenant under the king of Perfix in Afa, being aftonied at his arrivall, made a composition and accord 10 with him at the very first; in which treatie, he capitulated and promised to leave unto his behoose, all the townes and cities of the Greeks which are in Asia, free and at libertie to be governed according to their owne lawes: meane while hee dispatched messenges in post to the king his matter, who fent unto him a strong and puissant armie; upon the considence of which forceshe gave defiance, and denounced warre, unlesse he departed with all speed out of Asia: Ageflam being well enough pleafed with this treacherous breach of the agreement, made femblant as though he would go first into Caria; and when Tiffaphernes gathered his forces in those parts to make head against him, all on a fudden he invaded Phrygia, where he won many cities, and raifedrichbooties from thence, faying unto his friends: That to breake faith and promife unjustly made unto a friend, was impietie; but to abufe and deceive an enemie, was not onely just, but 20 also pleasant and profitable. Finding himselfe weake in cavallery, he returned to the citie of Ephefia, where he intimated thus much unto the rich men, who were willing to be exempt from going in person unto the warres, that they should every one set sorth one horse and a man : by which meanes within few daies, he levied a great number both of horse and also of men able for fervice, in flead of those that were rich and cowards; wherein he faid: That he did imitate Agamemnon, who dispensed with a rich man who was but a dastard and durst not go to the warre, for one faire and goodly mare. When he folde those prisoners for flaves, whom he had taken in the warres, the officers for this fale, by his appointment, made money of their clothes and other furniture apart, but of their bodies, all naked by themfelves; now many chapmen there were, who willingly bought their apparell, but few or none had any minde to the perfons themselves, for 30 that their bodies were fort and white, as having bene delicately nourifhed and choifly kept within house and under covert, and so seemed for no use at all, and good for nothing: Agesilans flanding by : Beholde my mafters (quoth hee) this is that for which you fight, the wing their spoiles; but these be they against whom you fight, pointing to the men. Having given Tiffit phernes an overthrow in battel within the country of Lydia, and flaine a great number of his men, he overran and harried all the kings provinces: and when he fent unto him prefents of gold and filver, praying him to come unto some agreement of peace, Agesilans made this answere: As touching the treatie of peace, it was in the citie of Lacedamons power to doe what they would; but otherwise, for his owne part he tooke greater pleasure to enrich his soldiers than to be made rich himselfe : as for the Greeks, they reputed it an honour not to receive gifts from their ene-40 mies, but to be masters of their spoiles. Megabates the yoong some of spithridates, who was of vifage most faire and beautifull, came toward him as it were to embrace and kisse him, for that he thought (as he was right amiable) to be exceedingly beloved of him; but Agefilaus turned his face away, infomuch as the youth defifted and would no more offer himfelfe unto him; whereupon Agefilaus demanded the reason thereof, and seemed to call for him; unto whom his friends made answere: That himselfe was the onely cause, being afraid to kiffe so faire a boy; but if he would not feeme to feare, the youth would returne and repaire unto him in place right willingly : upon this he flood musting to himselfe a good while, and said never a word; but then at length hee brake foorth into this speech : Lethim even alone, neither is there any need now that you should say any thing or perswade him; for mine owne part I count it a greater matter 50 to be the conquerour, and have the better hand of fuch, than to win by force the strongest holde or the most puissant and populous citic of mine enemies; for Itake it better for a man to preferve and fave his owne libertic to himfelfe, than to take it from others. Moreover, he was in all other things a most precise observer in every point, of whatsoever the lawes commanded, but in the affaires and businesse of his friends, he said: That straightly to keepe the rigour of justice, was a very cloake and colourable pretence, under which they covered themselves who were not willing to doe for their friends: to which purpose there is a little letter of his found written unto Idrieus a prince of Caria, for the enlarging and deliverance of a friend of his, in these words: If

Wielm have not transgressed, deliver him; if he have, deliver him for the love of me; but howfoever, yet deliver him : and verily thus affected stood Agefilaus in the greatest part of his friends occasions; howbeit, there fell out some cases, when he respected more the publike utility, & used his opportunity therefore, according as he shewed good proofe. upon a time, at the dislodging of his campe in great hafte & hurry infomuch as he was forced to leave a boy who he loved full well behind him, for that he lay ficke: for when the partie called inftantly upon him by name, & befought him not to forfake him now at his departure, Agefilaus turning backe, faid: Oh how hard is it to be pitifull & wife both at once. Furthermore, as touching his diet & the cherishing of his bodie, he would not be ferved with more nor better than those of his traine and company. He never did cat untill he was fatisfied, nor tooke his drinke untill he was drunke, and as for his 10 fleepe, it never had the command and mastrie over him, but he tooke it onely as his occasions and affaires would permit: for cold and heat he was fo fitted and disposed, that in all seasons of the yeere he used to weare but one and the same fort of garments: his pavilion was alwaies pitched in the mids of his foldiers, neither had he a bed to lye in, better than any other of the meaneft: for he was woont to fay: That he who had the charge and conduct of others, ought to furmount those private persons, who were under his leading not in daintinesse and delicacie, but in fulferance of paine and travell, and in fortitude of heart and courage. When one askedthe question in his presence: What it was wherin the lawes of Lyeurgus had made the citie of Sparia better ? he answered: That this benefit it found by them; to make no recknoning at all of pleafures. And to another who marvelled to fee fo great simplicitie and plainnesse, as well in feeding 20 as apparell both of him, and also of other Lacedæmonians, he said : The fruit (my good friend) which we reape by this straight maner of life, is libertie and freedome. There was one who exhorted him to case and remit a little this straight and austere manner of living: For that (quoth he) it would not be used, but in regard of the incertitude of fortune; and because there may fall out fuch an occasion, and time as might force a man so to do : Yea but I (said Agesilaus) do willingly accustome my selfe hereto, that in no mutation and change of fortune, I should not seeke for change of my life. And in verie truth, when he grew to be aged, he did not for all his yeeres give over and leave his hardnes of life; and therfore when one asked him: Why(confidering the extreame cold winter and his old age besides) he went without an upper coat or gabardine he made this answer: Because yoong men might learne to do as much, having for an example be 30 fore their eies, the eldeft in their countrey, and fuch also as were their governors. We reade of him, that when he paffed with his armie over the Thafians countrey, they fent unto him for his refection meale of all forts, geese and other fowles, comfitures, and pastrie works, fine cakes, marchpanes, and fugar-meats, with all manner of exquifite viands, and drinks most delicate and costly: but of all this provision, he received none but the meale aforesaid; commanding those that brought the fame, to carrie them all away with them, as things whereof he flood in no need, and which he knew not what to do with: In the end after they had beene verie urgent, and importuned him so much as possibly they could to take that curtesse at their hands, he willed them to deale all of it among the Ilots, which were in deed the flaves that followed the campe: whereinon when they demaunded the cause thereof, he said unto them: That it was not meet for those 40 who professed valour and prowesse to receive such dainties; Neither can that (quoth he) which ferveth in flead of a bait to allure & draw men to a fervile nature, agree wel with those who are of a bold and free courage. Over and befides, these Thasians having received many favours and benefits at his hands, in regard whereof they tooke themselves much bound and beholden unto him, dedicated temples to his honour, and decreed divine worship unto him, no leffe than unto a verie god, and hereupon fent an embaffage to declare unto him this their refolution: when he had read their letters and understood what honour they minded to do unto him, he asked this one question of the embassadors; whether their State and countrey was able to deific men? and when they answered, Yea: Then (quoth he) begin to make your selves gods first, and when you have done fo, I will believe that you also can make me a god. When the Greeke Colonies in 50 Min, had at their parliaments ordained in all their chiefe and principall cities to erect his statues; he wrote backe unto them in this manner: I will not that you make for me any statue or image whatfoever, neither painted nor cast in mould, nor wrought in clay, ne yet cut and engraven any way. Seeing whiles he was in Asta, the house of a friend or hoste of his, covered over with an embowed roofe of plankes, beames and sparres foure-square; he asked him whether the trees in those parts grew so square? and when he answered, No, but they grew round: How then (quoth he) if they had growen naturally foure cornered, would you have made them round? He was asked the question upon a time, how farre forth the marches and confines of Lacedamon did extend: then he shaking a javelin which he held in his hand: Even as farre (quoth he) as this is able to goe. One demaunded of him, why the citie of Sparta was not walled about? See you not (quoth he) the walles of the Lacedæmonians; and therewith shewed him the citizens armed. Another asked him the like question, and he made him this answer: That cities ought not to be fortified with stones, with wood and timber, but with the prowesse and valuance of the inhabitants. He used ordinarily to admonish his friends, not to seeke for to be rich in money, but in valour and vertue. And whenfoever he would have a worke to be finished, or service to be performed speedily by his foldiers; his maner was, to begin himselfe first to lay hand unto it in the face 10 of all. He flood upon this and would glorie in it; that he travelled as much as any man in his company: but he vaunted of this; that he could rule and command himfelfe more than in being aking. Unto one who woondering to see a Lacedæmonian maimed and lame, go to war, said unto the partie: Thou shouldest yet at least wife have called for an horse to serve upon: Knowest northou (quoth he) that in warre we have no need of those that will flie away, but of such as will make good and keepe their ground ? It was demaunded of him, how he wonne fo great honour and reputation; In despising death (quoth hee.) And being likewise asked why the Spattanes used the found of flutes when they fought? To the end (said he) that when in battell they march according to the measures, it may be known who be valiant and who be cowards. One there was who reputed the King of Persa happie, for that he attained verie young to so high and pu-20 islant a State: Why so (quoth he) for Priamus at his age was not unhappie nor infortunate. Having conquered the greater part of Afa, he purposed with himselfe to make warre upon the king himfelfe, as well for to breake his long repose, as also to hinder him otherwise and stop his courfe, who minded with money to bribe and corrupt the governors of the Greeke-cities and the oratours that lead the people; but amid this defeigne and deliberation of his he was called home by the Ephori, by reason of a dangerous warre raised by the Greeke-States, against the citicof Sparta, and that by meanes of great fummes of money which theking of Persia had sent thither; by occasion whereof, forced he was to depart out of Asia, saying: That a good prince ought to fuffer himfelfe to be commaunded by the lawes; and he left behinde him much forrow and a longing defire after him among the Greek-inhabitants in Asia after his departure : and for 30 that on the Persian pieces of coine, there was stamped or imprinted the image of an archer; he faid when he brake up his campe, that the king of Persia had chasted him out of Asia with thirtie thousand archers: for so many golden Dariques had been carried by one Timocrates unto Thebes and Athens, which were divided among the oratours and governors of those two cities, by meanes whereof they were follicited and ftirred to begin warre upon the Spartanes: fo hee wrote a letter missive unto the Ephori, the tenor whereof was this: Agestlans unto the Ephori, greeting. We have subdued the greatest part of Asia, and driven the Barbarians from thence; 32 allo in Ionia we have made many armours; but fince you commaund me to repaire home by a 33 day appointed: Know yee that I will follow hard after this letter, or peradventure prevent it; for >> the authority of command which I have, I hold not for my felfe, but for my native countrey and 39 40 cofederates; and then in truth doth a magistrate rule according to right & justice, when he obeieth the lawes of his countrey & the Ephori, or fuch like as be in place of government within the city. Having croffed the straights of Helle spont, he entred into the countrey of Thrace, where he requested of no prince nor State of the Barbarians, passage; but sent unto every one of them, demading whether he should passe as through the land of friends or enemies? And verily all others received him friendly, and accompanied him honorably as he journeyed through their countries: onely those whom they call Troadians, (unto them as the report goeth, Xerxes himselfe gave presents, to have leave for to passe,) demaunded of him for licence of quiet passage, a hundred talents of filver and as many women: but Agefilans after a fcoffing manner asked those who brought this meffage: And why doe not they themselves come with you for to 50 receive the money and women: so he led his armie forward; but in the way he encountred them well appointed, gave them battell, overthrew them, and put many of them to the fword, which done, he marched farther. And of the Macedonian king he demanded the fame question as before; who made him this answer: That he would consult thereupon: Let him consult (quoth he) whathe will, meane while we will march on: the king wondring at his hardinesse, stood in great feare of him, and fent him word to paffe in peaceable and friendly maner. The Theffalians at the same time were confederate with his enemies: whereupon he forraied and spoiled their countries as he went, and fent to the citie of Lariffa two friends of his, Xenocles and Soytha, to found them & fee if they could practile effectually for to draw them, to the league and amite of the Lacedemonians, but those of Lariffa arrested those agents, and kept them in prison: whereupon all the rest taking great indignation, were of this minde, that Agesilaus could doe no leffe, but presently encampe himselse and beleaguer the citie Lariffa round about : but hee saide that for to conquer all Theffalie, he would not leefe one of those twaine: fo upon composition and agreement, he recovered and got them againe. Being given to understand that there was a battell fought neere to Cerimb, in which very few Lacedæmonians were flaine, but of Athenians, Argives, Corinthians and their allies, a great number: he was not once feene to havetaken any c joy or contentment at the newes of the victorie; but fighed deepely from the bottome of his heart, faying: Alas for unhappie Greece, who hath herieste destroied so many men Io ofher owne, as had beene sufficient in one battell to have defeated all the Barbarians at once. But when the Pharfalians came to fet upon the taile of his armie in his march, and to doe them mischiese and damage; with a force of five hundred horse, he charged and overthrew them; for which luckie hand, he caused a Trophe to be erected under the mountaines called Narthatii; and this victorie of all others pleased him most, for that with so small a troupe and cornet of his owne horfemen which himselfe put out and addressed against them, hee had given those the overthrow, who at all times vaunted themselves to be the best men at armes in the world. This ther came Diphridus, one of the Ephori unto him, being fent expresly from Sparta, with a commandement unto him, that incontinently he should with force and armes invade the countrey of Bastia; and he although he meant and purposed of himselfe some time after to enterwith a more puissant power; yet would he not disobey those great lords of the State, but sent for two regiments of tenthousands a peece, drawen out of those who served about Corinib, and with them made a rode into Beeria, and gave battell before Coronea, unto the Thebans, Athenians, Argives, and Corinthians, where he wan the field: which, as witneffeth Xenophon, was the greatest and most bloudie battell that had beene fought in his time: but true it is, that hee himselfe was in many places of his body fore wounded, and then being returned home, nor withstanding so many victories and happie fortunes, hee never altered any jot in his owne person, either for dietor otherwise for the maner of his life. Seeing some of his citizensto vaunt and boalt of themselves, as if they were more than other men, in regard that they nowished and kept horses of the game to runne in the race for the prize; he perswaded his sisterna- 20 med Cynifea, to mount into her chariot, and to goe unto that folemnitie of the Olympick games, there to runne a course with her horses for the best prize; by which, his purpose wasto let the Greekesknow, that all this running of theirs was no matter of valour, but a thing of coll and expence, to flew their wealth onely. He had about him Xenophon the philosopher, whom he loved and highly effeemed; him he requested to fend for his sonnes to be brought up in Lacedemon, and there to learne the most excellent and fingular discipline in the world, namely, the knowledge how to obey and to rule well. Being otherwise demaunded, wherefore he esteemed the Lacedæmonians more happy then other nations. It is (quoth he) because they profess and exercife above all men in the world, the skill of obeying and governing. After the death of Lysander, finding within the city of Sparta great factions and much siding, which the saide 40 Ly funder incontinently after he was returned out of Afta had raifed and ftirred up against him, he purposed and went about to detect his lewdnesse, and make it appeare unto the inhabitants of Sparta, what a dangerous medler he had beene whiles he lived: and to this purpose having read an oration found after his decease among his papers, which Creon verily the Halicatnaffian had composed; but Lysander meant to pronounce before the people in a general assembly of the citie, tending to the alteration of the State, and bringing in of many novelties, he was fully minded to have divulged it abroad: but when one of the auncient Senatours hadread the faid oration, and doubted the sequell thereof, considering it was so well penned, and grounded upon fuch effectuall and perswasive reasons , hee gave Agefilam counsell not to digge up Lyfander againe, and take him as it were out of his grave, but to let the oration lie buried with 50 him: whole advice he followed, and so rested quiet and made no more adoo: and as for those who underhand croffed him and were his adverfaries, he did not courfe them openly, but practifed and made meanes to fend fome of them foorth as captaines into certaine forrain expeditions, and unto others to commit certaine publike offices: in which charges they caried them felves fo, as they were discovered for covetous & wicked persons, and afterwards when they were called into question judicially, hee shewed himselfe contrary to mens expectation to helpe them out of trouble, and fuccour them fo, as that he gat their love and good wils, infomuch as in the end there was not one of them his adverfarie. One there was who requested him to write in his favour to his hofts and friends which he had in Afia, letters of recommendation, that they would defend and maintaine him in his rightfull cause: My friends (quoth he) use to doe that which is equitie and just, although I should write never a word unto them. Another showed him the wals of a city how woonderfull strong they were and magnificently built, asking of him whether he thought them not stately and faire: Faire (quoth he) yes no doubt, for women to lodge and dwellin, but not for men. A Megarian there was who magnified and highly extolled before him the city Megara: Yoong man (quoth he) and my good friend, your brave words require some great puissance. Such things as other men had in great admiration, hee to would not feeme formuch as to take knowledge of. Upon a time one Callipides an excellent plaier in Tragedies, who was in great name and reputation among the Greeks, infomuch as all forts of men made no small account of him, when he chanced to meet him upon the way, faluted him first, and afterwards prefumptuoufly thrust himselfe forward to walke among others, with him, in hope that the king would begin to flew fome lightfome countenance, and grace him; but in the end, feeing that it would not be, he was fo bolde as to advance himfelfe, and fay unto him: Sirking, know you not me? and have you not heard who I am? Agefilaus looking wiffly upon his face : Art not thou (quoth he) Callipides Deicelittas? (for so the Lacedemonians use to call a jester or plaier.) He was invited one day to come and heare a man who could counterfeit most lively and naturally the voice of the nightingale; but he refused to go, saying: 20 Thave heard the nightingales themselves to sing many a time. Meneorates the Physician had a luckie hand in divers desperate cures; whereupon some there were who surnamed him Jupiter, and he himselfe would over arrogantly take that name upon him, infomuch as he prefunded in one letter of his, which he fent unto him, to fet this superscription: Meneurates Jupiter, unto king Agefilans witheth long life : but Agefilans wrote back unto him in this wife : Agefilans to Menegrates wisheth f good health. When Pharnabasis and Conon the high-admirals of the armada (Signifying under the Perfianking, were so farre-foorth lords of the sea, that they pilled and spoiled all the that becomes coafts of Laconia; and befides, the walles of Athens were rebuilded with the money that Pharna-banances, etc. basin furnished the Athenians withall; the lords of the counsell of Lacedamon were of advice, ottemper. that the best policie was, to conclude peace with the king of Persia; and to this effect sent Antal-30 cides one of their citizens to Tiribafus, with commission treacherously to betray and deliver into the barbarous kings hands, the Greeks inhabiting Asia; for whose libertie Agesilaus before had made warres: by which occasion Agestlaus was thought to have had his hand in this shamefull and infamous practife: for Antaleidas, who was his mortall enemie, wrought by all meanes possible to effect peace, because he saw that warre continually augmented the credit of Agestlaw, and made him most mightie and honourable; yet neverthelesse he answered unto one that reproched him with the Lacedæmonians, faying : That they were Medified, orturned Medians: Nay rather (quoth he) the Medians are Laconified and become Laconians, The question was propounded unto him upon a time, whether of these two vertues in his judgement was the better, Fortitude or Justice? and lie answered: That where Justice reigned, Fortitude bare no 40 fway, and was nothing worth; for if we were all righteous and honest men, there would be no need at all of Fortitude. The people of Greece dwelling in Asia, had a custome to call the king of Persia, The greatking: And wherefore (quoth he) is he greater than I, unlesse he more temperatand righteous? femblably he faid: That the inhabitants of Asia were good flaves, but naughtie freemen. Being asked how a man might win himselse the greatest name and reputation among men, he answered thus: If he say well, and yet do better. This was a speech of his: That a good captaine ought to thew unto his enemies, valour and hardineffe; but unto those that be under his charge, love and benevolence. Another demanded of him, what, children should learne in their youth? That (quoth he) which they are to doe and practife when they be men growen. He was Judge in a cause, where the plaintife had pleaded well, but the defendant 50 very badly; who eftfoones and at every fentence did nothing but repeat these words: O Agestone had sundermined thy house, or robbed thee of thy raiment, wouldest thou thinke and looke Ellethat had that a carpenter or mason were bound to repaire thy house, and the weaver or tailour for to sup-done the injuplie thy want of clothes? The king of Persia had writ unto him a letter missive after a generall rie is to make peace concluded; which letter was brought by a gentleman of Persia, who came with Callias the Lacedamonian, and the contents thereof was to this effect: That the king of Perfu defired to

of, faying unto the meffenger: Thou shalt deliver this answere from me unto the king thymafter; that hee needed not to write any fuch particular letters unto mee, concerning private friendthip; for if hee friend the Lacedamonians in generall, and thew himselfe to love the Greeks, and defire their good, I also reciprocally will be his friend to the utmost of my power. but if I may finde that he practifeth treacherie, and attempteth ought prejudiciall to the state of Greece, well may be write epiftle upon epiftle, and I receive from him one letter after another. but let him truft to this: I will never be his friend. Hee loved very tenderly his owne children when they were little ones, infomuch as he would play with them up and downe the house, yea, and put a long cane betweene his legs, and ride upon it like an hobby horse with them for company; and if it chanced that any of his friends spied him so doing, he would pray them to say no- 10 thing unto any man thereof, untill they had babes and children of their owne. But during the continuall warres that he had with the Thebans, he fortuned in one battell to be grievouslie wounded; which when Antaleidas faw, he faid unto him: Certes you have received of the Thebans the due falarie and reward that you deserved, for teaching them as you have done, even against their willes how to fight, which they neither could nor ever would have learned to doe: for in truethit is reported, that the Thebans then became more martiall and warlike than ever before-time, as being inured and exercised in armes by the continuall roads and invasions that the Lacedamonians made; which was the reason, that ancient Lyeurgus in those lawes of his which be called Rhetræ, expresly forbad his people to make warre often upon one and the same nation, for feare lest in so doing their enemies should learne to be good souldiers. Whenhe 20 heard, that the allies and confederates of Lacedamon were offended and tooke this continual warfare ill, complaining that they were never in maner out of armes, but caried their hamesse continually upon their backs; and befides, being many more in number, they followed yet the Lacedæmonians, who were but an handfull to all them: he being minded to convince themin this, and to shew how many they were, commanded all his said confederates to assemble together, and to fit them downe pell-mell one with another; the Lacedamonians likewife to take their place over against them apart by themselves; which done, he caused an herald to cry aloud in the hearing of all: That all the potters should rise first; and when those were risen, that the braffe-founders and finithes should stand up; then the carpenters; after them the masons; and fo all other artifans & handi-crafts men, one after another; by which meanes all the confederats 20 wel-nere were rifen up, and none in maner left fitting; but all this while not a Lacedæmonian ftirred off his feat, for that forbidden they were all, to learne or exercise any mechanicall crast: then Agefilaus tooke up a laughter, and faid: Lo, my mafters and friends, how many more fouldiersare we able to fend into the warres, than you can make? In that bloodie battell fought at Leuctres, many Lacedamonians there were that ran out of the field & fled, who by the lawes and ordinances of the countrey were all their life time noted with infamy; howbeit, the Ephori leeing that the citie by this meanes would be dispeopled of citizens and lie desert, in that verie time when as it had more need than ever before of fouldiers, were defirous to devife a policie how to deliver them of this ignominic, and yet not with standing preferre the lawes in their entire and full force: therefore to bring this about, they elected Agefilaus for their law-giver, to enacta 40 new lawes; who being come before the open audience of the city, spake unto them in this manner: Yee men of Lacedemon I am not willing in any wife to be the author and inventor of new lawes: and as for those which you have alreadie, I minde not to put any thing thereto, to take fro, or otherwise to alter and chaunge them, and therefore mee thinkes it is meete and reasonable, that from to morrow forward, those which you have, should stand in their ful vigor, strength and vertue accustomed. Moreover, as few as there remained in the citie; (when Epaminondas was about to affaile it with a great fleete and a violent tempest (as it were) of Thebans and their confederates, puffed up with pride for the late victorie atchieved in the plaine of Leuctres) with those few (I say) hee put him and his forces backe, and cansed them to returne without effect: but in the battell of Mantinea, he admonished and advised the La-50 cedamonians to take no regard at all of other Thebans, but to bend their whole forces against Epaminondus onely, taying: That wife and prudent men alone, and none but they, were valiant and the fole cause of victorie; and therfore if they could vanquish him, they might eafily subdue all the rest, as being blockish sooles and men in deed of no valour; and so in truth it proved : for when as the victory now enclined wholy unto Epaminondas, and the Lacedamonians were at the verie point to be disbanded, discomfitted and put to flight: as the said Epaninondas turned for to call his owne men together to folow the rout, a Lacedaemonian chanced to give him a mortall wound, wherewith hee fell to the ground, and the Lacedamonians who were with Age silaus called themselves, made head againe, and put the victorie into doubtfull ballance : for now the Thebanes abated much their courage, and the Lacedamonians tooke the better hearts. Moreover, when the citie of Sparta was neere driven and at a low ebbe for money to wage warre, as being constrained to entertaine mercenarie fouldiers for pay, who were meere strangers; Agefilaus went into Aegypt, being sent for by the King of Aegypt to serve as his pensioner; but for that hee was meanely and simply apparelled, the inhabitants of the countrey despised him, for they looked to have seene the King of Sparta richly arraied and set out gallantly, and all gorgeously to be seene in his person like unto the Persian King; so soolish 10 a conceit they had of kings: but Agefilaus shewed them within a while, that the magnificence and majestie of Kings was to be acquired by wit, wisedome, and valour: for perceiving that those who were to fight with him and to make head against the enemie, were frighted with the imminent perill, by reason of the great number of enemies, who were two hundred thousand fighting men, and the small companie of their owne side; he devised with himselfe before the battell began, by some stratageme to encourage his owne men, and to embolden their hearts; which policie of hishe would not communicate unto any person; and this it was: He caused upon the infide of his left hand to be written this word, Victorie, backward; which done he tooke at the priefts or footh-faiers hand who was at facrifice, the liver of the beaft which was killed, and put it into the faid left hand thus written within, and fo held it a good while, making femblance as 20 if he mused deeply of some doubt, and seeming to stand in suspense & to be in great perplexity, untill the characters of the foresaid letters had a sufficient time to give a print, and leave their marke in the superficies of the liver; then thewed he it unto those who were to fight on his side, and gave them to understand that by those characters the gods promised victory; who suppofing verily that there was in it a certaine figne & prefage of good fortune, ventured boldly upon the hazard of a battell. And when the enemies had invested and beleaguered his campe round about; fuch a mightic number there were of them, and befides had begun to cast a trench on everiefide thereof, King * Nettanebas (for whofe aid he was thither come) follicited and intrea- * or Nettabios. ted him to make a fally and charge upon them before the faid trench was fully finished, and both ends brought together, he answered: That he would never impeach the deseigne and pur-30 pose of the enemies, who went (no doubt) to give him meanes to be equal unto them and to fight fo many to fo many: fo he staicd until there wanted but a verie little of both ends meeting; and then in that space betweene, he raunged his battell; by which device they encountred and fought with even fronts, and on equall hand for number: fo he put the enemies to flight, and with those few fouldiers which he had, he made a great carnage of them; but of the spoile and booty which he wan, he raifed a good round maffe of money, and fent it all to Sparta, Being now ready to embarke for to depart out of Aegypt, & upon the point of returne home, he died: and at his death expressly charged those who were about him, that they should make no image or statue whatfoever reprefenting the fimilitude of his personage: For that (quoth he) if I have done any vertuous act in my life time, that will be a monument sufficient to eternize my memorie; if 40 not, all the images, statues, and pictures in the world will not serve the turne, fince they be the workes onely of mechanicall artificers which are of no woorth and estimation. AGESIPOLIS the fonne of Cleombrotus, when one related in his presence that Philip K.of Macedon had in few daies demolished and raced the citie Olimbus: Par die(quoth he) Philip will not be able in many more daies to build the like to it. Another faid unto him by way of reproch, that himselfe(king as he was, and other citizens men growen of middle age) were delivered as hostages, and neither their children nor wives: Good reason (quoth he) and so it ought to be according to justice, that we our felves and no others, should beare the blame and paine of our faults. And when he was minded to fend for certaine dog-whelps from home; one faid unto him; that there might not be fuffered any of them to goe out of the countrey: No more 50 was it permitted hecretofore (quoth hee) for men to be lead foorth, but now it is allowed well enough.

A GESIPOLIS the fonne of Pausanias (when as the Athenians said to him: That they were content to report themselves to the judgement of the Megarians as touching certaine variances and differences between them, and complaints which they made one against another) spake thus unto them: Why my mafters of Athens, this were a great shame indeed, that they who are the chiefe and the verie leaders of all other Greeks, should lesse skill what is just than the Megarians.

A G 15 the fonne of Archidanrus, at what time as the Ephori spake thus unto him: Take with you the yoong & able men of this citie, & go into the countrey of fuch an one, for he wil conduct you his owne felfe, as farre as to the verie castle of his city: And what reason is it (quoth he) my masters, you that be Ephori, to commit the lives of so many lustie gallants into his hands, who is a traitour to his native countrey? One demaunded of him what science was principally exercifed in the citie of Sparta: Marie (quoth he) the knowledge how to obey and how to rule. He was woont to fay, that the Lacedamonians never asked, how many their enemies were ? but where they were. Being forbidden to fight with his enemies at the battell of Mantinea, because they were far more in number: He must of necessity (quoth he) fight with many that would have the comand & rule of many. Unto another who asked what number there might be in all of the 10 Lccadæmonians? As many (quoth he) as are enough to chase and drive away wicked persons. In palling a long the wals of Corinth, when he faw them fo high, so wel built, and so large in extent: Whath maner of women (quoth he) be they that inhabit within? To a great matter of Rhetorick who praising his owne skill & profession, chaunced to conclude with these words; Whenall is done, there is nothing so puissant as the speech of man: Why then be like (quoth he) so long as you hold your peace you are of no worth. The Argives having bin once already beaten & defaited, returned nevertheleffe into the field & thewed themselves in a bravado more gallantly than before, and prest for a new battell: and when therupon he saw his auxiliaries and confederates to be somewhat troubled and frighted: Be of good cheere (quoth he) my masters and friends, for if we, who have given them the foile be affraid, what thinke you are they themselves. Acct. 20 taine embassador from the citie Abdera, came to Sparta, who made a long speech as touching his meffage, and after he had done and held his toong a little, he demaunded at last a dispatch. and faid unto him: Sir, what answer would you that I should carry backe to our citizens: You thall fay unto them (quoth Agis) that I have fuffred you to speake all that you would, and as long as you lift and that I lent you mine care all the while without giving you one word again. Some there were who commended the Eliens for most just men and precise in observing the folemnitie of the Olympick games: And is that fo great a matter and fuch a wonder (quoth he) if in five yeeres space they exercise justice one day? Some buzzed into his eares that those of the other roial house envied him: Then (quoth he) doe they suffer a double paine; for first and formost their owne evils will vexe and crouble themselves; then in the second place, the good 30 things in me and my friends will torment them. Some one there was of advice, that he should give way and paffage to his enemies when they were put to flight: Yea, but marke this (quoth he) if we fet not upon them who runne away for cowardife, how shall we fight against them that state and make good their ground by valour? One there was who propounded a meanes for the maintenance of the Greekes libertie; which (no doubt) was a generous and magnanimous courfe, howbeit very hard to execute; unto who he answered thus: My good friend, your words require great store of money, and much strength. When another faid that king Philip would watch them well enough that they should not set foote within other parts of Greece: My friend (quoth he) it shall content us to remaine and continue in our owne countrey. There was anotherembaffador from the city Perint bus, came to Lacedamon, who having likewise made along 40 oration, in the end demaunded of Agis what answer he should deliver backe to the Perinthians: Mary what other but this (quoth he) that thou couldest hardly finde the way to make an end of fpeaking, and I held my peace all the while. He went upon a time fole embaffador to king Philip, who faid unto him: You are an embaffador alone indeed: True (quoth he) and good enough to one alone as you are. An auncient citizen of Sparta faid unto him one day, being himfelfe aged also, and far stept in yeeres: Since that the old lawes and customes went every day to mine and were neglected, feeing also that others farre woorse were brought in and stood in their place, all in the end would be naught and runne to confusion; unto whom he answered merilie thus: Then is it at it should be, and the world goes well enough if it be so as you say; for I remember when I was a little boy, I heard my father fay, that every thing then was turned upfide 50 downe, and that in his remembraunce all wentkim kam; and he also would report of his father that he had feene as much in his daies 5110 marvell therefore if things grow woorse and woorse; more woonder it were if they should one while be better, and another while continue still in the fame plight. Being asked on a time how a man might continue free all his life time; he answered: By despising death.

AGIS the younger, when Demades the oratour faid unto him: That the Lacedæmonians fwords were fo short that these juglers and those that plaied legerdemain, could swallow them downe all once, made him this answete: As short as they be the Lacedomonians can reach their enemies with them wel enough. A certaine leud fellow and a troublefome, never linned asking him, who was the best man in all Sparta: Mary (quoth Agis) even he who is unlikest thy selfe.

AGIS, the laftking of the Lacedemonians, being forelaid and furpriled by treachery, fo that he was condemned by the Ephori to die; as he was ledde without forme of law and juffice to the place of execution for to be strangled with a rope, perceiving one of his servants and miniflers to fled teares; faid thus unto him; Weepe not for my death; for in dying thus unjuftly and against the order of law, I am in better case than those that put me to death; and having said these words, he willingly put his necke within the halter.

ACROTATUS, when as his owne father and mother requested his helping hand for to effect a thing contrarie to reason and justice, staied their sure for a time: but seeing that they importuned him still and were very instant with him; in the end said unto them: So long as I was under yourhands, Ihad no knowledge norfence at all of justice; but after that you had betaken me to the common-weale, to my countrey, and to the lawes thereof, and by that meanes informed and instructed me in what you could in righteousnesse and honestie, I will endevour and ftrainemy felfe to follow the faid inftruction and not you; and for that I know full well that you would have me doe that which is good, and confidering that those things be best (both for a private person, and much more for him who is in authoritie and a chiefe magistrate) which are just; fure I will doe what you would have me, and refuse that which you say unto me.

ALCAMENES the sonne of Telectus, when one would needs know of him, by what meanes a man might preferve a kingdome best, made this answer: Even by making no account at all of lucre and gaine. Another demanded of him wherefore he would never accept nor receive the gifts of the Messenians? For footh (quoth he) because if I had taken the, I should never have had peace with the lawes. And when a third person said: That he marvelled much how he could live fo straight and neere to himselfe, considering he had wherewith and enough: It is (quoth he) a commendable thing, when a man having fufficient and plentie can nevertheleffe live within the compasse of reason, and not according to the large reach of his appetite.

ALEXANDRIDAS the fonne of Leon, seeing one to torment himselfe, and taking on desperately because he was banished out of his native countrey: My friend (quoth he) never fare so 30 for the matter nor vexe thy heart fo much, for being constreined to remoove so farre from thy countrey, but rather for being i fo remote from justice. Unto another who in delivering good i A man matter unto the Ephori, and to very great purpose, but in more words a great deale thanneed output to was: My friend (quoth he) thou speakest indeed that which becommeth, but otherwise than is for community becomming. One asked him why the Lacedæmonians committed the charge of all their lands ting finner, unto the Ilotes their flaves, & did not husband and tend them their owne felves: Because (quoth ing exiled. he) we conquered and purchased them, for that we would looke to our selves, and not tend them. Unto another who held that it was nothing but defire of credit and reputation that undid men, and who foever could be delivered from the care thereof were happie; he replied thus againe: If it be true that you fay, we must confesse and graunt that wicked men, who do wrong 40 unto others are happy; for how can a church-robber or theefe who spoileth other men of their goods be defirous of honour and glorie? When another demanded of him, how it came to passe that the Lacedamonians were so hardy and resolute in all occurrences and dangers of warre, he rendred this reason: Because (quoth he) we studie and endevour to have a reverend regard of our lives, and not to enterteine the feare of our lives, as others doe. It was demaunded of him, wherefore the Seniours or Elders far many daies in deciding and judging criminall causes ? and why albeit the accused party were by them acquit, yet he continued nevertheleffe in the state of a guiltieand accused person? As for the Senatours (quoth he) they be long indeciding capitall matters, where men are brought in question for their life; because those judges who have committed an errour in condemning a manto die, can never rectific 50 and amend that fentence: and as to the partie absolved and enlarged, he must remaine alwaies liable and subject to the law, because they might ever after enquire and judge better of his fact according to the law.

When a certaine to Athenian miscalled the Lacedæmonians, terming them ignorant and unlearned sots: Indeed (quoth he) we onely of all the Grecians, are the men who have not learned of you to do ill. And when another Athenian bragged, and faid: We have chaled you many a time from the river Cephifus: But we (quoth he) never yet drave you from the river Eurotas. A certeine great mafter and professour of Rhetoricke, would needs one day rehearse and pronounce before him an oration composed in the praise of Hereules: And who ever (quoth he) dispraised him ? Himselfe was woont to say: That the walles of Sparra, were their yong men; and their confines, the heads of their pikes. As he passed once thorow the citie Selinus in Sicilie, he chanced to reade this epitaph engraven upon a sepulchre or tombe:

Thefe men before Sclinus gates were staine in bloudie fight, Aswhilom they fought for to quench the lawle (letyrantsmight.

And well deferved you (quoth he) to die, for feeking to extinguish tyranny when it burnethout of a light fire; for cleane contrariwife, you should have kept it from burning altogether.

Mary evento do good unto his friends & hurt unto his enemies: But how much better (answered Ariston) my good friend, were it to benefit friends indeed, and of enemies to make good friends? but of this notable fentence, no doubt, Socrates was the authour, and upon him it is rightly fathered. Also when one demanded of him how many in number the Lacedæmonians were: As many (quoth he) as be fufficient to chase away their enemies. A certeine Athenian pronounced a funerall oration which he had penned in the praise of their owne citizens, who had bene defaited and were flaine by the Lacedamonians in a battel: If your countreymen (quoth he) were fo valiant as you fay, what thinke you then of ours, who vanquished them? When one praised Cha-50 rilaus upon a time, for that hee shewed himselfe courteous indifferently to all men: Andhow can he deserve (quoth Ariston) to be commended, who is kind and friendly to wicked persons? Another recommended unto him a musician and faid: Oh, what an excellentchaunter is there ? This is (quoth he) even as much as a good cooke or maker of pottage among us: meaning that there was no difference at all betweene giving pleasure by found of voice or instruments, and the dreffing of viands or seasoning sewes. One promised to give him wine that was very sweet and pleasant: And to what purpose? (quoth he) considering that it fer-10 veth but for to draw on more wine, and to make folkedrinke the rather; and besides, to cause men to be leffe valiant and unfit for any good things. In the warre which the Lacedamonians made against King Philip, fome gave him counsell to be wel advised where he fought, and to battell as far as he could from his owne countrey; unto whom he replied againe: This is not the thing (quoth hee) that wee ought to regard, but rather to confider and thinke upon this, how we may quit our felves fo well in fight, that we be winners in the end. And to those who praised him for that he had woonne a field of the Arcadians, he made this answer: It had beene better that we had overcome them ra-40 ther in wifedome and prudence than in might and force. One seemed to demaund of him, wherefore at Sparta those were noted with infamic, who in a discomfiture threw away their bucklers, and not they who cast from them their morrions, cuiraces or breast-plates: Because (quoth he) these armors and head-pieces, serve onely for those who weare them; but their sheilds & bucklers, have their use also for the common strength of the whole battailon. When he heard a certaine musician fing: Beleeve me (quoth hee) the fellow plaies the foole verie well. Having heard a Philosopher dispute and discourse upon this 20 paradox: That there was no good captaine in warre, but the great clarke and learned Sage onely: This is (quoth he) a strange proposition and a woonderfull, but the best is, he that mainteinethit, is in no wife to be credited, for his eares were never yet acquainted fo much as with the found of a trumpet. He came one day into the open schoole or auditorie to heare Xenocraresdifcourse at large upon some question; but it fell out so, that he had new done when hee entred into the place; then one of his companie began to fay: Surely, fo foone as we were present, he became silent: He did well (quoth Eudamidas) if he had made an end of that which he had to fay : but when the other replied: It were not amiffe yet that we heard him, and that he would fet to it againe: If we (quoth Eudamidas) should goe to visit a man in his house who had supped already before we came, were it well done of us to pray him to goe to a new supper for 30 the love of us? It was once demanded of him why he alone would feeme to approove reft, quietnesse and peace, considering that all his fellow-citizens with one consent were of opinion to take armes and make warre upon the Macedonians? It is (quoth he) because I neither need nor am defirous to convince them of their errour and lying. Another for to animate him to this warre, alleaged the proweffes and worthy exploits atchieved by them at other times against the Persians: Methinkes (quoth he) you know not what you say, namely, that because we have overcome a thousand sheepe, we should therefore set upon fiftie woolves. Zeuxidamus likewise answered unto one who demanded of him why the statutes and ordinances of prowesse and martiall fortitude, were not reduced into a booke, and given in wri-

Another embassiadour there came from Elia, who faid: That he was fent from his fellowcitizens, because he onely of all that citie loved and followed the Laconike maner of life; of him Theopompus demaunded: And whether is thine or the other citizens life the better? he answered Mine: Why then (quoth he) how is it possible that a citie should continue safe, in which there being fo great a number of inhabitants, there is but one good man? There was one faid before him, that the citie of Sparta maintained the state thereof entier, for that the kings there knew how to governe well: Nay (quoth he) not fo much therefore, as because the citizens there can skill how to obey well. CALLICRATIDAS

CALLICRATIDAS being admirall of a fleet, when the friends of Lylander requested him to pleasure them in killing some of their enemies; and in consideration thereof he should receive of them fifty talents; notwithstanding he stood then in very great need of mony for to buy victuals for the mariners, yet would not be grant their request; and when Cleander, one of his counfell, faid unto him: I would (I trow, if I were in your place) take the offer: So would I also (quoth he) if I were in yours. Being come to Sardis unto Cyrus the yoonger, who at that time was an allie and confederate of the Lacedæmonians, to fee if hee could speed himselfe of him with money for to enterteine mariners and mainteine the armada; the first day he gave him to understand that he was thither come to speake with him; but answere was made: That the king to was at the table drinking: Well (quoth he) I will give attendance untill he have made an end of his beaver: after he had waited a long time, and law that it was impossible for to have audience thatday, he departed out of the court for that time, being thought very rude and uncivill in fo doing: the morow after, when likewise he was given to understand that he was drinking againe, and that he would not come abroad that day; he made no more adoe, but returned to Fphefus, from whence he came, faying withall: That he ought not fo farre foorth to take paines for to be provided of money, as to doe any thing unfeeming Sparta: and befides, he fell a curfing those who were the first that endured such indignitie, as to subject themselves unto the insolencie of Barbarians, and who taught them to abuse their riches, and thereby to shew themselves so proud and diffdainfull, as to infult over others; yea, and he fware a great oath in the prefence of those 20 who were in his company, that fo foone as he was returned to Sparta, he would labor with all his might and maine, to reconcile the Greeke nations one unto another; to the end that they might bemore dread and terrible to the Barbarians, when as they stood in no need of their forren forces to wage warre one upon another. It was demanded of him, what kinde of men the Ionians were? Good flaves they are (quoth he) but bad free-men. When Cyrus in the end had fent money for to pay his fouldiers wages, and befides fome gifts and prefents particularly to himfelfe; he received onely the forefaid pay, but as for the gifts, he fent them backe againe, faying: That he had no need of any private or particular amitie with Cyrus, so long as the common friendship which he had with all the Lacedæmonians perteined also unto him. A little before he gave the battell at fea, neere unto Arginusie, his pilot faid unto him: That it was best for him to faile away, 30 for that the gallies of the Athenians were farre more in number than theirs: And what of all that (quoth he) is it not a shamefull infamic, & hurtfull besides to Sparta, for to flie? simply, best it is to tary by it, and either to win, or die for it. Being at the point to encounter and joine medley, and having facrificed unto the gods, the foothfaier shewed unto him that the entrails of the beaft fignified and promifed affured victory unto the armie, but death unto the captaine; whereat he was nothing daunted nor affrighted, but faid: The state of Sparta lieth not in one man, for when I am dead, my countrey will be never the leffe; but if I should recule now, and yeeld unto the enemies, she will be much impaired, and lose her reputation. Thus having substituted Cleander in his place, if ought should happen otherwise than well, he gave the charge, and strooke a navall battell, wherein fighting valiantly he ended his life.

He had made truce for feven daies with the Argives; and the third night after it beganne, perceiving that the Argives upon the affurance and confidence of the faid truce were foundly afleepe, he charged upon them, flew some, and tooke others prisoners; and when he was reproched therefore, and namely, that he had broken his oth; he answered: That he never sware to observe truce in the night season, but in day-time onely; 50 and befides, what annotance foever a man did unto his enemies (in what fort it made no matter) he was to thinke that both before God and man it was a point above justice, and in no wife subject and liable unto it; how beit, for this perjurie of his and breaking of covenant, he was difappointed and frustrate of his hope and desseigne, which was to surprise the citie of Argos, for that indeed the very women tooke those armes which in memoriall of ancient victories were hung and fet up fast in their temples, with which they repelled them from the walles: after this, he fell into a furious rage, and his wits were beffraught; infomuch as he tooke a knife, and flit his bodie from the very ancles up to the principall and noble vitall parts, and so laughing and scoffing, he

His very foothfaier would have diffwaded and diverted him from leading his forces against Arges, faying: That his returne from thence would be dishonourable and infamous: and when he presented his power before the citie, he found the gates fast shut against them, and the women in armes upon the walles: How thinke you (quoth he) now, doe you suppose this a dithonourable returne, when as the women, after all the men be dead, are faine to keepe the gates falt locked ? When the Argives abused him with reprochfull tearmes, calling him a perjured and godleffe person: Well (quoth he) it is in youto miscall me and raise upon me as you do, in word; but it is in me to plague and mischiefe you indeed. Unto the ambassadours of sames, who came to moove and follicit him for to warre upon the tyrant Polycrates, and to that effeet, used long speeches and persuasions, he answered thus: As touching that point which you to fpake of in the beginning of your oration, it is out of my head now, and I remember it not; in which regard also I doe not well conceive the middle part of your speech; but as for that which you delivered in the latter end , I mislike it altogether. There was in his time a notable rover or pirate, who made roads into the land, and spoiled the coasts of Laconia, but at the last he was intercepted and taken; now being examined and demanded why he robbed in this fort? I had not wherewith (quoth he) to mainteine and keepe my fouldiers about me, and therefore I came to those who had it, and knowing that they would give me nothing freely and by faire meanes, I affaied to get somewhat of them by force and strong hand : Naughtine ffe I see well (quoth he) goeth the neerest way to worke. There was a leaud villaine, who did nothing but revile and milcall him: Thouseemest (quoth he) to go up and downe railing upon every man, to the end that 10 being anused how to answere those thy flanders and imputations, we might have no time not leafure to charge thee with thy wickednesse and lay open thy vices. There was a great professor of Rhetoricke, who tooks vpon him in his presence to discourse at $_{70}$ large of proweffe and valour, whereat he began to laugh a good; and when the partie faid unto him: Why laugh you to heare a man speake of valiance, especially being as you are a king? My good friend (quoth he) because if a swallow should talke as you have done, I would doe as you do; marie if it had beene an eagle, I should have beene silent haply and held my peace. The * drague 10% Argives made their boaft & vaunted that in a *fecond battel, they had recovered the loffe which they fullained in a former: I wonder much at that (quoth he) if by the addition of two fyllables onely, you are prooved better men now than earft you were. When one reproched him in foule tearmes, faying: You are a great spender Cleomenes and a voluptuous person: Better it is yet (quoth he) to to be, than unjust as you are, who being wealthie enough, are yet covetous, and getyour goods by undue and indirect meanes. There was one who recommended a mulician 40 unto him, and in truth praifed the man in many respects; but among the rest for his excellent voice, faying : He was the bestfinger in all Greece : but Cleomenes pointing with his finger to one hardby: Lo (quoth hee) here is a paffing good cooke of mine, and namely at making of broth he hath no fellow. Meander the Tyrant of Samos, upon the comming and invalion of the Persians, fled into the citie of Sparta, where hee shewed unto Cleomenes all the gold and silver which he had brought with him, praying him to take what he would of it; none would heere ceive at his hands, but fearing left he would fasten some of that treasure upon other citizens, to the Ephoni he went & faid thus unto them: It were better for Sparta, if this Samian guell of mine were sent out of Peloponnessus, for searche induce and milleade some one of the Spartanestobe naught: the Ephorino fooner heard this advertisement of his, but the verie same day by open 50 proclamation banished him out of the countrey. One demanded of him upon a time, and said: Why having so often vanquished the Argives warring upon you, have yee not rooted them out cleane? Neither will wee ever so do (quoth hee) for we would have our young men alwaies to be kept occupied and in exercise: and when another asked him why the Spartanes never confectated unto the gods the armors which they had despoiled their enemies of? Because (quoth he) they be the spoiles of cowardes; for those armes which have beene taken from such as held. them cowardly, it is not meete either to thew unto yoong men, or to dedicate unto the gods.

CLEOMENES the fonne of Cleombrotus, when one gave him certaine cockes of game which were verie eager and hot in fight, faying: That they would in combat for the victorie, die in the verie place: Nay (quoth hee) give methode rather that kill them; for furely fuch must needs be better than thefe.

LEOTYCHIDAS the first of that name, when one hit him in the teeth that he was inconflant and mutable: If I change (quoth he) it is in regard of the times which doe alter and be di-10 vers; and not as you do, who alter ever and anon upon your owne naughtinesse. Unto another who asked him how a man might best keepe the goods that presently he enjoyed; he answered: By not committing them all at once unto fortune. It was demaunded of him once, what it was that yoong gentlemen of noble houses ought to learne : Even that (quoth hee) which will doc them good another day, when they be men growen, Laftly, when one would needs know of him the reason why the Spartanes dranke so little: Because (quoth he) others should not consult of us, but we of others.

LEOTY CHIDAS the fonne of Ariston, when one brought him word that the fonnes of Demaratus gave out verie hard speeches of him: By the gods (quoth he) I nothing marvell thereat; for there is not one of them all that can affoord any man a good word. There chanced to be a 20 ferpent feene, which clasped round about the key or bolt of the gate next unto him; which fight the footh-fayers pronounced to be prodigious and a great woonder: Why (quoth he) this feemethnot to me any monftrous or ftrange thing, that a ferpent should winde about a key or bolt; but furely it were a maryellous matter indeed, if the key or bolt should be wound about the ferpent. There was a facfificer or priest named Philippus, who inducted and professed men in the ceremoniall religion of Orphew; and so extreame poore he was that he begged for his living; howbeit he went about and faid: That those who by his hand were admitted into those ceremonies, should be happy after their death: Foole that thou art (quoth he) why dost not thou thy felfe die quickly, to the end that thou maiest cease to lament and bewaile thine owne miserie and povertie.

LEON the fonne of Eueratidas, being asked in what citie a man might dwell most fafely? answered thus; Even in that, whereof the inhabitants are not richer or poorer one than another; and wherin justice doth prevaile, & injustice is of no force. When he saw cerraine runners prepare to run a course for the prize in the race at the solemne Olympicke games, and marked how they espied all meanes possible to catch and winne some advantage of their concurrents: See (quoth he) how much more studious these runners are of swiftnesse than of rightcousnesse. And when one hapned to diffeourfe out of time and place, of things verie good and profitable: My good friend (quoth he) unto him, your matter is honest and seemely, but your manner of handling it, is bad and unfeemely.

LEONIDAS the founc of Anaxandridas, and brother to Cleomenes; when one faid unto 40 him: There was no difference betweene you and us before you were a king: Yes Iwis good Sir (quoth he) for if I had not been better than you, I had never beene king. When his wife, named Gorgo, at what time as he tooke his leave of her and went foorth to fight with the Persians in the palle of Thermopyla, asked of him whether hee had ought elfe to commaund her? Nothing (quoth he) but this, that thou be wedded againe unto honest men and bring them good children. When the Ephori faid unto him, that he lead a small number foorth with him to the forefaid straights of Thermopyla: True (quothhe) but yet enough for that service which we go for. And when they enquired of him againe, and faid: Why fir, entend you any other defleigne and enterprise? In outward shew (quoth he) and apparance, I give out in words that I goe to empeach the paffage of the Barbarians; but in verie truth to lay downe my life for the Greekes. 50 When he was come to the verie entrance of the faid paffe, hee faid unto his fouldiers: It is reportedunto us by our fcouts, that our Barbarous enemies be at hand; therefore wee are to lofe no more time, for now we are brought to this iffue, that we must either defait them, or else die for it. When one faid unto him, for the exceeding number of their arrrowes we are not able to fee the fun: So much the better (quoth he) for us, that we may fight under the fhade. To another who faid: Lo they be even hard & close to us; And so are we (quoth he) hard by them. Another used these words unto him: You are come Leonidas with a verie small troupe, for to hazard your felfe against fo great a multitude; unto whom he answered: If you regard number, all Greece affembled affembled together is notable to furnish us, for it would but answere one portion or canton of their multitude: but if you stand upon valor & prowesse of men, certes this number is sufficient. Another there was who faid as much to him: But yet I bring (quoth he) money enough, confi. dering we are heere to leave our lives. Xerxes wrote unto him to this effect: You need not un. leffe you lift be fo perverse and obstinate as to fight against the gods, but by siding and combining with me, make your felfe a monarch over all Greece; unto whom he wrote back in this wife: If you knew wherein confifted the foveraigne good of mans life, you would not cover that which is another mans; for mine owne part, I had rather loofe my life for the fafetic of Greece. than be the commaunder of all those of mine owne nation. Another time Xerxes wrote thus: Send me thy armour; unto whom he wrote backe: Come your felfe and fetch it. At the verie 10 point when he was to charge upon his enemies, the marshals of the armie came unto him, and protested that they must needs hold off and stay until the other allies & confederates were come together: Why (quoth he) thinke you not that as many as be minded to fight are come alreadie? or know you not that they onely who dread and reverence their kings, be they that fight against enimies? this said, he commaunded his souldiers to take their dinners, for sup we shall (faid he) in the other world. Being demanded why the best and bravest men preferre anhonorable death before a shamefull life? Because (quoth he) they esteeme the one proper to na. ture onely; but to die well they thinke it peculiar to themselves. A great desire he had to have those young men of his troupe and regiment, who were not yet maried, and knowing well that if he delt with them directly and openly, they would not abide it; he gave unto them oneafter 20 another two brevets or letters to carrie unto the Ephori, and so sent them away: he meantalso to fave three of those who were married; but they having an inkeling thereof, would receive no brevets or miffives at al: for one faid, I have followed you hither to fight, and not to be a carrer of newes; the second also: By staying heere I shall quit my selfe the better man; and the third: I will not be behind the rest, but the formost in fight.

LOCHAGUS the father of Polyanides and Syron, when newes was brought unto him that one of his children was dead: I knew long fince (quoth he) that he must needs die.

 $L_{\rm YC}\,u\,\kappa\,s\,u\,s\,$ the law-giver, minding to reduce his citizens from their old maner of life, in to a more fober and temperat course, and to make them more vertuous and honest (for before time they had beene diffolute and over delicate in their maners and behaviour) nourished two 20 whelpes which came from the fame dogge and bitch, and the one he kept alwaies within house, & used it to licke in every dish & to be greedy after meat; the other he would leade forth abroad into the fields and acquaint it with hunting: afterwards he brought them both into an open and frequent affembly of the people, and fet before them in the mids, certaine bones, toffe & fcraps, he put out also at the same time an hare before them; now both the one and the other tookencontinently to that whereto they had been acquainted, and ranne apace, the one to the messe of lops, and the other after the hare and caught it: heereupon Lyeurgus tooke occasion to inferre this speech: You see heere my masters and citizens (quoth he) how these two dogs having one fire and one dam to them both, are become farre different the one from the other, by reafon of their divers educations and bringing up; whereby it is evident how much more powerful 40 nouriture and exercise is to the breeding of vertuous maners, than kinde and nature: howbeit fomethere be who fay, that these two dogs or whelps which he brought out, were not of one and the same dogge and bitch; but the one came from those curres that used to keepe the house, and the other from those hounds that were kept to hunting; and afterwards that he acquainted the whelpe that was of the woorfekinde onely to the chafe, and that which came of the better race, to flappe, licke, and doe nothing elle but raven; whereupon either of them made their choise and ranne to that quickly whereto they were accustomed; and thereby he made it appear evidently, how education, trayning, and bringing up is availeable both for good and bad conditions, for thus he spake unto them: By this example you may know my friends that nobilitie of bloud, how highly foever it is effected with the common fort, is to no purpose, no though we so bee descended from the race of Hercules, if we doe not practise those deeds whereby hee became the most renowmed and glorfous knight in the world, learning and exercising all our life time those things which are honest and vertuous. Having made a devision of the whole territorie, and distributed to every citizen an equall portion; it is reported that a good while after, being returned fro a long voiage which he had, into the faid territoric about harvest time, when the corne was newly reaped and cut down, feeing the shocks & sheaves, cocks and stiches raungedeven and orderly, and the same like one to another; he rejoiced in his heart, and smiling faid to those about him: That the whole territorie of Laconia looked like unto the inheritance and patrimonie of many brethren who had lately parted and divided their portions together equally. When he had brought in the cutting off and abolition of debts, he went in hand with the division of all utenfils also and mooveable goods within house into even thates; to the end that there might be no imparitie nor inequality at all among his citizens; but perceiving that if he went directly and plainly to work, they would hardly beare and brooke that any thing thould be abridged and taken from them: he discredited first and formost all forts of gold and filvercoine, giving commaundement that there should be no money used but made of iron: and taxed a certainerate and limitation to what fumme each mans state should amount; ac-10 cording to the estimation of the said money by way of exchange; which done, all wrongs and unjust dealings were chased cleane out of Lacedemon: for now by this meanes there could no man rob nor steale, there was no bribing nor corruption by gifts, no man might defraudin contracts and bargains, nor embezzell any more, confidering that neither they might conceale and hide that which was unjustly gotten, nor any man joied in possessing ought, nor could possibly use and occupie the same without perill, ne yet carie to and fro in safetic and securitie: and withall by the fame meanes, he banished out of Lacedemon all superfluities, whereby there were no more any marchants, nor pleading fophifters, no wifards & fortune tellers, no cogging mount-banks & juglers, no ingenious devifers of new fabricks & buildings that haunted Sparra any more; for why, he would not permit any money there which was current in other 20 places, but onely this iron coine was in request, and passed from one to another: as for the price thereof it waighed an Aeginetick pound; but in woorth and valour, it went but for foure Chochins. Moreover, having a purpose to root out delicate and superfluous pleasures, and to cut off cleane all covetous defire of riches, he inflittuted and brought up those meetings which they cal Systia: i, eating at publick meales and making merric together: and when some demanded of him what he meant to devife the fame, and also why he orderned that his citizens should be divided by little tables when they fat together in armes? To the end (quoth he) that they might be in more readinesse to receive commaundement from their superiors; as also if peradventure there should be some practise among them of change and alteration, the fault might be in some few; and moreover, that there should be equallity in their eating & drinking, & neither in their 30 dishes of meat nor cups of drink, nor in their beds nor apparel, no nor so much as in the utenfils & implemets of the house, or in any thing whatsoever, the rich shuld have any vantage over the poore: by this policy having brought to passe that riches was not set-by and defired, considering that fuch order was taken, that neither men had much occasion to use it, nor any joy & pleasure to shew it, he would thus say unto his familiars: My good friends, what a gay & goodly matter is it, to make it knowen by effect indeed, that Pluto, that is to fay, the god of riches, is in trueth blinde, according as he is named to be. Furthermore, carefull he was, and had a speciall regard that his people should not first dine at home in their owne houses, and after that, goe to their publicke halles and meetings aforefaid, being full of other viands and drinks; for others would reproch and speake badly of a man who did not cat among them with a good appetite, as being 40 a glutton, or one who for daintineffe and delicacy difdained this common and vulgar maner of diet; but if any fuch happened to be feene and knowen, he was fure to be condemned in a good round fine. Hereupon it was, that a long time after, king Agis (after his returne from an expedition or voiage in warre, wherein he had subdued the Athenians) willing one day to suppe privately by himfelfe with his wife at home, fent into the kitchin for his part or allowance of meat; but the marshals of the armie would fend him none; and the morrowafter, when the matter came to the knowledge of the Ephori, he had a fine fet on his head for it: but by reason of these new ordinances, divers of the richer fort tooke fnuffe, and in great indignation rofe up against him, abused him with hard tearmes, threw stones and would have brained him; but he seeing himselfe thus furiously pursued, made shift by good footmanship, and escaped out of the com-50 monmarket place, & put himselfe within the sanctuarie of Minervaes temple, called Chalce &cos, before the other could overtake him, only Aleander was so necre unto him, that when he cast his cie behinde to fee who followed after, rought him a rap with his bason, and strake one of his cies out of his head: but Aleander afterwards, by the common sentence of the whole citie, was put into his hands for to do exemplarie justice upon him, according as he thought good; howbeit, hee wrought him no mischiese nor displeasure at all; and that which more is, hee never so much as complained of any wrong or abuse that he had offered and done unto him; but having him to be a domesticall guest and to live with him, he did this good of him: That hee blazed in every place where he came, his commendable parts, and namely, the orderly dier and maner of life, that he had learned by conversing with him; and in one word, shewed himselfe highly to aftect that discipline in which Lycurg w had trained him : afterwards, for a memoriall of this accident which befell unto him, he caused within the temple of Minerva Chileeceos, a chapell to be built unto Minerva, furnamed Optiletia; for that the Doriens inhabiting those parts, do call in their language, Eies, Opteli. It was demanded of him upon a time, why he had not established any written positive lawes: Because (quoth he) they that are well brought up and instituted in that discipline as it apperteineth, know well how to judge that which the time requireth. Some asked him why he had ordeined that the roofes of houses should be made with timber rough hewen with the axe, and the doores of fawen planke or boord onely, without worke of any other 10 tooles or instruments at all ? unto whom he answered : Because our citizens should be moderate in all things that they bring into their houses, and have no furniture therein that might seto. ther mens teeth on water, or which other men do fo much affect. From this custome by report it came, that king Leorychides the first of that name, being at supper in a friends house of his, when he faw the roofe over his head richly feeled with embowed arch-worke, demanded of his host whether the trees in that countrey grew square or no ? When he was asked why he forbad to make warre often against the same enemies: For feare (quoth he) that being forced citioones to fland upon their owne guard and put themselves in defence, they should in the end become well experienced in the warres: in which regard Agefilaus afterwards was greatly blamed for being the cause by his continual expeditions and invasions into Beestia, that the Thebans weree- 20 quall in armes unto the Lacedamonians. Another asked also of him, why he enjoined maidens marriageable to exercise their bodies in running, wreftling, pitching the barre, flinging coits, and lancing of darts ? For this purpose (quoth he) that the first rooting of their children which they are to breed, taking fast and fure holde in able bodies wel fet and strongly knit, might spring and thrive the better within them, and they also themselves being more firme and vigorous, beare children afterward the better, be prepared and exercised (as it were) to endure the paines and travels of child-birth eafily and flourly, over and befides, if need required, be able to fight in defence of themselves, their children and countrey. Some there were who found fault with the cultome that he brought in, that the maidens of the city at certeine festivall daies should dance naked in folemne fliewes and pomps that were fet, demanding the cause thereof? to whom hee 10 rendred this reason: That they performing the same exercises which men do, might be no lesse enabled than they, either in firength and health of body, or in vertue and generolity of minde, and by that meanes checke and despise the opinion that the vulgar fort had of them. And from hence it came, that Gorgo the wife of Leonidas, as we finde written, when a certeine dame and ladie of a forcen countrey faid unto her: There be no other women but you Laconian wives, that have men at command ; answered in this wife : For why? we onely are the women that beare men. Moreover, he debarred and kept those men who remained unmarried, from the fight of those shewes where the yoong virgins aforesaid danced naked; and that which more is, set upon them the note of infamic, in depriving them exprelly of that honour and fervice which you ger folke are bound to yeeld unto their elders: in which doing the had a great forelight and pro-40 vidence to move his citizens to marriage and for to beget children; by occasion whereof, there was never any man yet who misliked and complained of that which was faid unto Dereillidas, by way of reproch, though otherwise he was a right good and valiant captaine; for when he came upon a time into a place, one of the yonger fort there was, who would not deigne to rife up unto him, nor give him any reverence; and this reason he gave: Because (quoth he) as yet you have not begotten a childe to rife up and dochis ducty likewife to me. Another asked of him, whereforche had ordeined that daughters should be married without a dowrie or portion given with them ? Because (quothhe) for default of marriage-money none of them might stay longere they were wedded, nor be hearkened after for their goods; but that every man regarding onely the maners and conditions of a yoong damofell, might make choife of her whom he meaneth 50 to espouse, for her vertue onely, which is the reason also that he banished out of Sparta all ma, ner of painting, trimming, and artificiall embeliftments to procure a superficiall beauty and complexion. Having also prefixed and set downe a certeine time, within the which aswell maidens as yoong men might marrie; one would needs know of him why he limited forth such a definite terme? unto whom he answered : Because their children might be strong and lustic, 25 being begotten and conceived of fuch persons as be already come to their full growth. Some woondered why hee would not allow that the new married bridegrome should lie with his espouse, espoule; but expresly gave order that the most part of the day hee should converse with his companions, yea, and all the nights long, but whenfoever hee went to keepe company with his new wedded wife, it should be fecretly and with great heed and care that hee be not surprired or found with her? This (quoth he) is done to this end that they may be alwaies more firong and in better plight of body: also thatby notenjoying their delights and pleasures to thefull; their love might be ever fresh, and their infants betweene them more hardie and flout: furthermore, hee remooved out of the citie all precious and sweete perfumes, saying: That they were no better than the verie marring and corruption of the good naturall oile; the art also of dying and tineture, which he said was nothing else but the flatterie of the senses: 10 to bebriefe, he made the citie Sparta inaccessible (as I may say) for all jewelers and fine workmen, who professe to set out and adorne the body: giving out, that such by their lewd artificiall devices, do deprave and marre the good arts and mysteries in deed. In those daies the honestic and pudicitie of dames was fuch, and fo far off were they from that tractable facilitie and eafie acceffe unto their love; which was afterwards, that adulteric among them was held for an unpoffible and uncredible thing. And to this pupofe may well be remembred the narration of one Geradatas, an ancient Spartane, of whom a stranger asked the question: What punithment adulterers were to fuffer in the citie of Sparta? for that, he faw, Lyeurgus had fet downe no expreffe law in that behalfe: Why (quoth he) there is no adulterie among us: but when the other replied againe: Yea, but what and if there were? even the fame answere made Geradatas, and 20 none other: For how (quoth he)can there be an adulterer in Sparta, wherein all riches, all superfluous delights and dainties, all outward trickings and embelifhings of the bodie are defpifed and difhonoured? and where shame of doing ill, honestie, reverence and obeisance to superiorscarrie away all the credit and authoritie? One put himfelfe forward, and was in hand with him to fet up and establish the popular State of government in Sparta; unto whom hee answered: Begin it thy felfe first within thine owne house. And unto another who demaunded of him, why he ordained the facrifices in Laced eman to fimple and of final coft? To the end (quoth he) that we should never cease and give over to worship and honour the gods. Also when hee permitted his citizens to practife those exercises of the bodie onely, wherein they never stretched foorth their hands; he was required by one to yeeld a reason thereof: Because (quoth he) 30 none of us should in taking paines be accultomed to be wearie or to faint, and give over at any time. Likewife being asked the reason why he gave order oftentimes to change the campe, and notin one place to lie long encamped? To the end (quoth he) that we might doe the greater damage to our enemies, and hurt more of them. Another was defirous to know of him, why he forbadto give the affault unto any walles? unto whom he answered: For feare that the best men might not be killed, by a woman, a child, or fome fuch like person. Certaine Thebanes craved his advice and opinion touching the facrifice, divine fervice, and dolefull moane which was folemnely made in the honour of Leucothea; unto whom he answered thus: If you take her for a goddesse, weepe not for her as if she were a woman; if you suppose her to be a woman, facrifice not unto her as to a goddeffe. Unto his citizens who demaunded of him, how they might put 40 backe and repulse the invasions of their enemies? Marie (quoth he) if you continue poore, and none of you do covet to have more than another. Againe, when they would needs know why he would not have their citie to be walled about: Because (faith he) that citie is never without a wal, which is environed and compaffed about with valiant men, and not with bricke or itone. The Spartanes also were verie curious in trimming the haire of their heads, alledging for their warrant a certaine speech of Lycurgus as touching that point, who was woont to say: That sidehaire made them who were faire more beautifull, and those that were foule, more hideous and terrible. Likewise he gave commaundement, that in their warres, when they had discomfitted their enemies and put them to flight; to follow the chafe so hardly, untill they were fully affured of the victorie, and then to retire withall speed, saying: That it was no act of a generous spirit, 50 nor befeeming the brave minde of the Greekish nation, to massacre and execute those who had quit the place and were gone; befides; this also would be fafe and commodious for themselves, forasmich as the enemies who knew once their custome, namely, to put those to the sword who obstinately refist and make head, and to spare those and let them escape who slie before them; find by that meanes that flight is better than to stand to fight. A certaine man asked him, for what cause he would not suffer the souldiers to rifle and spoile the bodies of their enemies as they folly dead: For feith (quoth hee) left while they buffe themselves, and stoupe forward to gather the spoiles, they should neglect their fight in the meane time, but father entend onely with their povertie and want to keepe their range.

The Tyrant of Sicilie Dionysius had fent unto LYSANDER two futes of womens roabes. that he might choose whether of them he liked better, to carrie unto his daughter; but hee said unto him: That the herfelfeknew best which to choose, and what was fittest for herselse, and so he tooke both away with him. This Lysander was a verie craftie and subtile foxe, who ordered and managed most part of his affaires by cunning casts and deceitfull devices, esteeming justice onely by utilitie, and honestie by profit; confessing in word that truth was better than fallhood; but measuring in deed the worth and price as well of the one as the other by commoditie. To them who reprooved and blamed him for conducting the most part of his enterprises by fraud 10 and guile, and not by plaine direct force, a thing unwoorthy the magnanimity of Herenles, hee would laugh and answere: That where he could not atchieve a thing by the lions skin, hee must needes fow thereto a piece of the foxes case. And when others charged and accused him mightily, for that he had violated and broken his oath, which he had made in the citie Miletum. he used to say: That children were to be deceived with cock all-bones, but men with oaths: Having defaited the Athenians in a battell by meanes of an ambuth, in a certaine place called the Goats-rivers, and afterward preffed them fo fore with famine, that he forced them to yeeld the citic unto his mercie, he wrote unto the Ephori thus: Athens is woon. The Lacedamonians in his time were at some difference with the Argives about their confines; and it seemed that the Argives alledged better reasons, and brought forth more direct evidences for themselves 20 than the other; whereupon he came among them and drew his fword, faying: They that ate the mightier with this, plead best for their confines. Seeing the Boeotians as he passed thorow their countrey, hanging in equal ballance, and as yet not resolved and certaine to which sides for to range themselves, he sent one unto them for to know whether they would chuse, that he marched thorow their lands with speares and pikes upright, or bending downeward and trailing. In a certaine affembly of the estates of Greece, there was a Megarian who spake bravely and audacioufly unto him: Thy words my friend (quoth he) have need of a citie; meaning thereby that he was of too weake and fmall a citic, as to give fuch glorious words. The Corinthians rebelled upon a time, whereupon he advaunced with his forces against their walles, which the Lacedamonians seemed to affaile verie coldly: but at the verie instant there was espied an hare, running 30 crosse over the towne ditch: whereupon he tooke occasion to say: Are yee not ashamed in deed ô yee Spartanes, to feare fuch enemies, who are fo idle and stirre fo little abroad, that harescan fleepequietly, even under their verie walles. When hee was at Samothrace to confult with the oracle there; the priest was in hand with him to confesse what was the most wicked and enormious act that ever hee did in all his life time: whereupon hee asked the priest againe: Whether is it your felfe or the gods that would know thus much, and impofeth this confession upon mee? The gods (quoth the priest) would have it so: Why then (quoth he) retire you aside out of my sight, and if they demand the same of mee, I will answere them. A certaine Perfian asked him what kinde of government hee liked best and praised most: Even that (quoth hee) which ordeineth for cowards and hardy men that reward and hire 40 which is meet for them. Another faid unto him: That in every place where he came hee was ready to commend and defend him: I have (quoth he againe) in my grounds two oxen, and neither of them speaks a word; howbeit, I know for al that, which is good of deed, and which is idle and lazic at his worke. There was one who let flie at him divers odious and reprochfull words: Speake on good fellow (quoth he) out with it hardly and spare not, vomit up all and leave nothing behinde, if haply thou canst rid and purge thy heart of all the wicked venim wherewith thouseemest to swell. Some time after, when he was dead, there arose variance betweene the allies of Sparta as touching certaine matters; and for to know the truth and fettle all causes among them, Agesilaus went to Lysanders house, for to search certaine papers that might give light and evidence to the thing in controversie; and among other writings he channeed to 50 light upon an oration or pamphlet penned by him as touching policie & the State; wherein he feemed to perswade the Spartans to take the roialtie and regall dignitic from the houses of the Eurytionida and Agiada, and to bring it to a free election of the citizens, that they might chuse for their kings out of all the citie those who were approoved and knowen for the woorthieft men, and not to be obliged for to take and admit of necessitie one of Hercules line; so as the crowne and regall state might be conferred as a reward and honous upon him who in venue resembled Hercules most, considering that it was by the meanes thereof, that unto him were affigued the honors due unto the gods; now was Agefilians fully bent to have published this oration before all the citizens, to the end that they might take knowledge how Lyfander was another kind of man than he had beene taken for, and withall to traduce those that were his friends and bring them into obloquie, suspicion, and trouble: but by report Lacratidas the principall man, and prefident of the Ephori, fearing left if this oration were once divulged & openly read, ir might take effect, and perswade that indeed which it pretended; staied Agesslaus and kept him from doing fo, faying: That he should not now rake Lyfander out of his grave, but rather enterre and burie the oration together with him, fo wittily and artificially composed it was, and to fo effectuall to perfwade. Certaine gentlemen there were of the citie, who during his life were futers to his daughters in mariage; but after his death when his estate was known to be but poore, they defilted and cast them off, whereupon the Ephori condemned them in great fines, for that they made court unto them, folong as they effected him wealthy; but afterwards when they found by his poore estate that he was a righteous and just man, they made no more reckoning of his daughters but disdained them.

NAMERTES being fent as embaffadour into a forren countrey, there chanced to be one of those parts who faid unto him: That he held and reputed him for an happie man, because he had fo many friends; unto whom he replied and asked: Whether he knew the true proofe whereby a man might be affured that he had many friends? the other answered: No, but I pray you 20 tell me: Why then (quoth he)it is * advertitie.

NICANDER, when one brought him, word that the Argives spake ill of him: It makes no ince matter (quoth he) are they not fufficiently chaftifed and punished for railing upon good men? One asked of him wherefore the Lacedæmonians wore their haire long of their heads, & fuffred likewisetheir beards to grow side; unto whom he answered: Because a mans owne proper ornament is of all other the fairest, and costeth least. A certaine Athenian being in communication with him, cast out this word: All you Lacedæmonians (N icander) love your case well, and are idle: You fay true indeed (quoth he) but we buffe not our felves as you doe in every trifling Panthoidas, being fent in embassage into Asa, was shewed by the people of those parts 30 a certaine strong citie well fortified with high and goodly wals: Now by the gods (quoth he) my friends, this seemes to be a trim cloister to mue up women in. In the schoole of Academie the philosophers discoursed and disputed as touching many good themes, and after they had made an end, they faid unto him: Now good fir o Panthoidas, how like you these discourses? What should I thinke of them else (quoth he) but that they are goodly and honest in shew, but furely profitable they are not, nor edific at all, so long as your selves doe not live accordingly.

PAUSANIAS the sonne of Cleombrotus, when the inhabitants of the ifle Delos were at debate, and pleaded for the proprietie of the faid ifle against the Athenians, alleaging for themfelvesthat by an old law (time out of minde) observed among them, there might none of their women beare children within the faid island, nor any of their dead be buried there: How then 40 (quoth he) can this ifle be yours, if none of you were ever borne or buried there? When certaine exiled persons from Athens sollicited him to leade his armic against the Athenians, and for to provoke him rather thereto, faid: That they were the onely men who hiffed and whiftled at the naming of him, when he was declared victor in the folernnitie of the Olympick games: But what thinke you (quoth he) will they doe when we have wrought them fome firewd turne, fince they sticke not to hiffe at us being their benefactors? Another asked of him, wherefore the Lacedæmonians had enfranchized the poet Tyrtem their denizen? Because (quoth he) we never would be thought to have a stranger or alien our leader and governour. There was a very weak and feeble man of bodie who nevertheleffe feemed very carneft and inflant to make warre upon the enemies, and to give them battell both on sea and land: Will you (quoth he) strip your 50 felfe out of your clothes; that we may fee what a goodly man of perfon you are, to moove and perswade us for to fight? Some there were who seeing the spoiles that were taken from the dead bodies of the Barbarians after they were flaine in the field, marveiled much at their fumptuous and costly clothes: It had been better (quoth he) that themselves had beene of more valour, and their habilements of leffe valew. After the victorie which the Greeks wan of the Perfians before the citie Platea, he commaunded those about him to serve him up to the table that supper which the Persians had provided for themselves, which being woonderfull excessive and su-Perfluous: Now Par-die (quoth he) the Perflans are great gourmaunders and greedy gluttons, PAUSANIAS the sonne of Plistonax, unto one who asked him, why it was not lawfull in their countrey to alter any of their auncient statutes, made this answer: Because lawes ought to be mistresses of men, and not men masters of the lawes. Being exiled from Sparta, and making his abode within the citie Tegea, he highly praised the Lacedæmonians; one of the standers by faid unto him: And why then flaied nor you at Sparta, if there be fo good men there? why I fav fled you from thence? Because (quoth he) physicians doe not use to keepe where folke be found and whole, but where they are ficke and difeased. One came to him and said: How shall we be able to defait & conquer the Thracians? Mary (quoth he)if we chuse the valiantest man forour 10 captaine, A certaine Physician advised & looked upon him very wistly, & after he had well confidered his person, faid: Thou ailest nothing, neither is there any evil in thee: I thinke so (quoth he)because I use none of thy counsell & physick. His friends reprooved him for speaking illofa physician, of whom he had no proofe nor experience, and at whose hands he had received no harme: True indeed (quoth he) I have made no triall of him; for if I had, furely I should not have bene a lives-man at this day. When a Phylician faid unto him: You are now become old fir: Thou failt trueth (quoth he) because I have not enterteined thee for to minister physickeun. to me. He was wont also to say: That he was the best Physician, who would not let his patients rot above ground, but dispatch them at once, and fend them quickly to their graves.

PAEDARETUS, when one faid unto him: There is a great number of our enemies: Then 20 (quoth he) shall we win greater honour, for kill we may the more of them. Seeing one whoby nature was a very dastard and coward, howbeit, commended otherwise by his fellow-citizens for his modestic and mildnesse: I would not have men (quoth he) praised for being like women, nor women for refembling men, unlesse peradventure a woman be driven upon someoccasion of extremitic to play theman. Having the repulse upon a time, when hee should have bene chosen into the counsell of the three hundred, which was the most honourable degree of State in all the citie, he departed from the affembly all jocund, mery and fmiling; and when the Ephori called him backe againe, and demanded of him why he laughed ? Because (quoth he) I joy in the behalfe of the citic, that it hath in it three hundred better and more sufficient citizens than my felfe. PLISTARCHUS the foune of Leonidas, when one enquired of him the cause why they caried not the denomination of their families from the names of their first kings, but of the later? Be-*Some reade cause (quoth he) those in the olde time *chose rather to be leaders than kings; but their sucthus: Were ceffors not. There was a certeine advocate at the barre, who in pleading for his client, was full of his jefts and frumps, never ceafing to scoffe and move laughter: My friend (quoth he unto him) do you not confider and regard, that in feeming to make others for to laugh, you will cause your felle to be ridiculous and a laughing stocke? even as those who by wrestling of the become good wreftlers? Report there was made unto him one day of a certeine foule-tongued fellow, who wfed to flander and back-bite all men, and yet spake all good of him: I wonder much (quothhe) if no man tolde him that I was dead; for furely he cannot for his life affoord any man living one 40 good word.

PLISTONAX the sonne of Pausanius, when a certeine Athenian oratour called the Lacedzmonians, unlettered and ignorant persons: Thou saiest true (quoth he) for we alone of all other Greeks, are the men who have learned no naughtinesse of you.

POLYDORUS the sonne of Alcamenes, faid unto one who ordinarily did nothing elsbut menace his enemies: Doest not thou perceive how thou spendest the most part of thy revenge in these threats? He led upon a time the army from Lacedamon against the citie of Messen ; and one demanded of him, whether his heart would ferve to fight against brethren? No (quothhe) but I can finde in mine heart to march into that inheritance which is not yet fet out and parted by lots. The Argives, after the discomfiture of their three hundred men who fought against so many of the Lacedæmonians, were defaited a fecond time, all in a ranged battell; by reason whereof, the allies and confederates of the Lacedamonians were earnest with Polydorum notto let slip so good an opportunitie, but to follow the traine of victory, and to go directly to the oppugnation of their city walles, and to win it by force; which he might effect right eafily, confidering that all the men were killed up in the field, and none but women left alive within, to defend the citie; unto whom he answered: I am well appaied, and take this for my great honour and glory, that I have vanquished mine enemies in battell, fighting on even-hand so many to so many; but being to determine the quarrell by dint of fword for our confines onely, and having exploited that, to proceed forward, and cover to affault and winner their city, I holde it not to be just and equall; for come I am to recover those lands of ours which they occupied, and not to feize upon their home-stalles. Being demanded why the Lacedannonians exposed themselves fo manfully to the hazzard of warre ? It is (quoth he)because they have learned to reverence, and not to feare their rulers and captaines.

POLYCRATIDAS being fent with others, in ambassage to the lieutenants of the king of Per fu, when they demanded of him & the rest, whether they were come of their own proper motion or fent by commission from the State ? If we speed of that (quoth he) which we demand, to then are we come in the behalfe of the common weale; but if we miffe, we come of our owne

PHOEBIDAS immediatly before the battell of Leuctres, when some gave our, and said: This day will trie and shew who is a good man: Such a day (quoth hee) is much worth in deed, if it be able to thew a good man.

Sous, as it is reported (being upon a time straightly besieged by the Clitorians, in a place which was very rough and without water) made offer to render into their hands all those lands which he had conquered from them, in case that he and all his company might drinke at a certeine fountaine which was neere at hand: the Clitorians accorded thereto, and this covenant was concluded and confirmed by oath betweene them: fo hee affembled all his men together, 20 and declared unto them: That if there were any amongst them would abstein from drinke, he would refigne up into his hands all his fovereigne power and rotaltie; but there was not one of all his troupe who could conteine and forbeare, fo exceeding thirfly they were all; but everie mandrunke heartily, himselfe onely excepted, who went last downe to the spring, where he did nothing els but coole and befprinckle his body without, in the presence of his very enemies, not taking one drop inwardly: by which evafion, he would not afterwards yeeld up the forefaid lands, but alledged that they had not all drunke.

TELECRUS when one came unto him & faid: That his owne father gave him alwaies hard words; made him this answer: Surely, if there were not cause to use such speeches, he would never speake so. His brother also was discontented, and complained in this wife; The citizens do 30 not beare mee fuch favour and kindnesse as they shewin your behalfe; notwithstanding we are the sonnes of one father and mother; but they misuse me most injuriously: The reason is (quoth he) because you know not how to put up a wrong as I doc. Being demaunded why the custome was in their country, that young men should rise up from their places where they were fet, and do reverence unto their elders: It is (quoth he) to this end, that in doing this honor unto those, who nothing belonged unto them, they might learne so much the more to honour their parents. Unto another that asked him of what wealth he was, and how much goods he had? he answered: I have no more than will suffice, CHARILLUS being asked the question why Lycurgus had given them fo few lawes? Because (quoth he) they have no need at all of many lawes who speake but little. Another demanded 40 of him the cause, why at Sparta they suffered to goe foorth into publick place, virgins with their faces open, but wives vailed and covered: For that (quoth he) maidens might finde them out husbands to be wedded unto, and wives keepe those whom they have maried already. One of the flaves(called Hotes) behaved himfelfe vpon a time over boldly and malapertly with him 3 unto whom he faid: Were I not angrie, I would kill thee at my foot. One asked him what kind of government he efteemed best? Even that (quoth he) wherein most men, in managing of publicke affaires without quarrels and fedition, strive a vie who shall be most vertuous. And unto another who would needs know the reason, why at Sparra the images and statues of the gods were made in armor ? he shaped this answer: To the end that the reproches which are sastined uponmen for cowardife, might not take hold of them; also that young men should never with-50 out their armes make their praiers unto the gods.

The Samiens had sent certaine embassadors unto Sparta, who after audience given, were very long and somewhat tedious in their orations; but when they had found the way to make an end, of Spatiants THE LORDS OF SPARTA made them this answer; The beginning of your speech we have and Laconson, torgotten, and we conceived not the rest because the beginning was out of our remembrance, whise names The Thebanes upon a time had contested bravely, and contradicted them stoutly in certaine profid. points in question, unto whom they answered thus: Either lesse hearts, or more puissance. There was one asked a Lacedæmonian upon a time why he let his beard growfo long? Because (quoth he) whenfover I fee my hoary and grey haires, I might be put in minde to doe nothing unbesceming them. When another highly praised certains men for most valiant : a Lacedae. monian heard him and faid: Oh, fuch were formetime at Great Troy. Another of them heating it spoken, that in certaine cities men were forced to drink after supper: And doe they not (quoth he)compell them also to eate? The poet Pindarus in one of his canticles nameth the cine of Athens the prop of al Greece: The wil Greece quickly come tumbling down(quoth a Laconian) if it beare but upon so sleight a pillar. Another beheld a painted table, wher in was the pour tradure of the Lacedemonians, how they were killed by the Athenians, and when one that flood by faid; Now furely these Athenias be valiant men: Yea mary (quoth he) in a picture. There was one see med to take pleasure in hearing certaine opprobrious and flanderous words untruely given out 10 against a Laconian, & to believe the same; but the partie thus misuled said : Cease to lend your care against me. Another when he was punished, went crying; If I have don amisse it was against my wil: Why then (answered a Laconian) let it be against thy wil also that thou art purithed Another feeing men going forth of the countrey, fet at their eafe within coches: (God forbid (quoth he) that I flould fit there where I can not tife up to doe my dutie unto him that is elder than my felfe. Certaine Chians there were, who being come to fee the citie of Sparta, channeed to be well whittled and starke drunke, who after supper went to see also the consistorie of the Ephoni, where they cast up their gorges, yea and that which more is, both vomited and discharged their guts, even upon the very chaires where the Ephori was wont to fit: the morrow after, the Lace. damonians made great fearch and diligent enquirie at the first, who they were that thus had 20 plaid the flovens and beafts, and namely whether they were any of their owne citie or no ; but when they understood that they were these strangers and travellers from Chios, they made open proclamation with found of trumpet; That they gave the Chians leave thus filthily to abuse themselves. Another Laconian seeing hard almonds sold at the double price: What (quotihe) are stones so geason heere? Another having plucked all the feathers off from a nightingale, and feeing what a little body it had: Surely (quoth he) thou art all voice and nothing elfe. There was likewife a Lacedæmonian, who feeing the cynick philosopher Diogenes in the mids of winter when it was extreme cold, embrasing and clipping a brasen statue very devoutly, asked him if he chilled not for cold? and when the other answered, No; Why then (quoth he) what great matter doe you? A certaine Laconian reproched upon a time one borne in Metapontium, fay-30 ing; They were all cowards and false-hearted like women: If it be so (quoth the Metapontine) how is it that wee hold fo much of other mens lands as wee doe? Why then (replied the Laconian) I fee that you are not cowards onely, but unjust also. A traveller being come to Sparia for to fee the citie, flood upright a long while upon one foote onely, and faid unto a Laconian I doe not thinke thou can't ftand to long of one leg as I do: Not I indeed (quoth the other) but there is not a goofe but can do as much. There was one vaunted greatly what a Rhetorician he was, and namely that he was able to periwade what he would; Now by Caftor and Pollux I fweate (quoth a Laconian) there never was, nor ever will be any arte indeed without verity. A certaine Argive boafted much, that there were in their citie many graves & tombes of the Lacedamonians: And contrariwife (quoth a Laconian) there is not among us one sepulcher of the Argives 40 giving him thus much to understand, that the Lacedamonians had many times entred with a puillant armie into the countrey of Argos, but the Argives never into the territoric of Sparta. A Laconian being taken prisoner in warre (when hee should bee sold in port sale, as the criet began with a loud voice to pronounce: Who will buy a Laconian, who) put his hand to the criers mouth and faid: Cry for Gods fake who wil buy aprisoner? One of those mercenary soldiers whom king Lyfimachus waged, being demanded of him this question; Art thou one of these Lacedæmonian Ilots? Why, thinke you (quoth the other) that a Lacedæmonian will deigne to come and serve for four obols by the day? After that the Thebans had defaited the Lacedamonians at the battell of Leuctres; they invaded the countrey of Laconia, so farre as to the verie river Eurotas; and one of them in boasting & glorious maner, began to say; And wherebe now 50 these brave Laconians? what is become of them? a Laconian who was a captive among them, straight waies made this answer: They are no wherenow indeed, for if they were, you would never have come thus farre as you doe. At what time as the Athenians delivered up their owne claims are the state of the sta tie into the hands of the Lacedamonians, for to be at their discretion, they requested that at leastwise they would leave them the isle Samos: unto whom the Laconians made this answer: When you are not mafters of your owne, doe you demand that which is other mens: hereupon arose the common proverbe throughout all Greece:

Who cannot that which was his owne fave, The Isle of Samos would yet faine have.

The Lacedæmonians forced upon a time a certaine citie, and wan it by affault; which the Ephori being advertised of, said thus: Now is the exercise of our yoong men cleane gone, now shall they have no more concurrents to keepe them occupied. When one of their kings made promife unto them for to rafe another citie and destroy it utterly (if they so would) which oftentimes before had put those of Lacedamon to much trouble; the faid Ephori would not permit him, faying thus unto him: Doe not emolish and take away quite the whetstone that giveth an edge to the harts of our youth. The fame Ephori would never allow that there should be to any professed masters, to teach their yong men for to wrestle and exercise other seats of activitie: To this end (fay they) that there might bee jealoufic and emulation among them, not in artificiall flight, but in force and vertue. And therefore when one demaunded of Lylander, how Charon had in wreftling overcome him and laid him along on the plaine ground: Even by flight and cunning (quoth he) and not by pure strength. Philip king of Macedonia, before he made entrie into their country, wrote unto them to this effect: Whether they had rather that he entred as a friend, or as an enemie: unto whom they returned this answer; Neither one nor the other. When they had fent an embaffador to Demetrius the fonne of Antigonus, having intelligence that the faid embaffadour in parle with him, eftfoones gave him the name of King, they condemned him to pay a fine when he was returned home; notwithstanding that hee 20 brought as a present and gratuitie from the said Demetrius, in time of extreme famine, a certain measure of corne called Medimnus, for every poll throughout the whole citie. It hapned that a leud and wicked man delivered in a certaine confultation very good counfell: this advice of his they approoved right well, howbeit receive it they would not comming out of his mouth, but caufed it to be pronounced by another who wasknowen to be a man of good life. Two brethren there were at variance, and in fute of law together; the Ephori fet a good fine upon their fathers head, for that he neglected his fonnes, and fuffred them to maintaine quarrell and debate one against another. A certaine musician who was a stranger and a traveller, they likewise condemned to pay a fumme of money, for that he strake the strings of his harpe with his fingers. Two boies fought together, and one gave the other a mortall wound with a fickle or reaping hooke; 20 & when the boy that was hurt lay at the point of death, & was ready to yeeld up the ghost, other companions of his promifed to be revenged for his death, and to kill the other, who thus deadly had wounded him: Doe not fo I befeech you (quoth he) as you love the gods, for that were injuffice; and even I my felfe had done as much for him, if I had beene ought, and could have raught him first. There was another yong lad, unto whom certaine mates and fellows of his (in that scalen wherin your lads were permitted freely to filtch whatsoever they could handsomely come by, but reputed it was a shamefull and infamous thing for them to be surprized and taken in the maner) brought a yong cub or little foxe to keepe alive, which they had ftollen: those who had loft the faid cub came to make fearch; now had this lad hidden it close under his clothes, & the unhappie beaft being angred, gnawed & bit him in the flanke as far as to his very bowels, 40 which he endured resolutely, and never quetched at it, for feare he should be discovered : but after all others were gone and the fearch past, when his companions saw what a shrewd turne the curft cub had done him; they chid him for it, faying: That it had been far better to have brought forth the cub and shewed him, rather than to hide him thus with danger of death: Nay Iwis (quoth he) for I had rather die with all the dolorous torments in the world, than for to fave my life shamefully to be detected so, for want of a good heart. Some there were who encountred certaine Laconians upon the way in the countrey, unto whom they faid: Happie are you that can come now this way, for the theeves are but newly gone from hence: Nay for footh (by god Mars we sweare) we are never the happier therefore; but they rather, because they are not fallen into our hands. One demaunded of a Laconian upon a time, what he knew and was skilfull in? 50 Mary in this, to be free. A yoong lad of Sparta being taken prisoner by King Antigonus, and fold among other captives, obeied him who had bought him in all things that he thought meet for to be done by a freeman; but when he commatunded to bring him an urinall or chamberpot to piffe in; he would not endure that indignitie, but faid: Fetch it your selfe for me, I am no servant for you in such ministeries: now when his master urged him thereto and pressed hard upon him, heeran up to the ridge or roofe of the house, and said : You shall see what an one you have bought; and with that cast himselfe downe with his headforward, and brake his owne necke. Another there was to be fold; and when the partie who was about him, faid thus: Wilt thou be good and profitable if I doe buy thee? Yea that I will (quoth he) though you neverbuy me. Another there was likewise upon sale in open market, and when the crier proclaimed aloud : Here is a flave, who buies him, who? A shame take thee (quoth he) couldst not thou fay, a captive or prisoner, but a slave. A Laconian had for the badge or ensigne of his bucklera fliepainted, and the fame no bigger than one is naturally; whereupon fome mocked him and faid: That he had mad choise of this ensigne, because he would not be knowen by it: Nay rather (quoth he) I did it, because I would be the better marked : for I meane to approach mine enemies fo neere, that they may fee how great or little my cognifance is. Another there was, who when there was tendered unto him at the end of a banquet, the harpe to play upon according to the 10 custome of Greece, refused it and said: The Laconians have not yet learned to play the sooles. One asked a Spartan once, if the way that led to Sparta, were fafe or no? but he answered thus: *Otherwife Even according as a man doth goe downe thither : for * they who goe thither as lions, bee thus: We go hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their bor-forthee hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we have shade of the shade of the shade of their bor-series and the shade of the shade hons, but roughs. In wreflling it chanced that a Laconian was caught hold on by the necke, and notwithhires we hant standing that he strove what he could to make the other leave his hold; yet hee forced him and in their harmade him ftoupe groveling downeward to the ground: the Laconian feeing himfelfe feeblein the reines of the backe, and at the point to be laide along, bit the others arme who held him fo hard, whereupon hee began to crie: What thou Laconian, doeft thou bite like women? No (quoth he) but I bite as lions use to do. A certaine Laconian who was maimed and lame of his 20 legge, went to warfare, whereupon fome mocked him; but hee faid unto them: It is not for those to goe into the warres who are good of foot-manship and can runne away apaces but such as are able to make good their ground and keepe well their ranke. Another Laconian being thor thorow the body with an arrow, when he was at the point to yeeld up his vitall breath, faid thus: It never grieves me to leefe my life, but to die by the hand of an effeminate archer, before I came to hand-strokes, that is it that troublethme. Another being come to an hostelicor inne to be lodged in, gave his hofte that kept the inne, a piece of fleth to dreffe for his supper; but hee called for cheese besides and oyle: And what needes that (quoth the Laconian) if had cheefe, do you thinke that I would desire to have any viands more? Another hearing the marchant named Lampis borne in Aegina, highly praifed and esteemed happie, for that he was 30 exceeding rich, and had many great thips going at fea: I never (quoth hee) make reckoning of that felicitie, which hangeth by ropes and cords. Another likewife answered unto one who faid unto him: Thou lieft Laconian: And why not (quoth he) wee are free, as for others that happen to speake untruths, they are wel punish for it and cricout, alas. There was a Laconian who laboured hard to make a dead body fland upright upon his feet; but when he faw that he could not bring his purpose to effect, do what he could: Now by Jupiter (quoth hee) there wanteth formewhat that should bee within. Tynnichus the Laconian, when his sonne Thrasphalus was flaine in the warre, tooke his death verie well and like a man, whereupon was this Epigram

> Thy body was upon the sheild ô Thrafybulus brought All breathlesse to the armed troup, from place where thou hadft fought: Seven deadly wounds at Argives hands thou didle receive in fight, And on the forepart of thy corps, thou hewa ft them all in fight. Thy fatherold Sir Tynnichus it tooke with blood beraid. And putting it in funerall fire, with good cheere thus he faid: Let cowards weepe and waile thy death; but I thy father kinde, Will shedno teares, nor semblance make of lad and grieved minde: But thee enterre (my sonne) as doth

The mafter of the baines where Alsibiades the Athenian was woont to bathe and wash himfelfe, powred great store of water upon his bodie more than ordinarily upon others; a Laconian being then by faid : It feemeth that he is not cleane and neat, but that he is exceeding fonle and filthie, that he bestoweth so much water upon him. When King Philip of Macedonia entred with a maine army into Laconia, at what time as it was thought all the Lacedæmonians were killed up and dead, he said unto one of the Spartanes : O poore Laconians, what will you do now? 10 what elfe (quoth the Laconian) but die valiantly like men; for we alone of all other Greeks have beene taught to live free and not to ferve in bondage under any others. After that King Agis was vanquished; Amipater the king demaunded of the Lacedamonians for hostages, fiftic children of theirs: Eteocles one of the Ephori for the time being, returned this answere: That hee would not deliver into his hands any of their children, for feare they would learne ill manners and lewd conditions; for that they should not be brought up and nourtered in the discipline of their owne countrey, and wanting it they would not proove fo much as good citizens; but if he would be fo cotent, he should receive for pledges women or old men, twice as many. And when hemenaced hereupon and faid: That he would worke him all the despite that possibly he could; they answered all with one accord: If thou impose upon us those conditions which are more 20 grievous than death, we shall die with so much the better will. One old man desirous to see the combatsat the Olympicke games, could not get a roome to fit in, but paffed along by manic places, and no man would make him roome, but fell to laugh and made good game at him, untill be came at length to that quarter of the whole theater, whereas the Lacedamonians were fer; and there all the children, yea and many of the men rose up unto him, and offered him their place: all the whole affembly of the Greekes observed well this behaviour of theirs, and with great applause and clapping of hands, approoved and praised the same: then the good olde father

> Shaking his head with haires all gray, His beardalfe as hoare as they.

30 andweeping withall: Ah, God helpe (quoth he) what a world is this? that Greeks should all of them know well enough what is good and honest; but the Lacedæmonians onely practise it? Some write, that the same hapned in Athens also, at the festival solemnitie called Panathenea; where those of Attien plaied mock-holiday, and made themselves mery with a poore olde man, who they feemed to call unto them (as it were) to give him a place among them; but after hee was come to them, no roome he could have with them, but was well mocked and frumped for his labour: howbeit, when he had paffed along by all the reft, at length he came to a place where certeine ambaffadours of Lacedamon were fet, and they made him roome, and fet him among them: the people there affembled, taking great pleafure to fee this act, clapped their hands aloud, with great acclaination, in token that they approoved it: then one of the Spartans, who 40 there was: By the two twin-gods, Caftor and Pollux (quoth he) I fweare, these Atheniansknow what is good and honest, but they doe not according to their knowledge. A begger upon a time craved almes of a Laconian, who answered him thus. But if I should give thee any thing, thou wouldest make an occupation of it, and beg still so much the more; for verily, who soever he was that first bestowed almes upon thee, was the cause of this villanous life which thou leadest now, and hathmade thee so vagrant and idleas thou art. Another Laconian seeing a collectour going about, and gathering mens devotions for the gods, faid thus: I will now make no more reckoning of the gods, fo long as they be poorer than my felfe. A certeine Spartan having taken an adulterer in bed with his wife, a foule and ilfavoured woman: Wretched man that thou art (quoth he) what necessitie hath driven thee to this? Another having heard an oratour 50 making long periods, and drawing out his fentence in length: Now by Castor and Pollux, what * reserving. a valiantman his here? how he rolleth and roundly turneth his tongue about, and all to no purpole. A traveller passing thorow Laced.emon, marked among other things, what great honour contrary. and reverence young folke did to their elders: I perceive (quoth he) there is no place to Sparta, reade and for an olde man to live in. A Spartan was upon a time asked the question, what maner of Poet 2249, or 220-Tyrtew was? A good Poet beleeve me (quoth he) to *whet and marpen the courages of yoong allow duty, men to warre. Another having very badde and diseased cies, would needs goe to warfare; and gently hanwhen others faid unto him: Wilt thou go indeed in that case as thou art in? what deed thinkest the minde, thou to do there ? Why (quoth he) if I do no other good els, I wil be fure to dull the brightneffe of mine enemies fword. Buris and Spertis, two Lacedamonians, voluntarily departed out of their countrey, and went to Xerxes king of Persia, offering themselves to suffer that paine and punishment, which the Lacedamonians had deferved by the fentence of the oracle of the gods, for kil. ling those heralds which the king had sent unto them; who being come before him, were destrous that he should put them to death in what maner he would himselfe, for to acquit the Lace. damonians: the king wondering at this resolution of theirs, not onely pardoned the fault, but earneftly requested them to stay with him, promising them liberall enterteinment: And how can we (fay they) live here, abandoning our native foile, our lawes, and those kinde of men, for whose lake to die we have so willingly undertaken this long voiage? and when a great captaine to under the king, named Indarnes, intreated them stil very instantly, affuring them upon his word, that they should be kindly used, and in equal degree of credit and honour, with those who were, in highest favour with the king, and most advanced by him, they faid unto him: It feemethunto us fir, that you full little know what is liberty and freedome; for he that wift what a jewell it were, if he be in his right wits, would not change the fame for the whole realme of Persia. A certeine Laconian as he way-fared, came unto a place where there dwelt an olde friend and holt of his, who the first day, of purpose avoided him and was out of the way, because he was not minded to lodge him; but the morrow after, when he had either hired or borowed faire bedding, coverings and carpets, received him very stately; but this Laconian mounting up to his beds, trampled and flamped the faire and rich coverlets under his feet, faying withall: I be fire w thefe fine beds 20 and trim furniture, for they were the cause that yesternight I had not so much as a mat to lie up. on, when I should sleepe and take my rest. Another of them, being arrived at the city of Athens and feeing there the Athenians going up and downe the city, some crying falt-fish to sell, others flesh and fuch like viands; some like publicanes, fitting at the receit of custome, other profes fing the trade of keeping brothel houses, and exercising many such vile and base occupations, effecting nothing at all foule and difhonest: after he was returned home into his owne comtrey, when his neighbours and fellow citizens asked him, what newes at Ahens, and howall things flood there? Paffing well (quoth he) and it is the best place that ever I came in (which he spake by way of mockerie and derifion) every thing there, is good and honest; giving them to understand, that all meanes of gaine and lucre, were held lawful & honest at Athens, and nothing 30 there, was counted villanous and dishonest. Another Laconian being asked a question, answer red; No: and when the party who mooved the question faid: Thou lieft; the Laconian replied againe, and faid: See what a foole thou art, to aske me that which thou knowest well enoughtly selle! Certeine Laconians were sent upon a time, ambassadours to Lygdamis the tyrant, who put them off from day to day, and hasted with them so, as he gave them no audience; at the last, it was tolde them, that hee was at all times weake and ill at ease, and not in case to be conferred with: the ambaffadours thereupon faid unto him who brought this word unto them: Tellhim from us, that we are not come to wreftle, but to parle onely with him. A certeine prieft, inducted a Laconian into the orders and ceremonies of some holy religion; but before that he would fully receive and admit him, he demanded of him what was the most grievous sinne that ever he 40committed, and which lay heaviest upon his conscience? The gods knowthat best (quoththe Laconian: but when the priest pressed hard upon him, and was very importunate, protesting that there was no remedie, but he must needs utter and confesse it: Unto whom (quoth the Laconian) must I tell it, unto you or to the God whom you ferve? Unto God (quorit the other:) Why then turne you behinde me (quoth hee) or retire afide out of hearing. Another Laconian chanced in the night to goe over a church-yard by a tombe or monument, and imagined that he faw a spirit standing before him; whereupon he advanced forward directly upon it with his javelin; and as he ran full upon it, and as he thought, strake thorow it, he said withall: Whither flieft thou from me, ghoft that thou art, now twife dead? Another having vowed to fling himselfe headlong from the high Promontorie Leneas, downe into the sea, mounted up the top 50 thereof, but when hee faw, what an huge downfall it was, he gently came downe again on his feet: now when one twitted and reproched him therefore: I wish not (quoth he) that this you of mine had need of another greater than it. Another Laconian there was, who in a battell and hot medley, being fully minded to kill his enemie who was under him, and to that purpose had lifted up his fwordbacke, to give him a deadly wound; fo foone as ever hee heard the trumpet found the retreat, presently stated his hand, and would no more follow his stroake: now when one after the retreat of ked him, why he flew not his enemie whom he had in his hands? Because (quoth he) it is better to obey a captaine, than to kill an enemie. There was a Laconian tooke the foile in wreftling at the Olympicke games; and when one cried aloud: Thy concurrent is better than thou, Laconian: Better (quoth he?) not fo, but in deed he can skil better than I of supplanting and tripping,

CVSTOMES ORDINANCES AMONG

THE LACED EMONIANS.

HE manner and custome was at Lacedamon, that when they entred into their publicke halles where they tooke their meats and meales together; the eldest man of the whole companie should show the doores unto everic one as they came, and fay unto them: At thefe doores there goeth not forth fo much as one word. The most exquifitedish among them was a messe of broth, which they called Blacke-pottage; infomuch as when that was ferved up to the table, the elder folke would not care for any flesh meats, but leave all them fame for the yoonger fort. And (as it is reported) Denys the

Tyrant of Sicily, for this purpose bought a cooke from Lacedamon, and commaunded him to make him fuch portage and spare for no cost; but after he had a little tafted thereof, he found it so bad that he cast up all that he had taken of it; but his cooke faid unto him: Sir, if you would finde the goodnesse of this broth, you must be exercised first after the 30 Lacedamonian manner, all watred, and be well washed in the river Eurotas. Now after the Laconians have eat & drunk foberly at these ordinaries, they returne home to their houses without torch or any light before them: for it is not lawfull for any man at Laced.emon, to go either from thence or to any place elfe with a light carried before him in the night; because they should bee accustomed to keepe their way, and goe confidently without searc, all night long in the darke without any light at all. To write and reade they learned for necessitie onely; as for all other forrein sciences and literature they banished them quite out of their coasts, like as they did all ftrangers and aliens: and in verie truth their whole studie was to learne how to obey their superiours, to endure patiently all travels, to vanquish in fight, or to die for it in the place. All the yeere long they went in one fingle gaberdine without coat at all under it; and ordinarily they were 40 foule and fullied, as those who used not the stouphes & baines, ne yet announced themselves for the most part. Their boies and yoong men commonly slept together in one dorter, by bands and troupes, upon pallets and courfe beds, which they themselves gathered, breaking and tearing with their owne hands without any edged toole, the heads of canes and reeds which grew along the bankes of the river Eurotas: and in winter time they strewed and mingled among, a certaine kind of Thiftle downe, which they call Lycophanes; for they are of opinion, that such stuffe hath in it (I wot not what) which doth heat them. It was lawfull and permitted among them to love yoong boies for their good minds and vertuous natures; but to abute their persons wantonly and flethly, was reputed a most infamous thing, as if such were lovers of the bodie and not of the minde; in fuch fort, as who foever was accused and attaint thereof, became noted with infamic, 50 and shame followed him wheresoever he went all his life time. The custome was that elder folke when and wherefoever they met with yoonger, should demaund whither and whereabout they went? yea and checke and chide them, if they were to feeke of a good answere or if they went about to devise colourable excuses: and who soever he was that did not reproove him that did a fault in his presence, incurred the same reprehension and blame as he did who transgressed; yea and if he chafed and shewed himselfe discontented, when he was reprooved, he sustained reproch, difgrace and difcredit thereby. If peradventure one were furprifed and taken tardic in fome fault; he must be brought to a certaine altar within the citie, and there forced to go round about it finging a fong, made of purpose for his owne reproofe, and conteining naught elfe, but the blame and accusation of himselfe. Moreover, young folke were not onely to honor their owne fathers, and to be obedient unto them; but also to shew reverence unto all other elder perfons; namely, in yeelding them the better hand, in turning out of their way when they met them, and giving them the wall, in rifing up from their feats before them when they came in place, and in standing still when they passed by: and therefore everie man had a certaine hand of government, and dispose, not onely (as in other cities) over their owne children, their proper fervants and goods; but also they had a regard of their neighbours children, servants and goods, as wel as if they had beene their owne: they made use also of them as of things common. to the end, that to each one everie thing might be (as it were) his owne in proprietic. Where. upon, if it fortuned that a child having beene chastisfed by another man, went to complaine therof to his owne father; it was a shame for the faid father, if he gave him not his payment againe: for by the ordinarie course of discipline in that countrey, they were affored, that their neighbors would impose nothing upon their children, but that which was good and honest. Young lads were used to filtch and steale whatsoever they could come by for their food and victuals; yea and they learned from their verie infancie, to forelay and lie pretily in ambush for to surprise those who were affecte, & flood not well upon their guards: but fay that one were taken in the maner when he stealeth; this was his punishment, namely, to be whipped and to fast from meat; exprefly therefore and of very purpose they were allowed verie little to eate, to the end that they might be driven upon verie extreame necessitie to make shifts and expose themselves ventu- 20 roully into any danger, yea and to devife alwaies fome cunning cast or other to steale more clearly: but generally the reason and effect of this their straight diet was, that they should long before accustome their bodies never to be full, but able to endure hunger; for that in deed they were of opinion, that they should be the meeter for fouldiarie, if they could take paines and travell without food; yea and that it was a good meanes to be more continent, fober, and thriftie, if they were taught & inured to continue along time with smal cost & expense: to be briefe, perfinaded they were: That to abstaine eating of flesh or fish dressed in the kitchin, or to feed savorly of bread or any other viands that came next to hand, made mens bodies more healthy, & caused them to burnish and growup; for that the naturall spirits not pressed nor over-charged with a great quantitie of meat, and to by that meanes not kept and depressed downeward, but dispersed 30 and spread in largenesse and breadth, gave libertie for the bodies to shoot up, waxe tall, and perfonable; yea and made them more faire and beautifull; for that the habitudes and complexions which be flender, lanke and emptie, are more obsequent unto that naturall vertue and facultie which giveth forme and fathion to the limmes; whereas those who be corpulent, groffe, ful, and given to much feeding, by reason of weight and heavines resist the same. They set their minds alfo to compose and make proper ditties and ballads, yea, and no lesse studious are they to sing the fame; having alwaies in these their compositions, a certaine pricke or sting (as it were) to stir up and provoke their courage and stomacke, to enspire also into the hearts of the hearers a condiderate refolution, and an ardent zeale and affection to doe some brave deed: the ditties were plaine, simple, and without all affectation; containing in manner nothing else, but the praises of 40 those who had lived vertuously, and died valiantly in the warres for the defense of Sparta, as being of all others most happie; as also the blame and reproch of such as for cowardise and faintheart were affraid to die, whom they accounted to live a wretched and miserable life. Moreover they stood much upon promises of suture prowesse or vanteries of present valour, according to the diversitie of their ages who chanted the said songs; for alwaies in their solemne and publike feafts, three quiers or dances there were: one of old folke, and the foreburthen of their canticle was this:

The time was when we gallant weare, Youthfull and hardy,void of feare.

Next to it came in place a daunce of men in their best age and full strength, who answered them 50 in this wife:

But we are come to proofe, and now at beft;
Try who that lift, to fight we are now preft.
And a third followed after of children who chaunted thus:
And we one day shall be both tall and strong,
Surpasing far, if that we live so long.
Now their we have seen and are the second of the

Now their very notes and tunes to the measures and numbers whereto they daunced and mar-

chedin battell against their enemies after the found of the flute, were appropriate and fitted to incite their hearts to valour, confident securitie, and contempt of death: for Lyeurgus did study and endevor to joyne the exercise & practise of militarie discipline with the pleasure of mutick, to the end, that war like and vehement motions being mingled and delaied with sweet melodie, might be tempered with a delectable accord and harmonie: and therefore in battels before the charge and first shock of the conslict, their king was woont to factifice unto the Muses, for this entent, that the foldiers in fight might have the grace to performe some glorious and memorable exploits. But if any man paffed one point beyond this ancient muficke, they would not endure him, infomuch as the Ephori fet a fine upon the head of Terpander (though otherwise he lo-10 ved antiquitie well enough, and was the best harper in his time, yea & tooke greatest delight to praife the heroick acts of the renowmed woorthies in times past) and more than that; they hung up his harp upon a stake or post, onely because he had set to it one string more than ordinarie, whereby he might varie his voice the better with more fundry notes; for they allowed no fongs not fonets but fuch as were plaine and fimple; and when Timotheus at the feast Carneia plaied upon the harpe for to winne the prize; one of the Ephori taking a skeine or knife in his hand, aiked him, on whether fide, either above or beneath, he would rather have him to cut a two the ftrings which were more than feven Moreover Lyeurgue tooke from them al vaine & superstitious feare as touching sepulchers, permitting them to burie their dead within the cirie, and to reare their mounments and tombs round about the temples of their gods: he cut off likewife 20 all pollutions of mortuaries, and would not give them leave to enterre any thing with the corps, but onely to enwrap the fame within a winding sheet of red cloth, together with olive leaves frewed among, and the fame indifferently to all bodies, no more to one than another: femblably he put downe all epitaphes and superfcriptions upon graves, unlesse it were for such as lost their lives in battell; forbidding all mourning and dolefull lamentations. Furthermore it was unlawfull for them to make voiages into strange countries, for feare they should learne forrein fashions and uncivill maners, favouring of no good bringing up; and for the same reason, Lycurgus banished aliens out of the citie, lest if they should thither refort, by reason of their confluence, they might teach and shew the citizens their vices. And as for citizens borne, any of them would not fuffer their children to be brought up according to the discipline and institu-30 tion of the citie, they might not enjoy the rights and privileges of free burgeffic. Some fay also that Lyeurgus ordained; If a very alien would yeeld to the observation of his discipline, and be ranged under the policie of the State, he might enjoy one of those portions which from the beginning was fet out and appointed; but he was not allowed to fell the same. The maner and cu-Home was in Lacedemen, to make use of their neighbours servants, even as well as of their owne, whenfoever they had any bufineffe or occasion to employ them; as also to make bold with their horfes and hounds, unleffe the owners themselves and masters had present need of them. In the countrey also and territoric of Laconia, if they stood in need of any thing that was in their neighbours house, they would goe boldly and aske no leave, to their cupboords, presses, coffers, and fuch places where the thing was, make no more adoo but open them, take out and carie away 40 what feeter they thought good; fo they made fast and shut againe the roome out of which they had taken ought. To warfare they went in red liveries, both for that they thought this colour more decent for a man, as also because it resembled bloud, it strucke the greater search into those who were not used thereto; besides, there was good use and profit thereof in this respect, that if any of them happied to be wounded, the enemie could not for perceive it, because that colour looked to like unto bloud. When foever they had vanquished their enemies by some stratagem that their captaines used, their maner was to facrifice an oxe unto Mars; but if they got a victorie by fine force & open manhood, they facrificed a cock; by which meanes, they occasioned their leaders to be not onely valiant, but also politicke warriors. Among other praiers that they made unto the gods this was ever one: That they might have the power and grace to be are 30 wrongs : but the furrine of all their supplications was this: That the gods would vouch a fe them honour for wel doing, & no more. If hey worthipped the goddeffe Venus in her complet armor, and made all the images of their gods, as well female as male, with launces and javelins in their hands, as if they all had militar and martiall vertue in them. felves, and lay our hands to worke, or elfe not to call upon them. They used to let their children feethe llotes when they were drunk, to keepe them by their example from drinking much wine. They neverknocked and rapped at their neighbours doores, but stood without, and called aloud to to those within. The curry-combes that they occupied were not of iron, but of canes and reeds. They never heard any comedies or tragedies acted, because neither in earness not in game they would not heare those that any wise contradicted the lawes. When Architochus the poet was come to Sparta, they drave him out the very same houre that he came, for that they knew he had made these verses, wherein he delivered: That it was better to sling away weapons than to die in the field:

A foole he is, who trusting in his shield, Doth venture life and limme in bloody field: As for mine owne, I have it slung me fro And left behind in bushes thick that gro.

Others translate it thus.

Some Sai an now, in that my doubtie shield
Doth take great soy, which slying out of field, Though sull against my mind, I slang me fro
And left behind in bushes thicket hat grow.
Although it were right good, yet would not I Presume to sight with it, and so to dy,
Farewell my frield, though thou be lost and gone,
Another day as good I shall buy one.

All their facred and holy ceremonies were common, as well for their daughters as their fonnes, The Ephoricondemned one Siraphidas, to pay a fumme of money, for that he fuffred himselfe to take wrong and abuse at many mens hands. They caused one to be put to death for playing the hypocrite, and wearing fackcloth like a publike penitent, for that the faide fackcloth was purfled with a border of purple. They rebuked and checked a yoong man as hee came from the ordinary place of exercise, for that hee frequented it still, knowing as he did the way to Pytas, where was held the affembly of the States of Greece. They chafed out of the citic a Rhetorician named Cephifophon, because he made his boast, That he could speak if it were 30 a whole day of any theame proposed unto him; for they said: That speech ought to be proportionable to the subject matter. Their children would endure to be lashed & whipped all the day long, yea, and many times even to death, upon the alter of Diana, furnamed Orthia, taking joy and pleafure therein, striving a vie for the victorie who could hold out longest; and looke who was able to abide most beating, he was best esteemed, and caried away the greatest praise: this ftrife& emulation among them was called the Whippado; and once every yeere they observed fuch an exercise. But one of the best, most commendable and blessed things that Lycurgus provided for his citizens; was the plentie & abundance that they had of rest & leisure; for they were not allowed at all to meddle with any mechanicall arte; and to trafficke and negotiate painfully for to gather and heape up goods, was in no wife permitted; for he had fo wrought that si-40 ches among them was neither honored nor defired. The Ilotes were they that ploughed and tilled their ground for them, yeelding them as much as in old time was fet downe and ordeined; and execrable they esteemed it to exact more of any of them, to the end that those llotes for the fweetnesses gaine which they found thereby, might serve them more willingly, and themselves covet to have no more than the old rate. Forbidden likewise were the Lacedæmonians to be malriners, or to fight at fea; yet afterwards for all that, they fought riavall battels, and became lords of the fea; howbeit they foone gave that over, when they once faw that the maners and behavior of their citizens were thereby corrupted and depraved; but they changed afterwards again, and were mutable, as well in this as in all other things: for the first that gathered and hoarded up money for the Lacedæmonians, were condemned to death, by reason that there was an aunci- 50 ent oracle which delivered this answer unto Alcamenes and Theopompus, two of their kings,

Avarice one day (who ever lives to fee).

Of Sparta citie will the raine bees.

And yet Lyfander after he had wonne the citie of Athens, brought into Sparta a great maffeof gold and filver, which the citizens received willingly, and did great honour unto the man him-telfe for his good fervice. True it is, that fo long as the citie of sparta observed the lawes of Lycurgus, and kept the other which it was sworne by, she was a paragon, yea, and the soveraigned.

all Greece, in good government and glorie for the space of 300, yeeres: but when they came once to transgresse the faid lawes and breake their oathes; avarice and covetousnesse crept in among them by little and little, and they with all their puilfance & authoritie decreafed, yea and their allies and confederates heereupon began to be ill affected unto them: and yet being as they were in this declining estate, after that king Philip of Macedonia had woon the battell at Charonea, when all other cities and states of Greece, by a generall confent, and with one accord had chosen him the generall captaine of all the Greeks, as well for land as sea, yea, and after himhis sonne Alexander the Great, upon the destruction of the citie Thebes, onely the Lacedamonians, notwithstanding their citie lay all open, without any wall about it, and themselves to were brought to a very finall number by occasion of their continuall warres, which had wasted and confumed them, whereby they were become very feeble, and by confequence more cafic to be defeated than ever before, yet for that they had retained fill forme little reliques of the government established by Lyeurgus, they would never yeeld to serve under those two mightie monarches, no nor other kings of Macedonia their fucceffors, neither would they be prefent at the generall diets and common affemblies of other states, nor contribute any money with the reff, untill they having utterly cast aside and rejected the lawes of Lyeurgus, they were held under and yoked with the tyranny of their owne citizens; namely when they reteined no part of the aucient discipline, whereby they grew like unto other nations, and utterly lost their old reputation, glory, and libertie of franke speech, so as in the end they were brought into servitude, and even at this day be fubject unto the Romane empire, aswell as other cities and states of Greece.

DAMES.

RGILEONIS the mother of Brasidan; (after that her sonne was slaine, when certaine embassidadors from the citie Amphipolis came to Sparta, and visited her;) demaunded of them, whether her sonne died like a valiant man, and as became a Spartan? now when they praised him exceedially, saying that he was the bravest man in armes in all Lacedamon; the said againe unto them: My sonne was indeed a knight of valour and honour (my good friends;) but Lacedamon hath many others yet more valiant than he was.

Milesian was come to Sparta, for to sollicit Cleomenes to make warre upon the king of Persia, in the desence of the Ionians freedome; and in consideration heereof promised him a good round summe of money; and the more that he contradicted and denied the motion, the more hestill augmented the summe of money which he promised: Father (quoth she) this stranger to heere will corrupt you if you, send him not the sooner out of your house. Also when her father willed hir one day to deliver certaine come winto a man, by way of a reward and recompence, saying withall: For this is he who hath taught me how to make wine good: How now, good father (quoth she) shall there be more wine drunkes shill, considering that they who drinke thereof become more delicate and lesse valorous? When she saw how Aristagoras had one of his men to put on his shoots: Father (quoth she) heere is a stranger that hath no hands. that was betweene him and other yoonkers his companions) was brought home with many a wound, infomuch as no man looked for life; feeing his familiar friends and those of his acquaintance, waile and take on piteoufly: What (quoth she) let be this weeping and lamentation, for now hath he shewed of what bloud he is descended; neither ought wee to crie out and bewaile for the hurts of valiant men, but rather to goe about their cure and salve them, if haply we may save their lives. When a messenger comming out of Candia, where he served in the warres, brought newes that the said Acroatum was slaine in fight: Why (quoth she) what to else should he do, being once gone foorth to warre, but either die himselse or else kill his enemies? Yet had I rather heare, and it doth me much more good that he died woorthy my selfe, woorthy his native countrey and his progenitours, than that he should live as long as possible a man could, like acoward and man of no woorth.

DEMETRIA hearing that her fonne prooved a daftard, and indeed not woorthy to be her fonne, fo foone as ever he was returned from the wars, she killed him with her owne hands;

whereupon was made this epigram of her:

By mothers hand was flaine one Demetric,

For that he brake the lawes of chivalrie,

No marvell, she a noble Spattan dame Disclaimed her some, unwoorthy of that name.

Another woman of Lacedamon being given to understand, that her some had abandonedhis ranke, unade him likewise away, as unwoorthy of that countrey wherein he was borne, saying: That he was no some of hers: And thereupon this epigram also was composed of her:

for thee I never gron'd.

Another, hearing that her fonne was faved and had escaped out of the hands of his enemies, wrote thus unto him: There runneth a naughtic rumor of thee; either ftop the course thereof or elfe live not. There was another likewife, whose children had sled out of the battell, and when they came home unto her, the welcomed them in this manner: Whither goe you run-40 ning leawd lozels and cowardly flaves as you are; thinke you to enter hither againe from whence you first came? and therewith plucked up her cloaths, and shewed them her barebelly. Also another clipying her sonne new returned from the wars, and comming toward her: What newes (quoth the) how goeth the world with our countrey and common-wealth? and when he answered. We have lost the field and all our men be slaine; she tooke up an earthen pot let it fly at his head & killed him out-right, faying: And have they fent thee to bring us the newes? There was one brother recounted unto his mother what a noble death his brother died, unto whom his mother answered: And wert not thou ashamed that thou didst not accompanie him in so faire a journey ? Another there was who had fent her fonnes (and five they were in number) to the warres, and the stood waiting at the townes end, about the suburbs and hamlets necreunto 50 them, for to hearken what was the iffue of the battell: and of the first man whom she encountred from the campe, the asked, what newes, and who had the day; hee told her that her fonnes were ilaine all five: Thou leaud variet (quoth fhee) and base slave as thou art, I did not demaund that question of thee; but in what state the affaire of the common-wealth stood: The victoric (quoth he) is ours: Then am I well appaid (faith shee) and contented with the losse of my children. Another there was, unto whom as the buried her fonne flaine in the warres, there came a filly old woman and moaned her, faying: Ah good woman what fortune is this ? Why good (quoth the?) by Castor and Pollux I (weare; for I bare him into this world for nothing elle, but that he should spend his life for Sparta; and loe this is now hapned. A ladie there was of Ionia, who bare herselfeverie proud of a worke in rapistrie which she herselfe had made, most costly and conioully; but a Laconian dame shewed unto her, foure children, all verie well given and honestly brought up : Such as these (quothshe) ought to be the works of a ladie of honour, and herein should a noble woman in deed, make her boast and vaunt herselfe. Another there was, who heard newes, that a fonne of hers behaved himfelfenot well in a flrange countrey where hee was, unto whom the wrote a letter in this wife: There is blowen a bad brute of thee in these parts, either 10 proove it false or else die, I advise thee. Certaine sugitives or exiled persons from Chios, came to Sparia, who accused Padaretus, and laid many crimes to his charge: his mother Teleuria hearing thereof, fent for them to come unto her; at whose mouthes when she heard the severall points of their imputations, and judging in herselfe that hee was in fault, and had done great wrongs, the fent a letter unto him in this forme: Either do better or tarie there still, and never thinke to fave thy felfe here. In like manner another wrote unto her fonne accused of an hainous crime, in these tearmes: My some quit thy selfe of this imputation, or else quit thy life. Auother accompanying a fon of hers upon the way when he went to battell, faid unto him: Sonue remember every foot that thou steppest to vertue and prowesse, and fight like a man. Another whose sonnereturned out of the field wounded in the foot, and complaying unto her of the 20 great paine which he endured: Sonne (quoth she) if thou wouldst remember vertue and valour, thou shouldest never thinke of thy paine. A certaine Lacedæmonian chanced so grievously to be wounded in a skirmith, that he had much adoe to fland upon his legs, fo that he was faine to go with crutches (asit were) upon foure feet; now when he was abalhed to fee fome laugh at him for it, his mother faid: Greater cause thou hast (my sonne) to rejoice for this testimonie of thy valour and proweffe, than to be difmated at their fond and fenflesse laughter. Another woman when the gave unto her fonne a thield, admonished him to use it well, and do his devoir like a man, and these words she used unto him : My sonne either bring this shield home againe, or let it bring thee dead upon it. Another likewise giving a targuet to her some when he tooke his leave of her to go to warre, faid unto him: Thy father kept this targuet well from time to 30 time; feethou (for thy part) keepe it as well, or elfe die with it. Another when her fonne found fault with his short sword, faid unto him: Then set foot neerer to thine enemie, A woman hearing that her fonne died valiantly in battell: No marvell (quoth shee) for he was my fonne. Contrariwife, another when the heard that her fonne tooke him to his heeles, and escaped by good footmanship: He was never (quoth she) a fonne of mine. But another hearing that her fonne was flaine fighting in the verie place where his captaine had fet him: Remoove him than (quoth she) from thence, and let his brother step into his place. A Lacedæmonian woman being in a folemne and publicke proceffion, with a chaplet of flowers upon his head, underflood that her sonne had wonne a field, but was so grievously wounded, that ready he was to yeeld up his breath; without putting off her chaplet of flowers from her head, but glorying (as it were) in 40 these newes: Oh my friends (quoth she) how much more glorious and honourable is it for a fouldier to die with victorie in battell, than for a champion to survive after he hath wonne the prize in the Olympicke games. A brother reported unto his fifter, how valiant her fonne died in battell, unto whom the answered againe: Lookehow much I joy & take pleasure to heare this of him; fo much I am displeased and discontented at you, brother, for that you would not beare him companie in fo vertuous a voiage, but tarie behind him. When one fent unto a Lacedaemonian woman to follicit and found her, whether she would confent unto him, she made this answere: When I was a maiden, I learned to obey my father, and so I did evermore; and when I was a wife, I did the the like unto my husband; if then that which he demaundeth of me be ho nest and just, let him acquaint my husband with it first. A poore maiden being asked the questi-50 on what dowrie the would bring her husband? The pudicitie (quoth thee) and honeftie of my countrey. Another Lacedæmonian woman being demaunded, whether the had yet beene with her husband? Not I (quoth shee) but hee hath beene with me. Also another yoong woman chanced fecretly to be deflowed and to leefe her maiden head; now when by fome mishap she fell unto untimely labour, and to flip an abortive fruit; she endured the paines of travell thereto belonging to patiently, without one crie or groane, that neither her father, nor any one about her, perceived any thing at all that the was delivered; for thame and honeflie fighting together, overcame all the vehemencie of her paines. A Lacedæmonian woman being fold in the market for a flave, was asked what the could doe? I can skill (quoth thee) to bee true and faithfull. Another likewife being a captive and demaunded the like question, answered, that she could keepe the house well. Another likewife when she was asked by one whether shee would proove good if he bought her, made answer thus: Yea that I will, although you never buy me. Last of all, a Lacedæmonian woman when she was to be fold in port-sale, and the crier demaunded of her what she had skill in? answered: To be free. Now when he that bought her commaunded her to do some things unbeseeming a free person: You will repent (quoth she) that you envied your selfe so noble a possession; and so she killed herselfe.

THE VERTVOVS DEEDS OF WOMEN.

The Summarie.

Ertue alwaies deserveth praisewheresoever it is sound, but especially when it proceedeth from feeble instruments, and those of small shew; for by that meanes the excellencie thereof is so much better seene : our Author therefore in that regard, hathmade here a collection of histories, relating the woorthy demeanours of many women who have shewed manly courage in sundry dangers; the consideration whereof, is able greatly to move and affect the reader. In the Preface of this discourse after he had refuted the opinion of Thucydides, who would confine women (as it were) into a perpetuall ermitage, he proveth by divers reasons, that vertue being alwaies the selfe-same, notwithstanding that it hathobjects and subjects 20 different, it were meere injurie and too much iniquitie, either to forget or to de spise those women who for their valour have deserved, that their name and example stould continue; to the end that the same might be imitated as occasion requireth in many forts, not onely by other women, but also by the most part of men. Which done, he describes the notable exploits of some in generall: and then he commeth to speake of certeine in particular, noting and observing in them divers graces and commendable parts, but especally an extreame hatred of tyrannie and servitude, an ardene love and assection toward their country, a singular affection to their husbands, rare honestie, pudicitie, chastitie joined with a generous nature, which hath caused them, both so enterprise and also to execute her oique acts, and well deserving that praise, which hash beene preserved entire for such women, after so many yeeres until this day, by the meanes of this present historicall fragment; the which conteineth goodly instru-Etions for men and women of name and marke, to induce them to governe themselves in such fort, that in the mids of the greatest confusions, they might take a good courage, and lay their hands to that which their vocation requireth; and to hold this for certeine, that enterprises lawfull and necessarie, will sooner or later have good iffue, to the shame and ruine of the wicked, but to the repose and quietnesse of all persons, who de sire, seeke, and procure that which is good.

Am not of Threydides minde (dame Clea) touching the vertue of women; for he is of this opinon: That the is the best & most vertuous, of whom there is least speech abroad; as well to her praise as her dispraise; thinking that the name of a woman of honour, ought to be shut up and kept sast within, like as her bodie; that it never may go forth, Gorgius yet (me thinks) was more reasonable, who would have the renowmer and same, but not the sace & visage of a woman, to be knowen unto men: and it seemeth unto me, that it was an excellent law and custome among the Romans, which imported thus much: That women as well as men, after their death might beho-noured publickly at their funerals, with fuch praifes as they had deferved; and therefore immediatly after the decease of the most vertuous ladie Leontis, I discoursed with you at large upon this matter; which discourse (in my conceit) was not without some consolation founded upon reason & Philosophy: and now also (according to your request at that time) I send you in wri-20 ting, the rest of our speech and communication, tending to this point: That the vertue of man and woman is all one and the very fame; which appeareth by the proofe and testimony of many and fundry examples, drawen out of ancient histories, collected by me, not upon any intention toplease the eare; but if the nature of an example be such, as alwaies, to the permassive power that it hath to proove, there is joined also a lively vertue to delight. This treatise of mine reje-Stethnor the grace of that pleasure, which doth second and favourise the efficacie of a proofe; neither is it ashamed to join Graces with Muses, which (as Eurypides faith) is the best conjunction in the world, inducing the minde most easily to give eare and credit unto good reasons, by meanes of the delectation which it there findeth. For if to proove, that it is all one art, to paint and draw the life of women and men, I should produce and bring foorth such pictures of wo-30 men as Apelles, Zeuxis or Nicomachia have left behinde them; hath any man reason to finde fault and to charge me, that I aime and intend to delight the cie and content the minde, rather than to verific my affection? I suppose that no man will so doe : semblably, if otherwise to show, that the art of Poetrie, or skill to represent in verse, all things whatsoever, is the same in women and men, and nothing different one from the other, I should conferre the Odes and verses of Sappho with those of Anacreon; or the oracles penned by the Sibrilles with those which are see downe by Baechis; is there any man that could justly blame such a demonstration, for that it draweth the hearer to beleeve with some pleasure and content? no man (I trow) would ever so fay: and yet there were no better way to know either the refemblance, or the difference in the vertue of man and woman, than in comparing lives with lives, and deeds with deeds; as if wee 40 should lay together the works of some noble feience, and consider them one by another; even folikewise, to see whether the magnificence of queene Semiramis, hath all one forme and figure with that of king Sefoftris; and the wifedome of queene Tanaquil, with that of king Servius; or the magnanimitie of ladie Porcia, with that of Brutes; or of dame Timoclea, with that of Pelopidas; namely, in that quality which is most principall, and wherein lieth the chiefest point and force of these vertues: for vertue admitteth certeine other differences, as proper and particular colours, according to divers natures, and is in some fort conformable to the maners and conditions of those subjects wherein they be, and to the temperatures of their bodies, or to the verice nutriments and divers diets and fashions of their life. For Achilles was after one fort valiant, and Ajax after another; the wildome of uly ses was not like unto Nestors; neither were Cate and A-50 gestilaus just alike; Irene loved not her husband in that maner as Alcestu loved hers; nor Cornelia &Olympias were alike magnanimous; and yet for all that, we fay not, that there be many and diverskinds of fortitude, fundry forts of prudence and wildome, nor different juffices, in regard of the diffimilitude and varietic which arifeth particularly in ech one person, so as the said peculiar differences, do not exclude any one vertue from the proper definition thereof. As for fuch examples as are most divulged and published abroad (of which I presume you have already sufficient knowledge, and firmely remember their historie, by that which you have read in ancient books) I wil passe them over at this present; unlesse haply there be some acts worthy of remembrance, which they were ignorant of, who before our time have written the common histories and vulgar Chronicles. But for that the women in times past, as well in common as particular, have performed many memorable deeds, it will not be amiffe in the first place to set downe briefly what some of them have done in societie and companie together.

THE TROJANE DAMES.

F those Trojanes who escaped after the winning and destruction of Troie the Great, the most part went to seeke their fortune, and by force of tempest (the rather for that they had no skill in navigation, and were not acquainted with the feas) were call upon the coast of Italie, 10 where putting into fuch baies, ports & creeks as they could meet with, in that very place (whence the river Tybris dischargeth it selfe into the sea) with much adoe and great difficultie they landed, and the men went wandring up and downe the countrey, for to fee if they could light upon those that might direct them in their voiage, and give them some light and intelligence of those coasts. Meane while the women communed and devised thus among themselves: That fince they had beene the most fortunate and happie nation in the world, it were better for them to fettle in any one certaine place whatfoever, than still to wander uncertainely upon the seas, and to make that, their countrey and feat of habitation, fince they were not able to recover that native foile which they had loft: to which motion after they had all with one accord agreed. they fet fire on their ships, and the first ring-leader in this action was a Ladie (by report) named 20 Roma; which done, they went farther up into the continent to meet with the men aforefaid, who now by this time were coming apace to the sea for to succour their ships on fire, & searing their furious anger, they fell to embrace and kiffe them very kindly, fome their husbands others their kinsfolk, and by this means appealed their wrath, Hereupon arose that cultom, which continueth at this day among the Romanes, that no men should salute their kinsfolke, and those that be joined in blood to them, by kiffing their lips: for the Trojan men feeing (as it should feeme) in what necessitie they stood, were well enough content; and withal, finding the inhabitants of the sca-coasts courteous, and ready to receive and entertaine them friendly, approoved that which the women had done, and so remained and dwelt in the same part of Italy among the Latines.

THE DAMES OF PHOCIS.

THE woorthy act of the dames of Phoeis, whereof we now meane to make mention, no Historiographer of name hath yet recorded and set downe in writing: howbeit there was never a more memorable deed of vertue wrought by women, and the same testified by the great facrifices, which the Phocians do celebrate even at this day, necre unto the citie Hyampolis, and that according to the ancient decrees of the countrey. Now is the totall historie of this whole action from point to point particularly recorded in the life of Daiphantus; as for that which the faid women did thus stood the case. There was an irreconcilable and mortall warre betweene the Theffalians and those of Phocis, for that the Phocians upon a certaine fore-set day, killed all 40 the magistrates and rulers of the Theffalians, who exercised tyrannie in the cities of Phoeis: and they againe of Thessalia had beaten and bruised to death two hundred and fiftie hostages of the Phocæans, whom they had in custodie; and after that, with all their puissance entred and invaded their countrey by the way of the Locrians; having before hand concluded this resolution in their generall counfell, not to pardon nor spare any one that was of age sufficient to beare armes, and as for their wives and children, to leade them away captives as flaves: whereupon Daiphantus the fonne of Bathyllus, one of the three foveraign governours of Phocus, mooved and perswaded the Phoceans (as many as were of yeeres to fight) for to go forth and encounter the Theffalians; but their wives and children, to affemble all together unto a certaine place in Phoeis, & environe the whole pourprise and precine thereof with a huge quantity of wood, and 50 there to fet certaine guards to watch and ward; whom hee gave in charge, that so some as ever they heard how their countrey-men were defaited, they should set the wood on fire, and burne all the bodies within the compasse thereof: which desseigne when all others had approoved, there was one man among them, flood up and faid: It were just and meet, that they had the confent also of the women as touching this matter; and if they would not approve and allow of this counfell, to leave it unexecuted, and not to force them thereto: this confultation being come to the cares of the faid women, they held a counfell together apart by themselves as touching this entended action, where other refolved to follow the advice of Daiphantus, and that with fo great alacritie and contenument, that they crowned Daiphantus with a chapler of flowers, as having given the best counsell that could be devised for Phoeis. It is reported also, that their verie children fat in counfell hereabout by themselves, and concluded the same: but it fortuned so, that the Phoceans having given the Theffalians battell neere unto a village, called Chone, in the marches or territoric of Hyampolis, defaited them. This resolution of the Phoc wans, was afterwards by the Greekes named Aponan, that is, A desperat desseigne: and in memoriall of the faid victorie, all the people of Phocis to this day do celebrate in Hyampolis, the greatest and most solemne feast that they have to the honour of Diana, and call it Elaphebolia.

THE WOMEN OF CHIOS.

THE men of Chios inhabited sometime the colonie Leuconia, upon such an occasion as this, A gentleman, one of the best houses in Chios, chanced to contract a marriage; and when the bride was to be brought home to his house in a coach, King Hippoclus being a familiar friend unto the bridegroom, & one who was present with others at the espousales and wedding 3 after he had taken his wine wel, being fet upon a merrie pin, and disposed to make sport, leapt up into the coach where the new wedded wife was; not with any entent to offer violence or vilanny, but only to dallic, toy & make pastime in a meriment, as the maner was at such a feast: howbeit 20 the friends of the bridegroome tooke it not fo, but fell upon him and killed him outright in the place: upon which murder there appeared unto those of Chies many evident tokens and signes of Gods anger; yea and when they understood by the oracle of Apollo, that for to appeale their wrath, they should put all those to death who had murdered Hippoelus; they made answere: That they all were guiltie of the fact : and when the god Apollo commanded them, that if they were all tainted with the faid murder, they should all depart out of the citie Chies, they fent away (as manie, as either were parties and principals, or acceffaries and privie to the faid blood-shed; yea, and who foever approoved and praifed the fact, and those were neither few in number, nor men of meane qualitie and power) as far as to Leucoma; which citie the Chians first conquered from the Coroneans, and possessed by the helpe of the Brythreans: but afterwardes when there 30 was warre betweene the faid Chians and the Erythreans (who in those daies were the mightiest people in all Ionia) informuch as the Erythræans came against Lemonia, with a power intending to affault it: the Chians being not able to refift, grew to make a copolition; in which capitalated it was & agreed, that they should quit the city, & depart every person with one coat & cassock only, without taking any thing els with them. The women understanding of this agreement, gave them foule words, & bitterly reproched them, for being fo base minded as to lay off their armor, & thus to go naked thorow the mids of their enimies: but when their husbands alleaged that they had fworn & taken a corporal oth fo to do, they gave them counfel in any wife, not to leave their armes and weapons behind them, but to fay; that a javelin was a coat, and a shield the cassocke of a valiant and hardie man. The Chians perswaded hereunto spake boldly to the Erythræans to 40 that effect, and showed them their armes, infomuch as the Erythræans were affraid to see their resolute boldnesse, and there was not one of them so hardie as to come necre for to empeach them, but were verie well content that they abandoned the place, and were gone in that fort. Thus you may see how these men having learned of their wives to be couragious and consident, faved their honours and their lives. Long after this, the wives of the Chians atchieved an other act nothing inferiour to this in vertue and prowesse. At what time as Philip the sonne of Demetrius, holding their citie befieged, caused this barbarous edict, and proud proclamation to be published: That all the flaves of the citie should rebell against their masters, and come to him: for that he would make them all free, and give them libertie to espouse and marie their mistreffes, even the wives of their former masters. The dames conceived hereof so great choler 50 and indignation in their harts (together with the flaves themselves, who were provoked likewise to anger as well as they, and readie to affift their mistresses) that they tooke heart to mount upon the walles of the citie, and to carrie thither stones, darts and all manner of shot, beseeching their husbands to fight luftily and with good courage, & eftloones admonifhing and encouraging them to quit themselves like men, and do their devoir; which they did forestectually both inword and deed, that in the end they repulled the enemie, and constrained Philip to raise his fiege from before the citie without effecting his purpose, and there was not so much as one flave that revolted from his mafter unto him.

THE WOMEN OF ARGOS.

" He exploit of the Argive dames against Cleomenes king of Lacedemon, in defence of the citie Argos, which they enterprifed under the conduct and by the perswasion of Telefilla the poëtreffe, is not leffe glorious and renowmed, than any action that ever was atchieved by a crew of women. This dame Telefilla (as the fame goeth) was descended of a noble and famous house, howbeit in body she was very weake and sickly; by occasion wherof, she sent out to the oracle for to know how the might recover her health: answer was made, that the shoulde serve, honour and worthip the Muses: the yeelding obedience to this revelation of the god, and giving herfelfe to learne poefie, and likewife vocall muficke, and skill in fong, in fhort time was delivered from her maladie, and became most renowmed and highly esteemed among women for hir poeticall veine, and musicall knowledge in this kind: in processe of time it fortuned that Cleamenes the king of the Spartans, having in a battell flaine a great number indeed of Argives. but not as some fabulous writers have precisely set downe (seven thousand, seven hundred, seven. tie and feven) advanced directly to the citie of Argos, hoping to finde and furprize the fame void of inhabitants: but the women, as many as were of age fufficient (as it were by fome heavenly and divine inflinct) put on a refolute minde, and an extraordinary courage, to doe their best for to beate backe their enemies that they should not enter the citie; and in very truth under the leading of Telefilla, they put on armes, tooke weapon in hand, and mounting up the 20 wals flood round about the battlements thereof, and environed them on every fide, defending the citie right manfully, to the great wonder & admiration of the enemies: thus they gave Cleo. menes the repulle, with the loffe and carvage of a great number of his men. Yea and they chased Democrates another king of Lacedamon out of their citie, as Socrates faith, who had made entrance before, and feifed that quarter which is called Pamphyliacum: when the citie was thus faved by the prowesse of these women, ordeined it was, that as many of them as chaunced in this fervice to be flaine, should be honorably enterred, upon the great causey or high-way called Argeia; and unto them who remained alive, graunted it was for a perpetual monument and memoriall of their proweffe, to dedicate and confecrate one statue unto Mars. This combat and fight (as some have written) was the seventh day, or (as others say) the first of that month 10 which at Argos in old time they called Tetartos, but now Hermew, on which day the Argives do celebrate even in this age, a folemne facrifice and feast which they call Hybriftica (as one would fay) reprochfull and infamous; wherein the custome is, that women went clad in soldiers coates and mantels, but men were arraied and attired in womens peticoates, frocks, and veiles. Now to replenish and repeople the citie againe, for default of men who died in the wars, they did not (as Herodotus writeth) use this pollicie, to marrie their flaves to their widdowes, but they granted free burgeofie of their citie, unto the better fort of men who were their neighbors and borderers, and granted unto them for to affiance and espouse the said widowes: but it should seeme that these wives distained & despised (in some fort) these husbands of theirs, as not comparable to their former; for they made a law, that these wives should have counterfeit beards set to their 40 chins whenfoever they flept and lay with their husbands.

THE PERSIAN WOMEN.

Crew(having caused the Persians to rebel against king Assacs & the Medes) hapned to be discomfitted & vanquished together, with the Persians: now when the Persians fled amaine toward the city, and their enemies followed hard at their heeles, ready to enter pel-mell with the; the women issued out of the gates, met them even before the citie, and plucking up their clothes before, from beneath, to their waste, cried unto them: Whither away, and whither doe you sie, the most beastly cowards that ever were? for run as fast as you will there is no reentrance here for you into that place, out of which you came first into the world: the Persians being ashamed as well to see such a sight, as to heare those words, blamed and rebuked themselves; where upon they turned againe, and made head at their enemies, fought fressly, and put them to slight: from which time forward, there was a law established: That when sever the king returned from some sarre voiage, and entreth into the citie, everie woman should receive of him a piece of gold, and that by the ordinance of king Cyrus, who first enacted it. But it is reported, that king Orbus one of his successors (who being bad enough otherwise) was the most covetous prince that ever raigned over them, turned alwaies out of the way, passed besides the citie, and never would come into it after such a journey; whereby the women alwaies were disappointed of that gramitie and gift which they ought to have had: but king Alexander contrariwise entred the citie twice, and gave to every woman with childe, double so much, that is to say, two such pieces of gold.

THE WOMEN OF GAULE.

Before that the Gaules paffed over the mountaines called Appes, and held that part of Italy which now they doe inhabit; there arofe a great difcord and dangerous fedition among them, which grew in the end to a civill warre: but when both armies flood embattailed and arranged, ready to fight, their wives put themselves in the very mids betweene the armed troupes, tooke the matter of difference and controversie into their hands, brought them to accord a unitite, and judged the quarrell with such indifferent equitie, and so to the contentment of both parts, that there ensued a woonderfull amitie, and reciprocall good will, not onely from citie to citie, but also betweene house and house; informuch that ever after, they continued this custome in all their confulcations, as well of warre as peace, to take the counsell and advice of their wives; yea to compose and pacific all debates and braules with their neighbours and allies, by the mediation of them: and therefore in that composition and accord which they made with Annaball, at what time as he passed through their citie, among other articles this went for one:

That in case the Gaules complained of any wrongs done unto them by the Carthaginians, the Carthaginian captains and governors which were in Spain should be the judges betweene them; but contrartivise, if the Carthaginians pretended that the Gaules had wronged them, the Gaule dames should decide the quarrell.

THE WOMEN OF MELOS.

"He Melians purpofing to fecke for another land to inhabit, more large and fertile than their owne, chose for the captaine and leader of that troupe or colonie which was sent forth, a yoong gentleman of fingular beautie, named Nymphaus; but first they had consulted 30 with the oracle, where they received this answere: That they should take the seas, and faile; and looke in what place foever they happened to leefe their porters and cariers, there they should rest and inhabit: now it happened as the coasted along Caria, and were set aland, their ships were lost in a tempest and perished; and then the inhabitats of the city Cryassa in Caria, (were it that they had pity of their necessitie, or feared their hardinesse and valour) requested them to make their abode with them, and granted them a part of their territorie to holde and occupie: but afterwards the Carians feeing, that in a finall time the Melians mightily increased and waxed great, they complotted and laid ambushes for to murder them al, at a certeine solemne sealt and Supper which they prepared for them: but it fell out so, that a yoong damosell of Caria named Cophene (who fecretly was in love and enamoured upon Nympheus abovefaid, and could not en-40 dure that her love Nympham should so treacherously be murdered) discovered the said plot and intended deffeigne of her countreymen: now when the Cryaffians came to call them to the feast above said, Nymphaus made them this answere: That the custome of the Greeks was not to go unto any great suppers or feasts, unlesse they had their wives with them; which when the Carians heard, they faid: Bring your wives with you and sparenot, they shall be welcome: thus when he had advertised his countreymen the Melians, what had passed betweene him and the Carians, he gave order that they should themselves come unarmed in their plaine apparell, but every one of their wives should bring with them a skeine or dagger under their clothes, and so ech of them fit close unto her husband: now in the mids of supper, when the fignall was given to the Carians for to go in hand with the execution of their defleigne, they Greeks knew thereby incontinently, that the time was now come to execute this feat; and then the women all at once opened their bosoms, and their husbands caught the skeines aforesaid, ran upon the barbarous Carians, and maffacred all in the place, informed as not one of them escaped with life; and thus being mafters of the countrey, they rafed the city, and built another, which they called New Cryaffa: Cophene then was maried to Nymphen, and woon much honour and favor, which the right well had deferved for the great good fervice that the did: but in my conceit, the principall matter in this whole action, and that which is most to be commended, was the filence and secrecie of these dames, that being so many as they were, there was not one whose hart fainted in the execution of this enterprise, nor perforce and for searce against her will, failed in her dutie.

THE TUSCANE WOMEN.

Here were in times past certaine Tyrrhenians or Tuskanes, who seized upon the isles of of Lemnos and Imbros, yea and ravished certaine Athenian wives out of Brauron, and begat children of them; but afterwards, the Athenians chased that generation out of the said isles, as being mungrels and halfe Barbarians, who fortuning to arrive at the cape or head of Tenarus, to the large and for this cause and for this cause and the large and for this cause as to did very good service under the Spartans in their wars against the Ilots; and for this cause obteined their freedome and burgeofie in Sparta, yea, and were allowed to take wives and marrie among them; onely they were not capable of any office of State or magiltracie, nor admitted into the counfell of the citie: howbeit, suspected they were in the end, that they conspired and went about a change and alteration in the government: whereupon the Spartans apprehended their bodies, and cast them in prison, where they kept them very straight, as close prisoners, to see if they could convince them by some proofes and undoubted evidence. Meanwhile, the wives of these prisoners came to the goales, and by their earnest praiers and imported nate fure, wrought so with their keepers, that they suffred them to have accesse unto their hufbands, onely to vifit, falute, and speake unto them: they were no sooner entred in, but they ad- 20 vised and perswaded their husbands, with all speed to put off their owne clothes, and doc on their apparell, and so to get away with their faces vailed and covered; which presently was put in execution, and themselves remained fast shut up in the said prison, prepared and resolute to abide all the miseries and tortures that might be done unto them: thus the goalers let out their husbands, taking them to be their wives. No fooner were they at libertie, but immediately they went and feized the mountaine Taygera, and follicited with all the Ilots to take armes and rebell; which the men of Sparta much fearing, fent unto them an herald with atrumpet, by whole entercourse they agreed upon these articles of composition. Inprimis, to deliver them their wives. Item, to reffore unto them their money and all their goods. Item, to furnish them with fhips to paffe upon the feas for to feeke their adventure: and when they had found a commodi-30 ous land, in one place or other, & were provided of a citie to inhabit; that they should be named and reputed kinsfolke to the Lacedamonians, and a colonic derived and discended from them. The fame did the Pelasgians, who tooke for their captaines in this voiage, Pollis, Adelphu, and Crataidas, all three Lacedamonians; for when one part of them staied in the isle Melos, the greater troupe under the conduct of Pollis arrived in Candie, attending and expecting if those fignes which had beene foretold them by the oracles would happen; for answer was given them by oracle: That whenfoever they had loft their ankor and goddeffe, then they were at an end of their voiage and should build them a citie: being come therefore unto the demie island Chersonefus, and their ship lying at ankor in the harbour; there hapned in the night a sudden seare and fright among them without any apparant cause, such as they call Panique Frights, wherewith 40 being woonderfully troubled and fearred, they went a shipboord, without all order, and in a tumultuous maner, leaving behinde them for halte, the image of Diana upon the land, which had remained a long time among them, and had paffed by descent from father to sonne, and by their forefathers had beene first brought unto them from Brauron unto the isle Lemnos, and which they caried with them from thence into all places where foever they came: after this fudden fright and tumult was passed, as they failed in the open sea, they missed the said image, and withall Pollis also was advertised, that a flouke of an anker was wanting and lost; for that when they came to weigh anker by great force (as commonly it hapneth in fuch places where it taketh hold of the ground among rocks) it brake and was left behinde in the bottome of the fea; whereupon he faid that the oracles were now fulfilled which foretold them of these fignes, and therewith 50 gave figurall to the whole fleete for to retire backe, and so he entred upon that region to his owne use: and after he had in many skirmishes vanquished those who were up in armes against him, he lodged at length in the citie Lyttus, and wan many more to it. Thus you fee how at this day they call themselves the kinsfolke of the Athenians by the mothers side; but indeed by the lather they are a colonie drawne from Lacedamon.

THE LYCIAN WOMEN.

Hatwhich is reported to have beene done in Lycia, as a meere fable and tale devised of pleasure, yet neverthelesse testified by a constant same that runneth verie currant. For Imisodarus (asthey fay) whom the Lycians name Isarus, came from about the marches of Zelea, a colonic of the Lycians, with agreat fleet of rovers and men of warre, whose captaine or admirall, was one Chimerus) a famous arch-pirate, a warlike man but exceeding cruell, favage and inhumane) who had for the badges and enlignes of his owne ship, in the prow 10 alion, and at the poope a dragon: much hurt hee did upon all the coafts of Livin; infomuch as it was not possible either to faile upon the sea, or to inhabit the maritime cities and townes, necre unto the sea fide for him. This man of warre or arch-rover, Bellerophontes had flaine who followed him hard in chafe with his fwift pinnace (Pegafus) as he fled, untill he had overtaken him, and withall had chased the Amazones out of Lycia; yet for all this, he not onely, received no worthy recompence for his good fervice, at the hands of Iobares king of Lycia, but also which was woorse, sustained much wrong by him: by occasion whereof Bellerophontes taking it as a great indignitic, went to fea againe, where he praied against him unto Neptune, that he would cause his land to be barraine and unfruitfull; which done, hee returned backe againe: but behold a strange and fearfull spectacle, for the sea swelled & overslowed all the coun-20 trey, following him everie where as he went, and covering after him the face of the earth; and for that the men of those parts, who did what possibly they could to entreat him for to stay this inundation of the fea, could not obtaine so much at his hands, the women tooke up their petricots before & went to meet him, & shewed their nakednes; wherupon for very thame he returned back, & the fea likewife (by report) retired with him into the former place. But fome there be (who more civilly avoiding the fabulofity of this tale) fay: That it was not by praiets & imprecations that he drew after him the fea, but because that part of Lyeta which was most fertill, being low and flat, lay under the levell of the fea: there was a banke raifed along the fea fide which kept it in; and Bellerophon cut a breach thorowit, and so it came to passe that the sea with great violence entred that way, and drowned the flat part of the countrey; whereupon the men did what 30 they could by way of praiers and intreatic with him, in hope to appeale his mood, but could not prevaile: howbeit, the women environing him round about by great troups & companies, preffed him fo on all fides, that he could not for verie shame deny them, & fo in favour of them, laid downe his anger. Others affirme that Chimera was an high mountaine, directly opposite to the funne at noon-tide, which caused great reflections and reverberations of the funne beames, and by confequence, ardent heats in manner of a fire, in the faid mountaine, which comming to be spread and dispersed over the champion ground, caused all the fruits of the earth, to dry, fade, and wither away: whereof Bellerophomes (a man of great reach and deepe conceit) knowing the cause in nature, caused in many places, the superfice of the said rocke or mountaine to be cloven and cut in two, which before was most smooth & even, and by that reason consequently, did send 40 back the beames of the fun, & caused the excessive heat in the countrey adjoining: now for that he was not well confidered and regarded by the inhabitants, according to his demerit, in despite he meant to be revenged of the Lycians; but the women wrought him fo, that they allaied his fury. But furely that cause which Nymphus alleageth in his fourth booke as touching Heraclea, is not fabulous nor devised to delight the Reader: for he faith: That this Bellerophonies having killed a wilde bore that destroiced all the fruits of the earth, & all other beafts within the Xanthiens countrey, had no recompense therefore; whereupon, when he had powred out grievous imprecations against those unthankfull Xanthiens, unto Neptune, hee brought falt-water all over the land, which marred all and made all become bitter, untill fuch time as he (being wonne by the praiers and supplications of the women) befought N eptune to let fall his wrath. Loe whereupon 50 the custome arose and continueth still in the Xanthiens countrey: That men in all their affaires negotiate not in the name of their fathers, but of their mothers, and bee called after their names.

THE WOMEN OF SALMATICA.

A mibal of the house of Barea, before that he went into Italie to make warre with the Romaines, laid siege unto a great citie in Spaine, named Salmatica: the besieged were at the first affraid, and promised to do whatsoever Annibal would commaund them; yea and to pay him three hundred talents of filver; for fecuritie of which capitulation to be performed. they put into his hands three hundred hostages: but so soone as Amibal had raised his siege, they repented of this agreement which they had concluded with him, and would do nothing according to the conditions of the accord; whereupon hee returned against for to befiege them afresh: and to encourage his souldiers the better to give the affault, he said: That hee would give unto them the faccage and pillage of the towne; whereupon the citizens within, were wonderfully affraid, and yeelded themselves to his devotion, upon this condition : That the Barbarians would permit as many as were of free condition, to goe foorth, every man in his fingle garment, leaving behind them their armes, goods, money, flaves and the cirie. Now the dames and 10 wives of the fowne, fearing left the enemies would fearch and rifle their husbands as they went forth of the gates, and not once touch and meddle with them, tooke unto them finort curtelaffes or skeines, hid them under their clothes, and so went forth together with their husbands. When they were all out of the towne, Annibal (having fet a guard of Mafaefylians to attend them) stated them at the end of the fuburbs: meane while the rest of his armie, without all order put themfelves within the citie, and fell to the spoile and fackage of it: which when the Masterylians perceived, they grew out of all patience, & could not containe themselves, nor looke wel unto their prisoners; but were woonderous angrie, and in the end meant for to have as good a part and thare as the rest, of the spoile: hereupon the women tooke up a crie, and gave unto their husbands the fwords which they had brought with them, yea & fome of them fel upon the guardot 20 garrison, insomuch as one of them was so bold, as to take from Banon (the Truchman or interpretor) the speare which he had, and thrust at him with it, but he had on a good corps of a cuirace which faved him; but their husbands having wounded fome of them, and put the rest to flight, escaped by this meanes away, together in a troupe with their wives; which when Annibal underflood, he fet out immediately after them, and furprifed those who were left behind; whiles the reft got away and faved themselves for the present, by recovering the mountaines adjoining; but after they fent unto Annibal and craved pardon, who graciously granted it; yea and permitted them to returne in fafetic and reinhabit their owne citie.

"HE Milestan maidens upona time, were surprized with a verie strong passionate sit of a fearfull melancholicke humour, without any apparant cause that could be rendred thereof, unlesse it were (as men most conjectured:) that the aire was insected and emposioned, which might caute that alienation of the mind, and worke a diffimperature in their braines, to the overthrow of their right wits; for all on a fudden, every one had a great defire to die, and namely, in a furious rage would needs hang themselves; and in truth many of them secretly knit their necks in haltars, and so were strangled; no, reasons and remonstrances, no teares of father and mother, no perswasions and comfortable speeches of their friends would serve the turne; but looke what keepers foever they had, and how carefully foever they looked unto them, they 40 could find meanes of evalion to avoide and goe beyond all their devices and inventions; in fuch fort, that it was thought to be fome plague and punishment fent from the gods above; and such as no humaine provision could remedie, untill fuch time as by the advice of a fage and wife citizen, there went foorth a certaine edict, and the fame enacted by the counfell of the citie: That if any one more, hapned to hang herselfe, she should be carried starke naked as ever she was borne thorow the market-place in the view of the whole world: this proclamation being thus ratified by the common counfell of the citie, did not onely represse for a while, but also stated for altother, this furious rage of the maidens and their inordinate defire to make themselves away. Thus we may fee, that the fear of difhonor, thame & infamy, is a great figne & infallible token of good nature and vertue, confidering that they feared neither death nor paine, which are the most hor- 50 rible accidents that men can endure; howbeit they could not abide the imagination of vilannie, shame and dishonor, though it hapned not unto them, untill they were dead and gone.

THE WOMEN OF CIO.

He maner and cultome was for the yoong virgins of Cio, to goe altogether unto their publick temples and churches, and so to passe the time at the long day there, one with another:

where their lovers who wooed them for marriage, might behold them disport and daunce : and in the evening they went home to each of their houses, in order, where they waited upo their fathers and mothers, yea and the brethren, one of another, even to the very wathing of their feet, Now it hapned sometimes that many yoong men were enamoured of one and the same maide, but their love was so modest, good, and honest, that so soone as a maiden was assianced and better love was so modest, good, and honest, that so soone as a maiden was affianced and better love was so modest, good, and honest, that so so easier to make any more love unto her: Insumme, the good order and cariage of these women of Cio might be known in this: that in the space of seven hundred yeeres, it was never known nor appeared upon record, that anie wise committed adulterie, nor maiden unmaried lost her virginitie.

THE WOMEN OF PHOCIS.

The tyrants of Phoeis, furprized upon a time and seized the citic of Delphos; by occasion whereof, the Thebans made that warre upon them, which was called the Holy warre; at which time it so befell, that the religious women consecrated unto Baechus, named Thyades, being bestraught and out of their right wits, ranne wandring like vagrants up and downe in the night, and knew not whither, untillere they were aware, they ranne unto the citic Amphissia, where being wearie (but yet not come againe to their senses) they lay along in the mids of the market place, and couched themselves scattering heere and there to take their sleepe: the wives of Amphissia being advertised heereof, and fearing lest their bodies should be abused by the soldiers of the tyrants (whereof there lay a garrison within the citic, for that Amphissia was of the league, and consederate with the Phocæans) ranne all thither to the place, standing round about them with silence, and not saying one word, and so long as they sleep, troubed them not; but so some as they wakened of themselves and were gotten up, they tooke the charge of them, gave them mear, and each of them looked to one; yea, and afferwards having gotten leave of their husbands, they conveighed and accompanied them in safetie, so sare the mountains and marches of their owne territorie.

VALERIA and CLOELIA.

THe outrage committed upon the person of a Roman ladie, named Lucretia, and her vertue Logether, were the cause that Tarquinius Superbus (the seventh king of the Romanes after Romalus) was deprived of his roiallestate, and driven out of Rome: This dame being married unto a great personage, descended of the bloud roiall, was abused and forced by one of the sons of the faid king Tarquin, who was enterteined and friendly lodged in her house: by occasion of which villanous fact, she called all her kinsfolke and friends together about her; unto whom after she had deleared and given them to understand the shamefull dishonour that he had done upon her body, she stabbed herselse in the place before them: and Tarquin the father (for this cause being deposed from his princely dignitic, and chased out of his kingdome) levied manie 40 warres against the Romans, thinking thereby to recover his state; and among the rest in the end wrought to effectually with Porfena king of the Tuskanes, that he perswaded him to laie siege to the citic of Rome, and to beleaguer it with a puissant power: Now over and besides this hostilitie, the Romans within, were afflicted also and fore pressed with famine; but hearing that the faid Porfena was not onely a valiant captaine in armes, but withall a good and righteous prince, they were willing to make him the indifferent umpire and judge betweene them and Tarquin: but Tarquin standing stiffe in his owne opinion, and highly conceited of himselfe, giving out alfo, that Porfena it he continued not a fast and constant ally, he would not afterwards be a just & equal judge: whereupon Porfena forfaking him, and leaving his alliance, capitulated and promifed to depart in good tearmes of amitie & peace with the Romans, upon condition to recover 50 of them all those lands which they had occupied in Tuskane, & to have away with him those prifoners whom they had taken in those wars: now for the better affurance of this composition so concluded, there were delivered into his hands as hostages, ten boies, and as many yoong maidens; among whom Valeriathe daughter of Poplicola the confull was one: which done, prefently he brake up his campe and diffodged, yea and gave over preparation of farther warre; notwithstanding that all the articles of the said capitulation were not yet accomplished. These yong virgins beforefaid, being in his campe, went down as it were to bath and wath themselves, unto the river fide, which ran a good way from the campe; and by the motion and inftigation of one among the rest named Cloelia; after they had wrapped and wreathed their clothes fast about their heads; they tooke the river which ran with a very ftrong streame and swift current, and by swimming crosse over it, helping one another what they could amid the deepe channell. and furging whirlpoles thereof, untill with much travell, they hardly recovered the bankeon the other fide. Some report, that this damosell Clocka, made meanes to get an horse, mounted his backe, and gently by little and little paffed overthwart the river, shewing the way unto the rest of hir fellowes, encouraging, yea, and supporting them as they swomme on each side and round about her : but what the reason is of this their conjecture, I will shew anon: when the Romans faw that they were gotten over in fafetie, they woondered at their boldnesse and rare vertue; howbeit they were nothing well pleafed with their returne; neither could they endure to be chalenged and reproched: that in fidelitie and troth, they all should be infetior to one man, and therefore gave commandement that these virgins should return from whence they came, and fent with them a guard to conduct them; but when they were paffed over the river Tybris againe, they escaped very hardly of being surprized by an ambush that Tarquin had laid for them by the way: as for Valeria the confull Poplicolaes daughter, the fled at first with three fervants into the campe of Porfena : and the rest, Arnus the sonne ofking Porfena, who ran prefently to the refcue, recovered out of the hands of the enemies: now when they were all presented and brought before the king; hedemaunded which of them it was, who had encouraged her companions to swim over the river, and given them counsell so to doe: all the rest fearing lest the king would doe Cloelin some harme, would not speake a word; but she her selfe 20 confessed all: Porsena highly esteeming her valour and vertue, caused one of the fairest horsesto be fetched out of his stable, richly trapped and set out with costly furniture, which he bestowed upon her, yea, and that which more is (for her fake and to grace her) curteoufly and kindly difmiffed all her fellowes, and fent them home. This is the geffe (I fay) by which fome thinke that Cloelia passed over the river on horse-back: but others say no; who deliver the storie thus, That the king marvelling at this valour and extraordinarie hardinesse, above the proportion of that fex, thought her woorthy of a prefent, which is woont to be given unto a valiant man at armes and a brave warrior: but how ever it was, for a memoriall of this act, there is to be seene her statue at this daie, to wit, a maiden sitting on horse-backe, and it standeth in the street called Via facera, which fome fay, representeth Cloelia, others Valeria.

The vertuous deeds of women.

MICCA and MEGISTO.

Ristotimus having usurped tyranny and violent dominion over the Elians, bare himselfe A much upon the favor and countenance of king Antigonus, established the same; but so cruelly and exceffively he abused this power and authoritie under him, that in nothing he was tolerable; for over and befides that, he was a man by nature given to violence (by reason that he shood in some service feare, and was glad to please the guard that he had about him of mixt Barbarians, whom he had gotten together from divers parts, for the defence of his state and person) he suffered them also to commit many infolent parts and cruell outrages upon his subjects; and 40 among the rest, that unhappic indignitie which befell to Philodemnus, who had a faire damosell to his daughter, named Micea, unto whom one of the captaines of the faid tyrant, named Lucisu, feemed to make court, not for any true love and heartie affection that he bare unto her, but upon a wanton lust to abuse and dishonour herbodie: so he sent for this maiden to come and speake with him: her parents seeing, that whether they would or no, constrained they should be to let her goe, gave her leave; but the damofell her felfe of a generous spirit and magnanimous heart, clasped them about and hung upon them, fell downe at their feet, and humbly befought them, all that ever the could, rather to kill her out of hand, than to fuffer her thus thamefully to be betraied, and villanously to be despoiled of her maidenhead: but for that she staied longer than was to the good liking of the forefaid Lucius, (who burned all this whiles in luft, and 50 had withall taken his wine liberally)he rose from the table in great choler, and went himselfe toward her: when he came to the house, he found Micea with her head upon her fathers knees, and her he commanded to follow him; which the refused to do; whereupon he rent her clothes from her bodie, and whipped her starke naked; and she, without giving one word againe, endured for her part with patience and filence all the smart and paine: but her father and mother, seeing, that with all their piteous praiers and tender teares, they could not prevaile nor boot anie thing with this wretch, turned to call and implore the helpe both of God and man, crying with a loudvoice: Out upon fuch injurious indignity and intolerable villany: whereupon, this barbarous villaine (growen now to be furious and enraged, partly with choler, and in part with drunkennesse) killed this filly poore girle, even as the couched her face in the very lap and bosome of her father: howbeit, for all this and fuch like wicked pranks plaied, the tyrant was nothing at all moved to pitic and compassion, but many citizens he murdered, and more he banished and caused to leave their countrey; in such fort, that (as the speech went) no sewer than eight hundred fled to the Actolians, craving at their hands to make meanes unto the tyrant, that they might have away their wives and little children alfo. Not long after, the tyrant of his owne accord caused proclamation to be made by found of trumpet; that as many women as were willing to go unto their husbands, should make them ready and depart, yea, and cary with them as much of their goods as they would: now when he understood, that they all with great joy of this proclamation thus published, and that they were affembled together with much contentment of minde, to the number of fixe hundred, he commanded that they should depart, and put themfelves in their journey all together on a certeine day by him prefixed, making femblant against that time, to provide a good convoy for their better fecurity: when the time appointed was come, they flocked thicke to the gates of the city, having brought with them their truffes and fardles of fuch goods as they meant to have away with them, carying fome of their little babes in their armes, taking order for others for to be brought in waggons; and so they staied there, & attended one anothers comming: but fuddenly, many of the fouldiers and those of the tyrants 20 guard, came running toward them, and crying aloud afarre off: Stay, stay: now when they approched nere, all the women they commanded to go backe againe, but the waines and waggons they turned together with the horses full upon them, and drave them amaine thorow the mids of the troupe and throng of the women, not fuffering them either to follow, or to stay or succor their poore little infants, whom they law to die before their faces: for fome of them perished with falling out of the chariots to the ground, others were destroied and trampled under the horsefeet; and all this while, these pensioners of the guard, with loud out-cries and with whipping, drave the women before them, like as they had bene fo many sheepe, and thronged them fo hard, that one tumbled upon another; and thus they chased them, untill such time as they had cast them all into prison: but all their bag and baggage was seized upon, and brought unto Ari-30 flotimus. Now when the men of Elia were were heerewith mightily offended; the religious women confecrated to the fervice of Bacchus, whom they call the Sixteene (carrying in their hands boughs of olive trees, like suppliants, and chaplets of vine branches about their heads, which they tooke from the god whom they ferved) went to meet with Aristotimus about the marketplace of the citie: his fquires and penfioners about him for the guard of his bodie, made a lane for them, and feemed (upon some reverence) to give them way that they might come nere: and the women at first kept filence, doing nought els but in most humble and deuout maner tender unto him their branches, like suppliants: but after that the tyrant understood that it was for the Eliens wives that they came thus to make supplication, and namely, that hee would take some commiseration of them; being wroth & displeased with his guard, he cried out upon them for fuffering the faid women to approch fo neere unto his perion; and thereupon commanded them to drive some and to beat others, untill they were all chased out of the market-place; and more than all this, he condemned these religious votaries in a fine of two talents a piece. During these occurrences, there was within the citie, one of the burgesses named Hellanicus, a man very farre stept in age, who was the authour of a conspiracie and insurrection against the tyrants one that of all others he least distrusted, and whom he never thought likely to practise against him, both for that he was very aged, and also because but a little before he had buried two of his children: and it fortuned at the very fame time, that fro Aetolia the exiles before named, passed into the territorie of Elis, and feized upon a fort called Amymom, fituate in a very commodious place for to mainteine warre; where they received and enterteined many other inhabitants of 50 thecitie, who immediatly reforted thither, and ran apace: upon these tydings, the tyrant Ariflotimus much fearing the fequel hereof, went unto their wives in prison; and thinking to compalle his defleignes better by feare, than favor and love, he commanded them to fend unto their husbands, & to write unto them, for to abandon their holde and depart out of the countrey, menacing the poore women, that if they did not so, he would cause their children first to be mangled with whips, and so killed before their face, and then put themselves also to death: all of them were filent a good while, & notwithstanding he importuned them a long time, and urged them to speake at once whether they would doe it or no? they looked one upon another without saying a word, giving him thereby to understand, that they stood in no feare, and were not associated for all his threats: at the last, one of them, named Megisto, wife to Timoleon, and a woman whom the rest regarded and held as their captainesse, as well in respect of her husbands honour, as her owne vertue, deigned not to rife up from her feat herfelfe, nor fuffered any of the reft to fland up ; but fitting still in her place, thus faid: If thou wert a wife man, thou wouldest not deale thus as thou don't, betweene women and their husbands, but rather fend unto them, as to those who have the power and authoritic over their wives, and to deliver unto them better speeches than fuch, whereby thou hast deceived us; now if (being past hope to perswade them) thoushinkest to circumvent and delude them by the meanes of us, never looke that thou shalt abuse us any more, northinke that they will be foill advised or fo base minded, as that for to spare their 10 wives and little children, they will abandon and lofe the libertie of their countrey: for furely the loffe of us will not be to them fo much, confidering that they now enjoy us not, as the gaine and benefit, in delivering their countrey and fellow-citizens from fuch outrageous cruekie. Whiles Megifto enterteined Aristormus with these speeches, he could no longer endure, but commanded her little fonne to be brought before him, for to murder him before her eies; and when the penfioners about the tyrant fearched for him among other little boies that were play. ing & wreftling together, his mother called unto him by name, faying : Come hither to memy boy, that thou maiest be delivered from the crueltie of this tyrant, before thou hast any sense or understanding to know what tyranny is: for a greater griefe it would be unto me another day to fee thee for to ferve like a flave vnworthily, than to die here prefently: here at Ariftotimus through impatience of furious anger, drew his fword upon the woman herfelfe, meaning to run her thorow; but one of his familiar friends, named Cylon (who made femblant to be true & faithful unto him but hated him fecretly in his hart, & indeed was of the complices in that conspiracy of Hellanieus) (tepped before him, and by his effectuall praiers turned his hand, making remonttrance unto him, that it was no generous and manly deed, but a womanish act: neither favoured it of a prince or fuch a personage as knew how to manage great affaires of State, to deale in that sort, which he forced and preffed fo instantly that hardly and with much ado though it were; Aristotinus was of a better minde, bethought himselfe and went his way. Now there befell unto hima ftrange accident, which prefaged what mischiese was toward him; for about high noone it was, when being in his bed-chamber, & repofing himself with his wife, whiles his dinner was now rea-die to be ferved up, those of his houshold might perceive an eagle foaring round over his house; 30 and the let fal a bigge stone directly upon the very place of the roofe of the faid chamber where he lay, as if upon deliberate purpose the had aimed and leveled as it were so to doe, himselfe hearing the noise and rap that the stone gave upon the house top over his head, and withall, the ontery beneath of those who beheld the foule, was mightily affrighted, and demanded what the matter might be? when he understood what it was; hee sent presently for the wizard or soothfaier, whom he was wont to use in such cases, and all troubled and perplexed in spirit, asked him what this figne might prefage? the foothfaier coforted him, & willed him to be of good cheere, faying unto himselfe: That it was Jupiter who wakened him, & shewed how willing he was to alfull and fuccour him; but unto other citizens whom he might truft, he expounded it otherwife, and affured them that it was the vengeance of God, which speedily would light upon the tyrants. head: whereupon Hellanicia and his adherents were refolved to deferre the execution of their deffeignes no longer, but to fet upon the enterprise the next morrow: in the night that came be. tweene, Hellanieus as he flept, dreamed, and in that vision he thought, that one of his sons late deceased stood before him & faid: Father, what meane you to lie asleepe, considering that once to morrow you must be captaine general and sovereigne governor of this citie: Hellameus wonderfully encouraged by this vision, started up, and went to follicit the rest of his complices and companions in the faid confpiracie. By this time was Aristotimus advertised that Craterus was comming to aide him with a puissant armie, and lay encamped neere to Olympia; in the affurance and confidence whereof the prefently tooke Cylon with him, and went foorth with 50 out any guard about his person: Hellanieus seeing the opportunitie now offred, and taking the vantage thereof, gave not the fignal and watchword which was agreed upon, with those who first were to set to the execution of their entended enterprise; but stretching foorth both his hands with a loud voice cried out: Now, now, my mafters and valiant men, what staic you for? can you defire a fairer theater to flew your valour in, than to fight for the defence of your libertie, in the very heart of your native countrey? At which words, Cylon drew his fword first, and finot one of them that followed and accompanied Aristotimus; but Thrasibulus and Lampis came afront, and ran upon the tyrant himfelfe, who preventing the venue of their fltoake, fled for refuge and fanctuarie into the temple of Jupiter, where they flew him out-right, and drew his dead corps into the market place; and then affembled all the citizens thither, for to recover their freedome: but many of the people could not prevent the women; for they range our with the first in great alacritie, weeping and crying out for very joy, and environing their husbands round about, crowned them, and fet chaplets of flowers upon their heads: then the multitude of the common people fet upon the tyrants house, and assaulted it; his wife having shut her selle within her chamber, there hung herfelfe, and whereas the had two daughters, virgins as yet, but in the prime and flower of their yeeres, ready for marriage; those they tooke, and by force haled to them out of the house, with full intent to kill them; in the end after they had abused their bodies first, and then perpetrated all the villanie & shame they could devise unto them; which no doubt they would have put in execution, but that Megisto with other honest matrons of the citie,opposed themselves and came betweene, who cried aloud unto them; that in so dooing they should commit an indignitic unbeforming them, if considering, that now being in the verie traine and high way of recovering their libertie, for to live from hencefoorth in a popular government, they should perpetrate as violent outrages, as the most bloudy and cruell tyrants are used to commit: the people in good respect and reverence to the honour and authoritie of this vertuous and honest dame, who spake her minde so frankely unto them with teares gushing out of her cies, were reclaimed and advised to offer no abuse nor vilanie unto their persons; but 20 to put unto their choife what death they would die? and when they had brought them both back againe into the house, and intimated unto them, that there was no other remedie but die they mult, and that prefently; the elder of the twaine named Myro, untied her girdle from about her wafte, and with a running noofe did it about her owne necke in maner of an halter; then kiffing and embracing her yoonger fifter, the praied her to marke what the did, and according to her example to doe thereafter: To the end(quoth she) that we may not die basely, unwoorthy the place from whence we are come and defcended; but the yoonger defired againe, that the might diefirst, caught hold of the girdle and snatched it from her; then the elder; Well sister (quoth she) I never yet refused to do any thing that you defired at my hands; & even now content I am to doe fo much for you as to endure and fuffer that, which will be more greeyous unto me than 30 death it felfe, namely, to fee my most decre and best beloved fister to die before me; which faid, the her felfe taught her how to fit the faid girdle to her necke, and to knit it for the purpose, and when the perceived once that the life was out of her bodie, the tooke her downe and covered herbreathlesse corps; then addressing her speech unto dame Megisto her selfe, she befought her, that the would not fuffer her bodie after the was dead, to lie shamefully above the ground, and not interred: the fight heereof and the words withall were fo patheticall, that there was not one prefent fo hard hearted, or fo fpightfully and malicoufly bent against the tyrant, but deploredtheir wofull effate, and pitied the generofitie and magnanimitie of these two young ladies. Now albeit there be infinit prefidents of noble deeds, that in old time, women have done in companies together; yet me thinkes thefe few examples which I have already delivered, may 40 fuffice: from hencefoorth therefore I will rehearle the particular vertuous acts of feverall women by themselves, as they come scattering into my remembrance: for I suppose that such narrations and histories as these, doe not require of necessitie the precise order and consequence of the times.

PIERIA.

F those Ionians who were come to dwell in the citic of Miletum, some chaunced to be at variance and debate with the children of Nelew; by occasion whereof in the end, they thought the city too hot for them, and constrained they were to remoove and retire themselves 50 into the citic Myw, where they made their abode & habitation; and yet even there also, much molested they were and troubled by the Milesians, who warred upon them, for their revolt and apostasse: howbeit this warre was not so bloudie and mortall, but that they used to fend one unto another, yea and to communicate and negotiate reciprocally in divers things: for even unto another, yea and to communicate and negotiate reciprocally in divers things: for even unto Milesum: now among these Myuntines, there was a noble man and of great name, one Pythes, who had to wise a ladic called Japygia, by whom he was father of a faire daughter, cleped Pieria: when as therefore the great feast unto Diana and a solemne facrifice called Nelew, was celebrated by the Milesians: Pythes, sent thither unto this solemnitie, his wise and daughter aforesaid, for they had requested leave of him to be partakers of the seast. It fortuned whiles they were there, that one of the somes of Nelew (a man of most credit and greatest authoritie in the citie) named Phrygius, cast a fancie to Pieria; and in courting her after the manner of lovers, desired to know of her what it might be, wherein he might gratishe her most, and best content her, unto whom the answered: It Sir you will so bring about, that I my selfe with many more may oftentimes refort hither, you shall doe me the greatest pleasure that you can devise. Phrygius (conceiving presently what her meaning was, namely that there might be econtinual peace and amitie betweene those two cities) wrought so, that he composed the warre onboth sides: in regard hereof Pieria was highly esteemed and honoured in both cities; in such wise, to that unto this day the Milesian dames do wish ordinarily and pray unto the gods, that they may be as well beloved, as Pieria was of Phrygius.

POLYCRITE.

Here was in times past, warre betweene the Naxians and the Milesians, about Nearathe wife of Hypsureon, and the same arose upon this occasion. This Neura was enamoured upon Promedon, a Naxian, infomuch as the would embarke, take the fea, and faile with him: for why an ordinarie guest he was of Hapfiereons, and used to lodge in his house when soever hee came to Miletum : yea and fecretly the had him to lie with her, the loved him fo well: but 20 in processe of time when shee feared that her husband perceived it, he faire tooke her cleane away with him to Naxos, where he ordained, that the thould be a suppliant of Vesta. Hypsuren fent for her againe; but when the Naxians in favour of Promedon refused to render her, alleaging for a colourable pretente of their excuse the priviledge and franchises of suppliants: hereupon the warre began between them; in which quarrell the Erythræans favoured the Milefians verie affectionatly and fided with them, infomuch as it grew to a long and lingering warre, and many miseries and calamities that follow warres, it drew withall, as well to the one part as the other; until at last the quarrel was finally ended by the vertue of one woman, like as it began first by the vice and wickednesse of another. For Diegnetus the captaine generall of the Erythraans, (unto whom was comitted the charge of keeping a fort, seated upon a very commodious place 30 to annoy & endamage the Naxians) made rodes and incursions into their territorie, where with many other huge booties that he drave and carried away, he took and led as his prisoners many maidens and wives of good houses and parentage; among whom there was one named Polycrite, whom himselfe fancied and fell in love with; her he kept and entertained not like a captive or prisoner, but as if the had beene his espoused wife: now it fortuned that the day was come when the Milefians lying in campe, were to folemnize a great feaft; by reason whereof they sel to drinking freely and making good cheere, inviting one another as the maner was: then Polycrite asked captaine Diognetus, whether hee would be offended if the thould fend certaine tants, pies, and cakes, provided for that feast unto her brethren ? who answered : that he not onely permitted, but also willed her so to doe: she taking the opportunitie of good occasion, put within 40 one of these tarts, a little thinne plate of lead which was written upon, charging him expressely who had the carriage thereof, to fay unto her brethren, that in any case none but they, should tafte of the faid cakes or tarts: this meffage was done accordingly, and when they came to eate the tarts, they found within one, a writing of their fifters; whereby thee advertised and advised them not to faile, but that very night to come and affaile their enemies, for that they should finde them in great diforder, without sentinell and corps-de-guard, without any watch and ward at all, for that they were all drunke by occasion of the good cheere that they had made at that feast: having this intelligence, they presently acquainted the captaines generall of the Naxians armie therewith, praying them to enterprise this service by their direction and with them: thus were the Erythræans defeized of their strong hold, and a great number of them within, put 50 to the fword: but Polyerite craved Diognetus of her fellow-citizens, and by that meanes faved his life; now when the approched neere unto the gates of Naxos, feeing all the inhabitants comming foorth to meet her with exceeding great joy and mirth, putting garlands of flowers upon her head, and chanting fongs of her praifes, her heart was not able to endure fo great joy; for the died at the very gate of the citie, where afterwards the was enterred and entombed; and her monument was called, the Sepulcher of Envie, as if there had beene some envious fortune, which had grudged unto Polycrite, the fruition of fo great glorie and honour. Thus the Historiographers riographers of Naxes have delivered this narration: howbeit (Ariflotle faith) that Polyerte was never taken prifoner; but Diognetus having had a fight of her by tome other meanes, became enamoured upon her fo farre, that he was ready to give unto her, and to do for the love of her, whatfoever the would: also that the promifed to go with him, in case he would agree and graunt one thing, and (as the faid philosopher telleth the tale) thereupon the required of the an obligation of his oth; and after he had faithfully sworne unto her, the demanded that hee should deliver unto her the castle Delio; for that was the name of the fort or piece whereof hee had the charge, otherwise she faid that she would never come in bed with him; whereupon he (aswell for the great desire that he had to enjoy her love, as in regard of his forefaid oath, by 10 which he was bound and obliged) quit the place and tendred it into the hands of Polyerie, who presently delivered it up unto her countrey-men and fellow-citizens; by which meanes they being now able once againe to make their parts good with the Milessans, made an accord and concluded peace, under what conditions they desired themselves.

LAMPSACE.

N the citie Phocas, there were fometimes two brethren twinnes, of the house and family of the Codrida; the one named Phobus, the other Blep (us; of which twaine, Phobus was the first that (according as Charon the Chronicler of Lampfacum doth record) cast himselfe from the 20 high rocks and cliffes of Leucas into the fea. This Phobus being of great puiffance and royall authoritie in his countrey, hapned to have fome private affaire and negotiation of his owne in theifle of Paros, and thither he went; where he contracted amitie, alliance and hospitalitie with Mandron king of the Bebrycians, furnamed Pityoeffenes: and by vertue of this new league he aided them, and in their behalfe made warre with them, against other barbarous people their neighbours, who did them wrong and wrought them much damage: afterwards (when he was upon hisdeparture and returne home) Mandron among many other courtefies and tokens of kindnesse which he bestowed upon him, now ready to embarke and take the sea, offered him the one moitie of his country and city, if he would come & dwel in the citie Pirroeffa, with some part of the Phocæans, for to people the place: whereupon Phobus after he was come home against to 30 Phocaa, proposed this matter unto the Phocæans his citizens; & having perswaded them to accept of the offer; he fent his owne brother, as leader and captaine to conduct this colonie of new inhabitants; who upon their first arrivall and comming thither; found themselves as well entreated, & as courteoufly entertained as they could wish or looke for at Mandron his hands: but in tract of time, after that they had gotten many advantages at the Barbarians hands, their neighbours & borderers, wan divers booties from them, and gained much pillage & spoile; they began to be envied first, and afterwards to be dread and feared of the Bebrycians; who being defirous for to be rid and delivered of fuch guefts, durft not addresse themselves unto Mandron, whom they knew to be an honest and just man, for to perswade him to practise any disloyaltie or treacherie, against men of the Greek nation; but espying a time when he was absent and out of 40 the countrey; they complotted and prepared to furprize the Phocæans by a wile, and fo to dispatch them al at once out of the way: but Lampface (the daughter of Mandron, a maiden yet unmarried, having fome fore-inkling and intelligence of this forelaied ambush) laboured & dealt, first with her familiar friends to divert them from so wicked an enterprise, shewing and prooving unto them, that it was a damnable act before God, and abominable among men, to proceed to treacheroufly against their allies and confederates, who had been ready at all times to aid and affift them in their need against their enemies, and besides, were now incorporate with them, and their fellow-citizens: but when the faw that there would no good be done, and that she could not diffwade them from it: she acquainted the Greeks under hand with this treason, which was a warping against them, & advised them to look unto themselves, & stand upon their 50 own guard: fo the Phocæans made a folemn facrifice & a publick feaft, invited the Pityoeffenes to come out of the citie into the fuburbes to take part thereof; & themselves they divided into two troupes, whereof the one feifed the wals of the citie, whiles the inhabitants were at the feaft, meane time the other were bufie in maffacring the guests that were bidden to it; and by this meanes they became masters of the whole citie, and sent for Mandron, whom they defired to participate with them in their counsels and affaires: as for Lampface his daughter, who fortuned to die of ficknesse, they interred magnificently, and in memoriall of that good which she did unto them, called the citic after her name Lampfacum: howbeit Mandron because he would not be sufpected to have beene a traitour unto his owne people, would not consent to dwell among them, but required to have of them, the wives and children of them who were dead; whom they sent unto him with all speed and diligence, without dooing any harme or displeasure at all unto them; as for Lamsaca unto whom before they had ordeined heroick honors; they decreed for ever to sacrifice unto her as unto a goddesse, and even to this day they doe continue and observe the same divine worship unto her.

ARETAPHILA.

Retaphila of Cyrene, was none of them that lived in ancient time, but lately in the daies 10 of king Mithridates; but the thewedvertue, & performed an act comparable to the magnanimous counfels and desseignes of the most autike demi-goddesses that ever were: daughter the was to Aeglator, and wife to Phedimus, both noble men and great personages; faire & beautifull of vifage, of deepe conceit and high reach, and namely in matters of effate, & affaires of government well experienced: the publike calamities of her countrey did illustrate her name, and caused her to be well knowne and voiced in the world: for Nicocrates having usurped the tyrannie of Cyrene, put to death many of the chiefe and principall men of the citie, and among the reft, one Melanippus the high priest of Apollo, whom he slew with his owne hands, for to enjoy his priesthood: he did to death also Phadimus the husband of Aretaphila, and not content therewith, married her perforce and against her will: this tyrant over & above an infinit 20 number of other cruelties which he daily committed, fet certaine warders at every gate of the city; who when there was caried foorth any dead corps to buriall out of the citie, abused the fame, with digging into the foles of their feet, with the points of their daggers and poinards, or else with searing them with red hot irons; for seare that any of the inhabitants should be conveied alive out of the citie, under colour of being borne to the grave as dead: private and particular crosses, had Aretaphila no doubt, which were greevous unto her, and hardly to be endured, although the tyrant was otherwise kinde enough unto her, and led her a faire life, letting her have her owne will, for the love he bare unto her, infomuch as the tyrant suffred her to enjoy a great part of his puissance and regall power; for love had enthralled and subdued him unto her; and not one there was but she alone who knew how to use and handle him; for to all the 20 others he was untractable, inflexible, and favage beyond all measure: but it grieved her most of all, to fee her native countrey so miserably abused, and so unwoorthily intreated by this tyrant; for there was not one day went over his head, but he caused to be executed one citizen or other, neither was there to be feene any hope of revenge or deliverance out of these calamities on any fide; for that the exiled persons and such as fled, being weake and feeble every way, and altogether heartlesse and searcfull, were scattered some in this place others in that: Aretaphila therefore (building upon her felfealone, the onely hope of recovering and raifing the State of the common-weale, and propoling the magnanimous and renowmed acts of Theba, the wife of the tyrant Pheres, as examples to imitate; but wanting and destitute altogether of faithfull friends and truftie kinsfolke for to helpe and fecond her in any enterprife, fuch as the prefent times and 40 affaires did affoord unto the other) affaied to make away the tyrant by fome poison; but as she was about the provision heereof, and affaied to make proofe of the forces of many strong poifons, the could not carrie her deffeigne to fecretly but it came foorth, and was discovered: now when the thing was averred & evidently proved; by ftrong prefumptions: Calbia the mother of Nicoerates (a bloudy woman, and of nature implacable) thought to have her put to many exquilite torments, and then to bring her soone after to her death : but the affection that Nicorates bare unto her wrought some delay in revenge, and dulled the edge of his anger, and withall, Aretaphila, (who constantly and resolutely offered her-selfe to answer all imputations that were laid unto her charge;) gave fome colourable excuse unto the passionate affection of the tyrant: but in the end feeing that the was convinced by certaine proofes and evidences, which the knew 50 not how to answer, neither could the denie that the had fome drugs in her closet,& did temper certaine medicines; but confessed that indeed she had prepared certaine drugs, yet such as were neither deadly nor dangerous: But my good lord (quoth the unto her husband the tyrant) I am much perplexed and troubled with many things of great confequence, and namely how to preferve the good opinion which you have of me, the kinde affection also which of your gracious favour you beare unto me, by meanes wherof, I have this honour, as to enjoy a good part of your power and authoritie jointly with you; this maketh me to be envied of wicked women, at whole hands I (fearing forceries, charmes, enchantments, and other cunning divellith cafts, by which they would goe about to withdraw and distract you from the love that you beare me) refolved at the length with my felle for to feeke means how to meet, encounter, and prevent their devices; foolish peradventure they may be (as indeed the very inventions of a woman) but in no wife worthy of death; unlesse haply, fir (in your judgement) it be just and reasonable to put your wife to death, for that The mindeth to give you fome love drinks, and amatorious cups; or devifeth fome charmes, as defirous to be more loved of you than haply it is your pleafure for to love her. Nicocrates having heard these excuses alledged by Arctophila, thought good, and refolved to put her to torture; whereat Calbia her mother was prefent, who never refented 10 nor feemed to be touched with her dolorous torments, but remained inexorable: now when the was laid upon the racke, and asked fundrie questions, the needled not unto the paines that the fullained, but continued invincible, and confessed no fault in the height of all externities; untill at length Calbia herfelfe, even against her will was forced to give over tormenting her any longer: and Nieverates let her goe, being not fully perfwaded, that the excuses alledged by ber were true & to be credited, repenting that he had put her to fuch paine as he did; and it was not long after (fo deepely was the passion of love imprinted in his heart) but he returned to her, and affaied to win her grace and good will againe, by all honours, favours, courtefies and kindneffe that possibly he could shew unto her; but she, who had the power and strength to refift all torments and yeeld unto no paines, would not be overcome with all his flatteries; but joining 20 now unto her former defire of doing fome vertuous deed, the animofitie for to be revenged and to effect her purpose, assaid other meanes. One daughter she had mariageable, and beautifull the was belides; her she suborned and fet as an alluring bait to entrap and catch the tyrants brother, a yong gendeman, easie to be caught with the pleasures & delight of youth: and many are of opinion, that the used certeine charmes and amatorious potions, aswell as the object of her daughters beautie, whereby the enchanted and bewitched the wits and fenfes of this youg man, whom they called Leander: when he was once enamoured with the love of this young damofell, hee prevailed so much by praiers and entreatie with his brother, that he permitted him to wed her: no fooner was he married, but his fresh spouse (having instructions before hand from her mother) began to be in hand with him, and to perswade him for to enterprise the recoverie 30 of freedome unto the citie, thewing by good remonstrance, that himselfe enjoied not libertie, fo long as he lived under tyrannie, neither had he power of himfelfe, either to wed a wife, or to keepe her when he had her, if it pleafed not the tyrant: on the other fide, his friends and other of his familiar acquaintance, for to gratific Aretaphila and to doe her pleasure, repaired unto him continually, forging fome new matter of quarrels and suspitions against his brother the tyranes when he perceived that Aretaphila was also of the same minde, and had her hand therein, he resolved to execute the enterprise; and thereupon he set one Daphnis, a servant of his owne, in hand with the bufineffe, by whose meanes he killed Nicocrates: but after he was thus murdered, Leander would no more be advised by Aretaphila, nor follow her counsell in the rest; but showed incontinently by his deportments and carriage in all actions, that a brother indeed hee had 40 murdered, but not killed a tyrant: for in his owne government, he bare himselfe like a foole, and ruled infolently and furioufly: howbeit, unto Aretaphila he thewed alwaies fome honour and reverence, conferring upon her some part of his authoritie in management of State affaires; for that the made no femblant at all of discontentment, nor directly and in open maner seemed to warre against him, but privily practifed, and cunningly disposed all: for first and formost, The raifed warre upon him out of Lybia, by the meanes of a prince there, named Anabus, betweene whom and her there paffed fecret intelligence: him thee follicited and perfwaded to invade his countrey, and with a puiffant armie to approch the citie Cyrene: then the buzzed into Leanders head, certeine furmizes and suspitions of dislocaltie in his peeres, his friends and captaines; giving him to understand, that their hearts stood not to this warre, but that they loved 50 peace and quietneffe rather: Which (quoth fhe) to fay a truth, as things now fland, were better for you & for the establishment of your roial state & dominion, in case you would rule in deed, holde under, and keepe in awe, your subjects and citizens: and for mine owne part, I holde it good policie for you to make meanes for a treatie of peace, which I will labour to effect, and for that purpose bring you and Anabus together, to an interview and parle (if you thinke so good) before that you grow to farther tearmes of hostilitie and open warre, which may breed a mischiefe, that afterwards will admit no cure nor remedie. This motion the handled and followed with fuch dexteritie, that Leander condescended thereto; and shee herselfe in person went to conferre with the Lybian prince, whom the requested, that so soone as ever they were met together to treat of this pretended accord, he should arrest the tyrant as his prisoner; and to doethis feat, the promifed him great gifts and prefents, besides a good reward in money: the Lybian foone accorded hereto : now Leander made fome doubt at first, to go into this parle, and staied a while, but afterwards (for the good respect that he had unto Areraphila, who promised in his behalfe, that he should come to conference) he set forward, naked, without armes and without his guards: when he approched the place appointed for this interview, and had a fight once of Anabus, his heart mifgave him againe; and being much troubled and perplexed, he would not go on, but faid, he would ftay for his guard: howbeit, Aretaphila who was there prefent, partly encouraged him, and in part rebuked and checked hin, faying: That he would be taken and te- 10 puted for a base minded coward, and a disloiall person, who made no account of his word, if he thould now flinch and fart backe: at the last, when they were at point to meet; she laied holde upon him, plucked him forward by the hand, and with great boldneffe and refolution haled him. untill the had delivered him into the hands of the barbarous prince: then immediatly was hee apprehended, and his bodie attached by the Lybians, who kept him bound as a prifoner, and fer a straight guard about him, untill such time as the friends of Aretaphila with other citizens of Cirene, were come to the campe, and brought the money and gifts unto her which she had promised unto Anabus. For so soone as it was knowen in the city that Leander was taken prisoner & in fure hold, a number also of the multitude ran forth, to the place appointed of conference; and so some as they had set an eie on Aretaphila, they went within a little of sorgetting all their anger and malice which they bare unto the tyrant, thinking that the revenge and exemplate punishment of him was but accessarie and by-matter; as being now wholly amused upon another thing, and supposing the principall fruition of their libertic consisted in faluting and greeting her most kindly, and with so great joy, that the teares ran downe their cheeks, infomuch as they were ready to kneele, yea, and cast themselves downe prostrate at her seet, no lesse than before the facred image and flatue of a goddeffe; thus they flocked unto her, by troups out of the citic one after another, all day long, infomuch as it was wel in the evening before they could advise with themselves to seize upon the person of Leander, and hardly before darke night did they bring him with them into the citie. Now after they were well fatisfied with giving all maner of praises, and doing what honour they could devise unto Aretaphila, in the end they turned to confultation what was best to be done with the tyrants? so they proceeded to burne Calbia 2 quicke; and as for Leander, they put him in a leather poke and fowed it up close, and then cast it into the fea. Then ordeined and decreed it was, that Aretaphila should have the charge and administration of the weale publicke, with fome other of the principall personages of the citie joined in commission with her: but she (as one who had plaied many and fundry parts alreadie upon the stage so well, that shee had gotten the garland and crowne of victorie) when shee saw that her countrey and citic was now fully free and at libertie, immediatly betooke her felfe to her owne private house, as it were cloiftered up with women onely, and would no more intermeddle in the affaires of State abroad; but the rest of her life she passed in peace and repose with her kinsfolke and friends, without fetting her felfe to any bufinesse, fave onely to her wheele, her web, and fuch womens works.

The vertuous deeds of women.

CAMMA.

Here were in times past, two most puissant Lords and Tetrarches of Galatia, who also were in blood of kinne one to the other, Sinatus and Synorix. Sinatus had espoused a yoong virgin named Camma, and made her his wife; a ladie highly esteemed of as many as knew her, as well for the beautie of her person, as the sloure of her age; but admired much more in regard of her vertue and honestie; for she had not onely a tender respect of her owne good name and honour, carried an affectionate love and true heart unto her; but also, shee was wise, magnanimous, and passing well beloved of all her subjects and tenants, in regard of her gentle nature, and her debonair and bounteous disposition; and that which made her better reputed and more renowned, was this, that the was both a religious priestresse of Diana (a gooddesse whom the Galatians most devoutly honour and worthip) and also in every solemne procession and publicke facrisses, she would alwaies be seene abroad most sumptiously set out, and stately adorned. It fortuned so, that Synavix was enamoured of this brave dame, but being not able to bring about his purpose and to enjoy her, neither by faire meanes nor soule, perswade he, or menance what he could, fo long as her husband lived: the divell put in his head, to commit a most he inous and deteftable fact; for he laid waite for Sinatus, and treacheroufly murthered him: he flaied not long after, but he fell to wooing of Camma, and courting herby way of marriage; the made her abode within the temple at that time, and tooke the infamous act committed by Synoris, not piteoufly, and as one cast downe and dejected therewith, but with a front heart and a stomacke mooved to anger, and yet confideratly, waiting the time and opportunitie of revenge: on the other fide, Synorix followed his fute verie earneftly, foliciting and intreating importunately; neither feemed he to alledge vaine and frivolous reasons, but such as carried some colourable pretenfe of honestie; namely, that he had alwaies shewed himselfe a man of more valor 8 worth than Sinatus and whereas he took away his life, induced he was thereto for the execuding love that hee bare to Camma, and not mooved thereto by any malice otherwife. This yoong dame at the first seemed to denie him, but yet her denials were not verie churlish, and fuch, as he might take for his finall answer; for daily by little and little, the made semblant that the relented and inclined unto him, for that divers kinsfolk and friends also of hers, joined with him to fecond his fute, who (for to gratific and doe pleafure unto Synorix, a man of the greatest credit and authoritie in his countrey) perswaded, yea & forced her to yeeld unto this match. To be short, in the end she gave her consent, & Synorix was fent for to come unto her, where she kept her refrance, that in the prefence of the faid goddeffe, the contract of marriage might paffe, & the efpoulals be folemnized: when he was come, the received and welcomed him with an amiable and gracious countenance, lead him unto the very altar of Diana, where religiously & with great ceremonie fhe powred forth before the goddeffe, a little of a potion which thee had prepared, out of a boule; the one part thereof the drunke herfelfe, & the other the gave unto Synorix for to drinke: now this potion was mead mingled with ranke poison: when the faw that he had taken his draught, the fetching a loud and evident groane, doing reverence also unto the goddeffe: I protest and call thee to witnesse (quoth the) most powerfull and honourable goddeffe, that I have not furvived Sinarus, for any other cause in the world, but onely to see this day, neither have I had any joic of my life all this while that I have lived fince, but onely in regard of hope that one day I might be revenged of his death, which feeing that now I have effected, I go most gladly and joifully unto that sweet husband of mine; and as for thee (most accurred & wic-30 ked wretch in the world) give order to thy kinsfolke and friends, in flead of a nuprial bed, to provide a grave for thy burial: the Galatian (hearing these words, and beginning withal to scele the operation of the poison, and how it wrought & troubled him within his bowels, and all parts of his body;) mounted prefently his chariot, hoping that by the jogging and agitation thereof, he might vomit and cast up the poison; but immediately he alighted againe, and put himselfe into an eafie litter; but did he what he could, dead he was that very evening: as for Camma, the continued all the night languishing, and when she heard for certaintie that he was deceased, she also with joy and mirth departed out of this world.

STRATONICE.

The felfefame province of Galatia affootded two other dames woorthy of eternall memories, to wit, Stratonice the wife of king Devotarus, and Chiomara the wife of Ortiagon: as for Stratonice, she (knowing that the king her husband was desirous to have children lawfully begotten, for to leave to be his succeffors & inheritors of the crowne, and yet could have none by her) praied and intreated him to trie another woman, and beget a childe of her body, yea and permitted that it should be put unto her, and she would take it upon her as her owne: Deiotarus woondered much at this resolution of hers, and was content to doe all things according to her mides wherupon she chose (among other captives taken prisoner in the warres) a proper faire maiden stamed Electra, whom she brought into Deiotarus bed chamber, & thut them in both together:

30 and all the children which this concubine bare unto him, his wife reared and brought up with as kinde an affection and as princelike, as if she hadborne them herselse.

CHIOMARA.

A T what time as the Romans, under the conduct of Cn. Seipio, defaited the Galatians that inhabit in Asia; it befell that Chiomara the wife of Ortiagon, was taken prifoner with other Galatian women: the captaine whose captive she was, made use of his fortune, did like a soldier, and abused her bodie, who as he was a man given unto his fleshly pleasure, so he looked alfo as much or rather more unto his profit and filthie lucre; but fo it fell out, that overtaken he was and entrapped by his owneavarice: for (being promifed by the woman a good round quantitic of gold, for to deliver her out of thraldome and fet her at libertie;) he brought her to the place which the had appointed for to render her and fet her free; which was at a certeine banke by the river fide, where the Galatians should passe over, tender him the said monie, and receive Chiomara: but the winked with her cie, & thereby gave a fignall to one of her own companie for to kill the faid Romane captaine, at what time as he should take his leave of her with a kiffe and friendly farewell; which the partie did with his fword, & at one stroke setched off his head: the head the herfelfe tooke up, and wrapped it in the lap of her gowne before, and fo gat her away a- 10 pace homeward when the was come to her husbands house, downe the cast his head at his feet, whereat he being aftonied: Ah my fweet wife (quoth he) it is a good thing to keepe faithfull promise: True (quoth she) but it is better, that but one man alive should have my companie. Polybius writeth of the fame woman, that himfelfe talked with her afterwards in the citie of Sardis, and that he found her then to be a woman of an high minde and of woonderfull deepe wit. But fince I am fallen to the mention of the Galatians, I will rehearle yet one flory more of them.

A WOMAN OF PERGAMUS.

Ing Atithridases fent upon a time for threefcore of the principall lords of Galatia, to repair unto him upon trust and safe-conduct as friends, into the citic Pergamus: whombeing come at his request, he enterteined with proud & imperious speeches, whereat they altook great fcorn and indignation, infomuch as one of them named Toredorix (a ftrong & tal man of his hands, & befides woonderfull couragious, Tetrarch of the Toffepians country) undertooke this one day enterprife, to fet upon Mithridates, at what time as he fat in judgement, & gave audience from the tribunal feat in the publike place of exercise, and both him and feat together to tumble downe headlong into the pit underneath: but it fortuned that the king that day came not abroad as his maner was, up into that place of open exercise, but commanded al those Galatian lords, to come and speake with him at his house: Toredorix exhorted them to be bold and 30 confident, and when they were altogether in his prefence, to runne upon him from everie fide, to teare him in pieces and make an end of him: this plot was not projected so closely, but it came to Mithridates cares, who caused them al to be apprehended, and sent to chop off al their heads one after another; but immediately after, he called to remembrance that there was one young gentleman among the rest, for the slower of his yeeres, for beautie also, and seature of bodie, the goodlieft person that he had set cie on in his daies; whom he tooke pitie of, and repented that he had condemned him to die with his fellowes, shewing evidently in his countenance, that he was mightily greeved and disquieted in his minde, as thinking verily that he was executed already with the first; howbeit, at a very venture he sent in all haste a countermaind, that if he were yet alive, he should be spared and let goe: this yoong mans name was Bepolitanus; 40 and verily his fortune was most strange and woonderfull: for had away hee was to the place of execution in that habit wherein he was attached, and the fame was a very faire and rich fute of apparell, which because the butcherly executioner defired to referve cleane and unsprent with bloud, he was formewhat long about the stripping of him out of it; & whiles he was fo doing he might perceive the kings men come running apace toward him, and with a loud voice naming Bepolitanus. See how coverousnesse, which hath beene the death of many a thousand, was the meanes beyond all expectation, to fave the life of this young gentleman : as for Toredorix, after he was cruelly mangled with many a chop and hacke, his bodie was cast foorth unburied to the dogs; neither durft any of his friends come neere for to enterre it: one woman onely of Pergamus, whom this Galatian in his life time had knowen, in regard of her fresh youth and beau- 50 tic, was so hardie as to hazard the taking of his dead corps away, and to burie it; which when the warders and watchmen perceived they attached her, and brought her to the king: and it is reported that Mithridates at the very first fight of her, had compassion, for that she seemed to be a yoong thing, & a fimple harmeleffe wench every way; but when he understood withal that love was the very cause thereof, his heart melted so much the rather; whereupon he gave her leave to take up the bodie, and committeto the earth, allowing her for that purpose funerall clothes, and furnishing her at his owne charges, with all other things meet for comly and decent buriall.

TIMOCLIA.

Heagines the Theban, carried the like minde and purpose for the defence of his countrey and the common-wealth, as formetimes Epaminondas, Pelopidas, and the bravelt men in the world had done; but his fortune was to fall in that common ruine of Greece, when as the Greeks loft that unfortunate battell before Charenea; and yet for his owne part he was a victour, and followed them in chafe, whom he had difarrated and put to flight; for he it was who when one of them that fled cried out unto him: How farre wilr thou purfue and follow us; answered: Even 10 asfarre asinto Macedonia: but when he was dead, a fifter of his who furvived him, gave good tefilmony, that in regard as well of his auncestors vertue, as his owne naturall disposition, he had beene a worthy personage, and worthy to be reckoned and renowned amongst the most valiant knights in his daies; for some fruit received, and reaped vertue, which helped her to beare and endure patiently as much of the common miferies of her country as touched her; for after that Alexander the Great had woon the citie of Thebes by affault, & the foldiers ran to and fro into al parts of the towne, pilling and ranfacking whatfoever they could come by : it chanced that one feifed upon the house of Timoelia, a man who knew not what belonged to honour, honestic, or common curtefic and civilitie, but was altogether violent, furious and out of reason; a captaine he was of a coronet of Thracia light horfemen; and caried the name of king Alexander his 20 lord and mafter, but nothing like he was unto him in conditions: for having filled himfelfe with wine after supper, and good cheere, without any respect unto the race and linage of this noble dame, without regard of her estate and calling; he was in hand with her to be his bedfellowall that night, neither was this all; for he would needs fearch and know of her, where the had laid up and hourded any gold or filver, one while threatning to kill her, unlesse the would bring him to it, another while bearing her in hand that he would make her his wite, if the would yeeld unto him: the taking vantage of this occasion which himselfe offred and presented unto her: It might have pleafed the gods (quoth she) that I had died before this night, rather than remaine alive; for though I had loft all befides, yet my bodic had beene undefiled & faved from all violence and villanie; but fince it is my fortune, that heere after I must repute you for 30 my lord, my mafter, and my husband, and feeing it is gods will to give you this puiffance and foveraigntic over me, I will not deprive and disapoint you of that which is yours, and as for my felfe, I fee well, that my condition from hencefoorth must be such as you will; I was woont indeed to have about me, costly jewels and ornaments for my bodie; I had filver in plate, yea and fome gold in good coincand other ready money; but when I faw that the citie was loft, I willed my women and maid-fervants about me to get altogether, and fo I cast it away, or rather indeed to fay a truth, I bestowed it, and referved it in safetic within a dry pit, wherein no water is san odde blinde corner I may fay to you, that few or none docknow; for that there is a great stone lieth over the mouth of it, and a many of trees grow round about to shade and cover the fames as for you, this treasure will make you a man, yea, and a rich man for ever, when you have 40 it once in your possession; and for my part, it may serve for a good testimony and sufficient proofe, to show how noble and wealthy our house was before-time. When the Macedonian heard these words, his teeth so watted after this treasure, that he could not stay untill the morrow, and attend the day light; but would needs out of hand be conducted by Timoelia, and her maidens to the place; but he commanded her in any wife to shut fast and locke the fore-yard gate after them, that no man might fee and know; and so he went downe in his shirt into the forefaid pit:but curfed and hideous Clothe, was his mistresse and guide, who would punish and be revenged of his notorious wickednesse by the hands of Timoclia, who standing above; for when the perceived by his voice that he was now at the very bottom, the herfelte threw downe a number of stones upon him, & her women also tumbled downe many others, & those very hig ones 50 and heavy, after him, untill they had brained him, overwhelmed him, and in manner filled the pit up: which when the Macedonians heard of, they made meanes to draw up his dead bodie, and for that there was a proclamation published before by found of trumpet throughout the city, that they should not massacre one Theban more, they apprehended Timocha, & brought her beforeking Alexander, whom they had already acquainted from point to point in particular, with that audacious act which the had committed: the king judging (by her fetled & confident countenance, by her stated gate also and portly pace) that the could not chuse but be of some great and noble house; demanded of her, first, what the was? and she with rare boldnesse and resolution without shewing any figne that she was daunted and assonied; I had (quoth she)a brother named Theagines, who being captaine generall of the Thebans, against you, in the battell of Charonea, lost his life fighting manfully, in the defence of the libertie of Greece, to the end that we might not fall into that wofull milery, into which we are at this prefent fallen; but feeing it is fo, that we have fuffred those outrages & indignities which be unworthy the place from whence we are descended, for my selfe I refuse not to die, and peradventure it were not expedient for me to live any longer, and trie fuch another night as the last was, unlesse your selfe impeach and debarre such demeanors: at these words, the noblest and most honorable persons who were present, could not for beare but weepe; as for Alexander, he thought that the hautie mind and courage of this dame, was greater than to moove pitty and compaffion; and therefore highly to praising her vertue and commending her speech which he marked, and pondered well enough, gave straight charge and commaundement unto his captaines, to have a good eie, and carefull regard, yea, and to take order presently, that there should no more such abuses be offred in any house of honor and nobilitie: and as touching Timoclia, he ordeined immediately, that the should be fet at full libertie, both herselse, and also all those who were knowne and found any way to be of her bloud and kinred.

ERYXO.

B Attus who was furnamed Demon, that is to fay, Happie, had a fonne whose name was Ar- 10 cefalaus, in nothing at all resembling the maners and conditions of his father; for even du. ring his fathers life (for raifing of battlements and pinnacles round about the walles of his owne house,) hee was condemned by his father himselfe in a fine of one whole talent; and after his death, being of a crooked, rough and troublefome spirit, (according as his very name, Calepus, implied), and for that he was governed altogether by the counfell of aminion and favourite of his owne, named Laarchus, a man of no worth nor respect, he proved a tyrant in stead of a king. And this Laarchus aspiring likewise to be tyrant, either chased and banished out of the citie, or els caused to be put to death, the best and principall citizens of all Cyrene; but when he had so done, he derived from himselfe all the blame and imputation upon Arcesidans; and in the end gave him to drinke a cup of poison, to wit, a sea-hare, whereupon he fell into a lingering and 30 languishing disease, whereby he pined away, and died at the last; by which meanes himselse ufurped the feignorie and rule of the citie, under a colour of keeping it as Tutour and Lord Protectour, for the behoofe and use of Battus the sonne of Arcesilaus; for a very childe he was, and lame withall; fo that in regard aswell of his nonage and minoritie, as the defect and imperfection of his body, he was despised of the people; but many there were, who drew and ranged themselves unto his mother, and were willing to obey and honour her, for that she was a wise ladie, and of a milde and courteous nature: befides, most of the mightiest men in those parts were knit to her either in bloud and kindred, or els by bond of friendship : by meanes whereof, Laurchus made court to her, yea, and fued unto her for her good will by way of marriage, offering unto her (if the would be affianced and wedded unto him) to adopt Battus for his owne fonne, 40 and make him partaker of his feigniorie and dominion : but Eryxo (for that was the name of this noble ladie) being advised and counselled thereto before-hand by her brethren, willed Laurebus to impart the matter unto them, for that upon conference with them (if they thought well of this marriage) The would be content and condescend thereto: Laurehus failed not so to do, but went and brake the thing unto her brethren accordingly; and they (as it was complotted before) drew the matter out in length, and drave him off from day to day; but Eryxo fent unto him fecretly one of her waiting maidens, to give him notice from her, that her brethren in deed for the present did contradict her minde and croffed her will; but were the knot once knit and confummate in bed together, they would contest and haste no longer, but be willing enough to like and approove thereof as a convenient match: and therefore the advited him (if he thought to 50 good) to repaire by night unto her: for if the thing were once wel begun, the rest no doubt wuld speed accordingly; this message pleased Laurehus, and sitted his humour passing well: being therefore transported wholly besides himselse with these lovely and sugred words of this dame, he promised to attend her at what houre soever she would appoint. Now was this device complotted and laid by the counfell of her eldeft brother Polyarchus; and after that the had fet downe the just time when they should meet and company together, against that very instant, she tooke order that the faid brother should secretly be conveied into her chamber, who brought with him two luftic tall yoong men well appointed with good fwords, and who defired nothing more than to revenge their fathers bloud, whom lately Laurehus had caused to be put to death: when all things were now in readinesse, the sent for Laarehus, willing him to come alone without any of his guard about him: no fooner was he entred into the chamber, but thefe two yoong men charged upon him with their fwords, wounded him in many parts of his bodie, that he died in the place: his dead corps they cast over the walles of the house; which done, they brought the yong prince Battus abroad into the publicke place, declared and proclamed him king after the maner and custome of the citie. Thus Polyarchus rendered unto the Cyrenians their ancient government which they had from the beginning. Now there happened to be at the fame time 10 in Cyrene many fouldiers of Amasis the king of Aegypt, in whom Laarehus reposed his confidence, and found them falt & truftie unto him; by whose meanes he became dread and terrible to the Cyrenians: these sent in post with all speed unto king Amasis, messengers of purpose, to charge & accuse Eryxo & Polyarchus for this murder; whereat the king was wroth, and in great indignation intended out of hand to make that pe war upon the Cyrchians; but as he prepared to fet forward this expedition, it fortuned that his mother departed this life; whiles therfore he was bufic about her funerals, newes came to Cyrene, how this king was highly displeased and refolved to levie warre against them: whereupon Polyarchus thought good to addresse himselfe in person to the said king, and to render a reason unto him of this late sack committed upon the bodic of Laurchus: neither would his fifter Eryxo tary behinde, but follow him, and expose her 20 owne person to the same perill that he entredinto : yea, and the mother of them both, named Critola (very aged though the was) was right willing to goe, and accompanied her fonne and daughter in this journey: now was the a great ladie, and most highly esteemed in this regard especially, that she was the sister in the whole bloud to Battus the first of that name, fornamed the Happie. When they were arrived in Aegypt, all other lords and noble men of the court approved well of that which they had done in this case; and Amasis himselfe infinitely commended the pudicitie and magnanimitie of dame Eryxo; and after he had honoured them with rich presents, and roially enterteined them, he sent them all backe (Polyarchus I meane, and the two ladies) with his good grace and favour, to Cyrene.

V Enerite a ladie of the citic Cumes, descriveth no leffe to be praised and admired, for that which the practifed against Aristodemus the tyrant, whom some thinke to have bene furnamed Malacos, that is to fay, Soft and effeminate, in regard of his loofe and diffoline carriage: butthey are deceived and ignorant in the true original and occasion of his name; for the Barbatians gave him this addition Malacos, which in their language fignifieth a Yonker: because being a very youth, with other companions of equall age, as yet wearing their haire long, whom in olds time they tearmed Coronifte, (of their blacke locks as it should feeme) he above the rest, in the warres against the Barbarians, bare himselse so bravely: (for he was not only hardy & cou-40 ragious in spirit, stout also and tall of his hands, but withall full of wit, discretion and forecast, and so farre excelled all others in fingularitie) that hee became right famous and renowmed 5 whereupon he grew into fuch credit and admiration among his countreymen and fellow-citizens, that incontinently promoted he was and advanced by them to the greatest offices of State and highest dignities in common-weale; infomuch as when the Tuskans made warre upon the Romans in the right and quarrell of Tarquinius Superbus, and namely, to reflore him againe to his crowne and kingdome, from which lie was deposed; the Cumans made him captaine generall of those forces which they sent to aide the Romans: in which expedition and warfare that continued long, he carried himselfe so remisly among his citizens, (which were in the campe under his charge, and gave them fo much the head to do what they would, winning their hearts 50 by courtefies and flatterie, rather than commanding them as their generall) that he put into their heads, and perswaded them (upon their returne home) to run upon the Senate, and to joine with him in expelling and banishing the mightiest persons and best men of the citie. By which practice he fet up himselfe as an absolute tyrant: and as he seemed wicked and violent otherwise in all kinde of oppression and extortion; so most of all he was outragious and went beyond himfelfe in villanie toward wives and maidens, to yoong boies also of good houses and free borne: for among other enormities, this is recorded of him: That he forced young lads to we are their haire long, like laffes, to have also upon their heads, borders, cawles, and attires with spangles of golde;

golde; contrariwife, hee compelled young maidens to be rounded, polled, and notted, and to weare fhort jackets, coats & mandilians without fleeves, after the fashion of springalds: howbeit, being exceedingly enamored upon Xenocrita the daughter of one of those principall citizens who by him were exiled, her he kept, not having espoused her lawfully, nor woon her good will by faire perswasions, supposing that the maiden might thinke her selfe well appaied, and her fortune veric happie, to be enterteined (in any fort what foever) by him, being by that meanes fo highly reputed of and effeemed fortunate among all the citizens: but as for her, all these favors did not ravish and transport her found judgement and understanding; for besides that she was mightily discontented to converse and keepe companie with him, not espoused, nor affianced and given in marriage by her friends, the had no leffe defire to recover the liberty of her countrey, than those who were openly hated of the tyrant. Now it fortuned about the same time, that Aristodemus caused a trench to be cast, & a bank to be raised round about histerritory, a piece of worke neither necessarie, nor profitable, which he did onely upon a policie, because he would thereby vexe, out toile confume & waste his poore subjects; for he tasked every man, to cast up & cary forthby the day a certaine number of measures full of earth. Xenocrita when the saw him at any time comming toward her, would turne afide, and cover her face with the lappet of her gown : but when Ariffodemus was paffed by & gone, yong men her play-feres , by way of minh and pastime, would aske her why the muffled and masked her-felfe, as afhamed to fee him onely, and was not abathed to fee and be feene of other men as well; unto whom the would anfiner demurely, & that in right good earnest say: Iwis I do it of purpose because there is not one man among all the Cumans but Aristodemus: this word touched them all very neere; but such as 10 were of any noble spirit and courage, it galled and pricked for very shame, yea, and gave them an edge to fet in hand and enterprise some manly act for to recover their freedome: which when Xenocrita heard, the faidby report, that the would rather herfelfe carie earth in a basket upon her owne shoulders as other did, for her father if he were there present, than participate in all delights and pleasures, yea, and enjoy great power and authoritie with Aristodemus. These and fuch like speeches cast out by her, confirmed those who were conspired and ready to rise against the tyrant, of whom the chieferaine and principall leader, was one Themotecles: unto these conspiratours Xenocrita gave free accesse and ready entric unto Aristodemus; who finding him alone, unarmed and unguarded, fell many at once upon him, and so quickly dispatched him out 30 of the way. Lo how the citie of Cumes was delivered from tyrannie by two vertues of one wo man; by the one the first gave the citizens an affection, minde and heart, to begin and enterprise; and by the other she ministred unto them, meanes to execute and performe the same: for which good service of Xenoerita, those of the citic offred unto her many honors, prerogatives, and prefents; but the refused them all, onely the requested this favour at their hands, that the might enterre the corps of Ariflodemus, which they graunted, and more than fo, they chose her for to be a religious priestresse unto Ceres, supposing that this dignitie would be no lesse acceptable and pleasing unto the goddesse, than beforming and fitting the person of this lady.

THE WIFE OF PYTHES.

T T is reported moreover, that the wife of rich Pythes, in the daics of Xerxes when he warred Lupon Greece, was a vertuous and wife dame; for this Pythes having (as it should feeme) found certeine mines of gold, and fetting his minde thereon, not in measure, but exceffively, and unfatiably, for the great sweetnesse and infinit gaines that arose thereby; both himselfe in person bestowed his whole time therein, and also he emploied all his subjects and citizens indifferently without respect of any person, to digge and delve, to carrie, to purge, and clense the said golde oare; not fuffering them to follow any other trade, or exercise any occupation else in the world: upon which unmeasurable and incessant toile, many died, and all were wery, and grumbled thereat, infomuch as at last, their wives came with olive branches, like humble suppliants to the gate of this lady his wife, for to moove pittie, and befeech her for redresse and succour in this case: the having heard their supplication, sent them away home to their houses with veric good & gracious words, willing them not to distrust and be discomforted: meane while she fent fecretly for gold-finers, goldsmithes, and other worke-men in gold, such as she reposed most confidence in, & thut them up close within a certeine place, willing them to make loaves, pies, tarts, cakes, pastrie-works, and junkets of all forts, sweet meats, fruits, all manner of meats and viands, fuch as the knew her husband Pythes loved best, all of cleane gold; afterwards, when all were made, and he returned home to his house (for as then he was abroad in a forren country:) so foone as he called for supper, his wife set before him a table furnished with all kinds of counterfeit viands made of gold, without any thing at all, either good to be eaten or drunken, but all gold, and nothing but gold: great pleasure at the first tooke Pythes for to see so rich a fight, and fo glorious a banquet, wherein arte had fo lively expressed nature; but after he had fed his cies fufficiently with beholding these goodly golden works, he called unto her in good carnell for fomewhat to cate; but the still whatfoever his minde stood to, brought it him in gold; fo that in the end he waxed angric, and cried out, that he was ready to familh: Why fir (quoth fhe) are not your felfe the cause of all this? for you have given us foifon and store of this mettall, but To caused extreame want and scarcitic of meat and all things else, for all other trades, occupations, arts, and mysteries are decaied, and their use cleane gone; neither is there anic man that followeth husbandry and tilleth the ground; but laying afide, and caffing behind us all thing that should be fowen and planted upon the earth for the food and sustentation of man, we doe nothing elfe but digge and fearch for fuch things as will not ferve to feed and nourish us, spending and wearing out both our selves and our citizens. These words mooved Pythes verie much; howbeit, for all this, he gave not over quite the mines and mettall works, but enjoining the fifth part of his subjects to travell therein by turnes, one after another; he gave the rest leave to husband their lands, and plie their other crafts and misteries. But when Xerxes came downe with that puiffant armie for to make warre upon the Greeks. this Pythes showed his magnificence in the enterteinment of him, with sumptuous furniture, costlie gifts and prefents, which he gave unto the king and all his traine: for which he craved this onely grace and favour at his hands againe: that of many children which he had, he would dispence with him for one of them, that he might not goe to the warres, to the end that the faid fonne might remaine with him at home in his house, for to tend and looke unto him carefullie in his old age: whereat Xerxes was fo wroth, that he commaunded that one fonne (whom he requefted) to be killed prefently, and his dead body to be cloven through in the mids, and divided into two parts; and fo diflodged and caused his armicto march betweene them both; the rest of his sonneshe led with him to the warres, who died all in the field; whereupon Pythes being discomforted, and his heart cleane cast downes. did that which those ordinarilie doe, who want courage and wit; for he feared death, and 30 hated life; willing he was not to live, and yet hee had not the power to make an end of his life; what did he then? There was within the citie a great banke or mount of earth, under which there ranne a river, which they called Pythopolites; within this mount he caufed his tombe to be made, & turned afide the course of the faid-river, in such fort, that as it passed, the streame might glide upon this monument of his; which being prepared and done accordingly, hee went downe quicke and alive into the same sepulchre, having resigned over unto his wives hands the citie, and the whole feignoric thereof; injoyning her thus much; that the should not approch herselfe unto this tombe or monument but onely every daie once fend unto him, his supper in a little punt or boat downe the riveret, and to continue this follong untill the faw, that the faid punt went beyond the monument, having in it all his victuals whole and untouched; for then she should not need to fend him anymore, but take this for an affured figne, that he was dead. Thus lived Pythes the rest of his daies; but his wife governed and managed the State prudently, and wrought a great change and alteration in the toilsome life of her people.

The Summaric.

Owfoever Plutarch in this treatife bath difplaied his eloquence and all the skill and helps that he had by the meanes of Philosophie, yet we see that the same is not suspicion to to forthe minde and spirit of man in true reposes, and that such consolations are (as they 20 (his) but pelliatroe cures of no better: wherein also is discovered the want and default of light in the reason and wisdome of man: yet not with standing, take this with all shat such discourses doe recommend and shew unto us so much the better, the excellencie of celestiall wisedome, which furnisheth as with true and affured remedies, and in slead of leaving the heart afflicted amid humane thoughts and considerations, raiseth and lifterhit up unto the justice, wise dome and hountie of the true God and heavenly father; it causeth it to see the estate of eternall life; it assure thit of the soules immortalitie, of the refurrection of the bodie, (points of learning, wherein the Pagans were altogetherignorant) and of the permanent and everlasting joies above, in the kingdome of heaven. Now albeit as this trueth of God (revealed unto us in his facred word) hath instructed and resolved us sufficiently, it will not be amisse and impertinent, to learne of our authour and such others, those things 30 which themselves did not well and thorowly understand, neither in life nor yet in death; for that the foundation failed them, and they miffed the ground worke indeed, and in cleaving and leaning to (1 wot not what) fortune and fatall destinie, they caused man to rest and stay himselfe upon a vaine skadow of vertue, and willed him (in one word) to feeke for confolation, where there was nothing but defolation, for happinesse in misery, and for life in death. Astouching the argument and contents of this treasife; advined it is with notable reasons, similitudes, examples and testimonies, the substance whereof is this: That Apollonius (unto whom it is addressed) ought not to be over-pensive and heaviefor the death of his sonne, deceased in the slower of his age. To move and personade him thereto, Plutarchaster he had excused himselfe in that he wrote no sooner unto him, and shewed, that space of time comusing betweene, doth better preparemens hearts, which forow and bein anguish, to receive comfort; 40 he condemneth as well blockish and senselesse folke, as also those that be weaklings and over-tender in adversitie. Which done, he entreth into a generall review of the remedies which be appropriate to cure the mileries and afflictions of man; namely, that hee ought to holde a meane, and to continue alwaies like himselfe zto cast his cie and have regard upon the divers accidents of our life, and in enjoying the blefings thereof; to thinke upon future croffes and calamities; to be armed with reason for to beare all changes; to remember and carefully to thinke upon the estate of this mortall and transacrie life; to consider the evils and miseries of the same; to endure patiently that which can not be avoided and prevented with all the cares and lamentations that he; and to compare our owne adversities withother mens. Then he proceedeth unto the particular confolations of those who are heavie and soroufull for the death of their children, kinsfolke or friends; to wit: That there is no harme nor evill at all in death, 50 but rather that it is a good thing, that the houre of it being uncertaine, it is a comfort unto those whom it summoneth, who no doubt would be east downe and overthrowen with the apprehension of miseries to come in case they had any foresight thereof. After this, he proves hat large by three inductions and arguments of Socrates, that there is not any evill in death; which he confirmeth by divers examples: and then returning into his confolations, he mainteineth and holdeth: That who foever die young, are most happie; that the consideration of Gods providence ought to reteine and stay us; that we are not to mourne and lament for the dead, neither in regard of them nor of our felves; that fince over-long hewinesse and sorow maketha man miserable, it were very good for him to be rid and disputched of nearming quickly. Having finished this point, he resolveth and associate certaine difficulties which are presented in these maters: and then taking in hand his purpose againe, he ruleth and resormeth the affections of the living, toward them that are departed; he reelaimeth them from per lifting and continuing oblimately in bewaiting their absence, willing them rather to bewaile the case of those who are living; and by many reasons doth prove and conclude, that they who die betimes have one marvellous advantage over these that remaine alive in the world. Then he teacheth a man to mainteine and cary himselfe as he ought, in all affaires; refuteth those who can abide no paine and trouble; and knitting up all the premission few words, he adjoinsth certains necessarie and profitable counsels in such accidents; 10 and before that he conclude th the whole treatife, he describe th the felicity of those whom death cutterh off in the prime of their yeeres, having a speciall regard herein, to Apollonius the partie unto whom he priteth, and assuring him by the recital of the good parts and vertues which were in his sonne lately departed, that he was without all question, in that place of repose and rest which the Poets do imagine. upon which occasion he treateth of the immortalitie of the soule, according to the doctrine of Plato and his followers, which is the very end and closing up of all that had bene delivered before.

tion sent unto Apollonius upon the death of his sonne.

T is not newly come upon me now at this prefent and not before, to pitie your case and lament in your behalfe (à Apollorius) having heardlong fince (as I did) the heavy newes concerning the untimely death of your fonne, a yoong gentleman fingularly well beloved of us all, as who in that youth and tender yeeres of his, shewed rare examples of wife carriage, flaied and modest behaviour, together with precise observance of those devout ducties and just offices, which either perteined to the religious service of the gods, or were respective to his parents and friends; for even from that time have I condoled with you, and had a fellow feeling of your forrow: but for me to have come then, and vifited you immediatly upon his deceate & departure out of this world, to prefent you with an exhortation to beare patiently and as becommeth a man, that unfortunate accident, had bene an unfeemly part of mine and unconvenient, confidering how in that verie instant your minde and bodie both (overcharged with the insupportable burden of so iltrange and unexpected a calamitie) were brought low and much infeebled; and my felfe befides, mult needs have mouned you, felt part of your griefe, and forrowed with you for companie: for even the best and most skilfull Physicians, when they meet with violent rhewmes 40 and catarrhes, which fuddenly furprife any part of the body, doe not proceed at the first to a rough cure by purgative medicines, but permit this rage and hot impression of instanced humours to grow of it felfe to maturitie by application onely of supple oiles, mild liniments, and gentle fomentations. But now, that fince your faid misfortune, some time (which useth to ripen all things) is passed betweene, and given good opportunitie, considering also, that the present disposition and state of your person seemeth to require the helpe and comfort of your friends, I thought it meet and requisit to impart unto you certeine reasons and discourses consolatorie, if happily by that meanes I may ease your anguish, mitigate your pensivenesse, and stay your needleffe mourning and bootleffe lamentation: for why?

If minde be sicke, what physicke then? But reasons fit for ech disease? A wife man knowes the feafon when To use those meanes, the heart to ease. And according as the wife Poet Euripides faith: Ech griefe of minde, ech maladie Doth crave a severall remedie: If restlesse sorow the heart torment, Kind words of friends worke much content.

Where

Where folly swaies in every action, Great need there is of sharpe correction.

For verily among fo many paffions and infirmities incident to the foule of man, dolor and heavinesse be most irkesome and goe neerest into it. By occasion of anguish many a one (they fay) hath run mad and fallen into maladies incurable; yea, and for thought and hearts-griefe, some have bene driven to make away themselves. Now to forow and be touched to the quicke for the loffe of a fonne, is a paffion that arifeth from a naturall cause, and it is not in our power to avoid: which being fo, I cannot (for my part) holde with them, who fo highly praise and extoll, I wot not what brutish, hard, and blockith indolence and stupiditie, which if it were possible for a man to enterteine, is not any way commodious and available. Certes, the fame would be reave vs of 10 that mutuall benevolence and fweet comfort which we finde in the reciprocall interchange of loving others and being loved againe; which (of all earthly bleffings) we had most need to preferve and mainteine. Yet do I not allow that a man should suffer himselfe to be transported and caried away beyond all compasse & measure, making no end of forow; for even that also is likewife unnaturall, and proceedeth from a corrupt and erronious opinion that we have: and therefore, as we ought to abandon this exceffe as fimply naught, hurtfull, and not beforming vertuous and honest minded men; so in no wife must we disallow that meane and moderation in our paffions, following in this point fage Crantor the Academick Philosopher: I could with (quoth he) that we might be never ficke; howbeit, if we chance to fall into some disease, God sendus yet fome fenfe and feeling, in cafe any part of our bodie be either cut, plucked away, or difmem- 20 bred in the cure. And I affure you, that fenfeleffe impaffibilitie is never incident unto a man. without fome great mischiese and inconvenience ensuing; for lightly it salleth out, that when the bodie is in this case without feeling, the soule soone after will become as insensible: reason would therefore, that wife men in thefe and fuch like croffes, cary themfelves, neither void of affections altogether, nor yet out of measure passionate; for as the one bewraieth a fell and hard heart, refembling a cruell beaft; so the other discovereth a foft and effeminate nature, befeeming a tender woman; but best advised is he, who knoweth to keepe a meane, and being guided by the rule of reason, hath the gift to beare wisely and indifferently, aswell the flattering favours, as the fcowling frownes of fortune, which are fo ordinarily occurrent in this life; having this forecast with himfelfe: That like as in a free State, and popular government of a common wealth, where 30 the election of lovereigne magistrates passeth by lots; the one whose hap is to be chosen must be a ruler and commander; but the other who miffeth, ought patiently to take his fortune, and beare the repulle; even so in the disposition and course of all our worldly affaires, we are to be content with our portion allotted unto us, and without grudging and complaint, gently to yeeld our selves obedient: for furely they that can not so doe, would never be able with wifedome and moderation to weld any great prosperitie: for of many wife speeches and well faid sawes, this fentence may go for one:

How ever fortune fmile and looke full faire, Be thou not proud nor beare a loftie mind; Ne yet esst downe and plung d in deepe ac spaire, If that she frowne or shew herfelfe unkind; But alwates one and same let men thee find. Constant and firme receive thy nature still, As gold in fire, which alter never will.

For this is the propertie of a wife man and well brought up, both for any apparent flew of profperitie to be no changling, but to be are himselfe alwaies in one fort; & allo in adversitie, with a generous and noble mind, to mainteine that which is decent & befeeming his own persons for the office of true wisdome & considerate discretion is, either to prevent & avoid a mischiete coming, or to correct and reduce it to the least & narrowest compasse when it is once come, or els to be prepared and ready to be are the same mansfully, and with all magnanimitie. For prudence, so as touching that which we call good, is seene and emploied four emaner of waies; to wit, in getting, in keeping, in augmenting, or in well and right using the same: these be the rules as well of prudence, as of other vertues, which we are to make use and benefit of in both fortunes, as well the one as the other: for according to the old proverb:

No man there is on earth alive, In every thing who ay doth thrive. And verily By course of nature, unneth it wrought may be, That ought should check fatall necessitie.

And as it falleth out in trees and other plants, that some yeeres they beare their burden, and yeeld great store of frute, whereas in others they bring foorth none at all; also living creatures one whiles be frutefull and breed many yoong, otherwhiles againe, they be as barren for it; and in the sea it is now tempest, and then calme: semblably in this life there happen many circumstances and accidents, which winde and turne us into the chaunces of contrarie fortunes; in regard of which varietie, a man may by good right and reason, say thus:

O Agamemnon, thy father Attens bee,
Alwaies to profer hath not begotten thee:
For in this life thou must have one day joy,
Another, griefe and wealth, mixt with annon,
And why? thou are by mortall nature fraile,
Thy will against this course cannot prevaile:
For so is is the pleasure of the gods,
Tomake this change, and worke in man such ods.

As also that which to the same effect the poet Menander wrote in this wise:

Sir Trophimus, if you the onely wieht Of women borne, were brought into this light With priviledge, to have the world at will. 20 To taste no woe, but prosper alwaics still? Or if some god had made you such behest, To live in joy, in solace and in rest? You had just cause to fare thus as you doe. And chafe, for that he from hu word doth goe, And hath done what he can not justifie: But if fo be, as truth will te stifie: under one law this publike vitall aire. You draw with us, your breath for to repaire: 30 I say to you (gravely in tragick stile) Tou ought to be more patient the while; To take all this in better woorth (I (ay) Let reason rule, and stand for finall pay. And to knit up in few words, Trophimus Of this discourse the summe; I reason thus: Aman you are, (that is as much to fay) A creature, more prompt and subject ay To sudden change, and from the pitch of blis, To lie in pit where bale and forow is.

To sudden change, and from the pitch of blis,
To licin pit, where bale and forw is,
To han others all: and not unwoorthily:
For why, most weake by his owne nature, he Will needs himselfe in highest matters wrap,
Above his reach, secure of after-clap:
And then anon, he falling from on high,
Beares downe with him all good things that were nigh:
But as for you, the goods which heere to fore
O Trophimus you lost, exceeded not, no more Than those mishaps which you this day sustence
Excessive be, but keepe with in a meane:
Hencesorth therefore, you ought to beare the rest

Indifferently, and you shall finde it best.

Howbeit, although the condition and estate of mens affaires stand in these tearmes, yet some there be, who for want of sound judgement and good discretion, are growen to that blockish stupiditie, or vaine overweening of themselves, that after they be once a little raised up, and advanced, either in regard of excessive wealth, and store of gold and silver under their hands, or by reason of some great offer, or for other presidence and preeminence of high place which they hold in the common-weale; or essentially occasion of honours and glorious titles which they have acquired, doe menace, wrong and infult over their inferiors, never confidering the uncertaintie and inconstance of mutable fortune, nor how quickly that which was a lost may be flung downe; and contrariwife, how soone that which lieth below on the ground, may be extolled and lifted up on high by the fudden mutations and changes of fortune: to feeke for any certaintie therefore in that which is by nature uncertaine and variable, is the part of those that judge not aright of things:

For as the wheele doth turne, one part we fee Of folly high and low in course to bee.

But to attaine unto this tranquillitie of spirit, void of all griefe and anguish, the most soveraigne powerfull, and effectuall medicine, is reason, and by the meanes thereof, a prepared estate and 10 resolution against all the changes and alterations of this life: neither is it sufficient for a man onely to acknowledge himselfe to be by nature borne mortall; but also that he is allotted unto a mortall and transitorie life, and tied as it were unto such affaires as soone doe change from their present estate unto the contrarie: for this also is most certaine, that as mens bodies be mortall and fraile, so their fortunes also, their passions and affections be slitting and momentanie; yea, and in one word, all that belongeth unto them is transitorie; which it is not possible for him to avoid and escape, who is himselfe by nature mortall: but as Pindarus said:

Veric well therefore faid Demetrius Phalereus, whereas Euripides the Poet wrote thus:

Noworldly wealth is firme and sure, But for a day it doth endure.

How small things may our state quite overthrow!

It falleth out (as every man doth know)

That even one day is able downe to cast Some things from height, and others raise as fast.

All the rest (quoth he) was excellently by him written, but farre better it had bene, if he had named, not one day, but the minute, moment, and very point of an houre:

For earthly fruits and mortall mens estate Turneround about in one and (elfe same rate,

Some live, waxe strong and prosper day by day,

Whiles others are cast downe and fade away.

And Pindarus in another place

What is it for to be but one?

N ay what is it to be just none?

And verily aman is made

nath declared the vanitie of mans life, by using an Hyperbole or excessive maner of an over-reaching speech, both passing wittily, and also to the purpose most significantly. For what is there 40 more weake & feeble than a shadow? but to come in with the fantasticall dreame of a shadow; furely it is not possible that any other man should expresse the thing that he meant, more lively & in fitter tearmes. And verily, Crantor in good correspondence hereunto, when he comforteth Hippocles for the untimely death of his children, useth these words among the rest: These are the rules (quoth he) that all the schoole thorowout of ancient Philosophie doth deliver and teach; wherein, if there beany point besides, that we can not admit and approove, yet this at leastwise is most undoubted true, that mans life is exceeding laborious and painfull : for fay that in the owne nature it be not fuch; so it is, that by our owne selves it is brought to that corruption: befides, this uncerteine fortune haunteth and attendeth upon us afarre off, and even from our very cradle and fwadling bands, yea, and ever fince our first entrance into this life accompa-50 nieth us, for no good in the world.

To fay nothing, how in all things what foever that breed and budde, there is evermore fome portion more or leffe of naughtineffe inbred and mingled therewith; for the very natural feed (which at the first, when it is at best, is mortall) doth participate this primitive cause, whereupon proceed the untoward inclination and disposition of the minde, maladies, cares and sorrowes; and from thence there creepe and grow upon us, all those fatall calamities that befall to mortall men. But what is the reason that we are digressed hitherto? for sooth, to this end, that we may know that it is no newes for any man to tafte of miferies and calamities, but rather that we are all subject to the same : for (as Theophrassus faith) fortune never aimeth or levelleth at any certeine marke, but shooteth at randon; taking much pleasure, and being very powerfull to turne a man out of that which he hath painfully gotten before, and to overthrow a supposed and reputed felicity, with all regard of any fore-fet and prefixed time to worke this feat. Thefe reafons, and many other fuch like, every one of us may eafily confider and ponder within himfelfe; yea&besides, lay thereto the sage speeches (which he is ay to heare and learne) of ancient and wife men: among whom, the chiefe and principall is that heavenly and divine Poet Homer, who faith thus:

More weake than man, there is no creature That from the earth receiveth noursture: So long as limmes with strength he can advance, And whiles the gods do lend him puiffance, He shinks no harme will ever him befall, He casts no doubt, but hopes to outgoe all: But let them once from heaven some sorrowes send, Maugre the (mart, he beares unto the end. Alfo:

Such minds have men, who here on earth do live. As Jupiter from heaven doth daily give.

And in another place:

Why aske you of my bloud and parentage? Sir Tydeus sonne, a knight magnanimous. To leaves of trees much like is mans linage: Leaves some blowen downe by minde ourragious Lie shed on ground, and others, numerous, Bud fresh in wood, when pleasant spring doth call: Mens houses so, some rise and others fall.

Now that this fimilitude or comparison of tree-leaves fully expressed and represented the transi-30 toric vanitie of mans life, it appeareth evidently by those verses which he wrote in another

You would not say that I were wife, if I did armour take To fight with you, in wretched mens behalfe and for their fake, Who much resemble leaves at first, faire in their fresh verdure, So long as they of earthly fruits do feed for nouriture; And afterward be like to them, withred and dead againe, When humour radicall is spent, and no strength dothremaine.

Simonides the Lyricall Poet, when as Paulanias king of Lacedamon (bearing himselfe high, and vaunting of his brave exploits) bad him (upon a time, by way of mockery) to give unto him 40 fome fage precept & good advertisement 3 knowing ful well the pride & over-weening spirit of the faid prince) counfelled him onely to call to minde, and remember: That he was but a man. Philip likewife, king of Macedon, hearing newes in one and the fame day, of three feverall happie successes: the first: That he had woon the prize, at the great running of chariots drawen with horses, in the solemnitie of the Olympicke games: the second: How his lieutenant generall, Parmenio, had defaited the Dardanians in battell: and the third: That his wife Olympias was delivered fafe of a jolly sonne: lifted up his hands toward heaven, and faid: O fortune, I befeech thee to fend unto me in counterchange, fome moderate adverfitie: as knowing full well, that the bare spight and envie alwaies to great selicities. Semblably, Theramenes one of the thirty tyrants of Athens, at what time as the house wherein he supped with many others feil 50 downe, and he alone escaped safe out of that dangerous ruine, when all others reputed him an happie man, cried out with a loud voice: O fortune, for what occasion of misfortune reservest thou me? and verily within few daies after, it hapned that his owne companions in government cast him in prison, and after much torture, put him to death. Moreover, it seemeth unto me, that the poet Homer deserveth fingular praise in this matter of consolation, when hee bringeth in Abilles speaking of king Priames (being come unto him for to raunsome and redeeme the corps of his fonne Hector) in this wife;

Aconsolatorie oration sent to Apollonius

Come on therefore and heere (it downe, by me upon this throne, Let be all plaints, for beare we thus to weepe, to figh and grone, And though our griefe of heart be much, let us the same represse, For why? no teares will ought prevaile, nor helpe us in diffreffe. To live in paines and for rowes great men are predestinate By gods above, and they alone dwell ay in bleffed fate, Exempt from cares and discontents, for in the entrie-fill Of Jove his house in heaven aloft, two tunnes are standing still, Whereout he doth among men deale, such gifts as they containe, In one good ble sings are bestowed, in th' other curse and paine: Now he to whom great Jupiter vouchfafes of both to give, Sometime in joy, and other whiles in heavine fe shall live: But if a man be onely from that cursed veffell fed, With (bame, with want, and penurie he is full ill be feed, He shall be sure upon the earth to wander and to firay, In much difgrace with God and man untill his dying day.

The poet who came after him both in order of time, and affo in credit and reputation, Hessau, although he taketh upon himselfe the honour to have beene a disciple of the Muses, having as well as the other included the miseries and calamities of mankind within one tun; writeth that Pandera in opening it, set them abroad in great quantitie, and spred them over all lands and seas, 20 saying in this maner:

No source then this woman tooke, the great lid from the tun,
With both her hands, but all abroads effectived anon,
With both her hands, but all abroads effectived anon,
World of plagues and miscriess, thus mischieses manifold
She wronght threby to mertall men on earth both young and old:
Lispe onely didremaine behinde, and slew all abroad,
Lius underneath the upmost brim and edge it fill doode,
For why, before it could get foorth, the lid she clapt to fast:
When other evils infinite were flowen from first to last:
Full was the earth of sundrie plagues, full was the seathewise, Discasses then and maladies from day to day didrise
Anong mankind, and those by might doe waste and creepe by steatth,
All sold in they come, in silence deepe they make not any noise,
For supice in wisedomne great, bereft them all of voice.

To these sayings and sentences the comicall poet according well, as touching those who torment themselves by occasion of such missfortunes when they happen, writeth thus,

If teares could cure and heale all our disease,
Or weeping stay at once our paine and griese,
We would our goldeschange for teares so ease
Our maladies, and so procure reliefe:
But (Master), now teares with them beare no sway,
Nor ought prevaile, for weepe we, or weepe not,
They hold their course, and still keepe on their way,
So that we see by plaints nothing is got;
What gaine we then ? nought, sir, yet give me eare, Griese brings soorth teares, as crees their srute doe heare.

And Dyelis when he comforted Danaë, who forrowed overmuch for the death of her fonne, spake unto her in this maner;

Thinke you that Pluto doth your teares regard,

Thinke you that Pluto do to your teares regard,
And will for fighes and grones your forme back fend?
No, no, ceafe you to fob and weepe fo hard,
Tour neighbours cafe marker at her and intend:
Harts eafe will come, if that you call to minde,
How many men have died in dung con deepe?
Or waxenold, bereft of children kind,

Or princely state and port who could not keepe, But fell to basedegree; consider this, Andmake right use, it will you helpe twis.

He giveth her counfell to confider the examples of those who have beene more or lesse unfortunate then herfelfe, as if the comparing of their condition might ferve her turne very well, the better to endure her owne calamitie. And heereto may a man very pertinently draw and applie the faying of Socrates, who was of opinion; that if we laid foorth all our advertities and mifforumes in one comon heape, with this condition, that each one should carrie out of it an equal portion; most men would wish and be glad to take up their owne and goe away with all. The 10 poet Antimachus alfouled the like induction, after that his wife whom he loved fo entirely, was departed; for whereas her name was Lyde, he for his owne confolation in that forrow of his, composed an Elegie or lamentable dittie, which he called Lyde: wherein he collected all the calamities and misfortunes which happed in old time to great princes and kings, making his owner dolour and griefe the leffe, by comparing it with other miferies more greevous: whereby it is apparent, that he who comforteth another, whose heart is afflicted with forrow and anguish, (giving him to understand that his infortunitie is common to more besides him, by laying before his face the femblable accidents which have befallen to others,) changeth in him the fense and opinion of his owne greevance, and imprinteth in him a certaine fetled perswasion, that his misforume is nothing to great as he deemed it to be before.

20 Aeschylus likewise seemeth with very great reason to reproove those who imagine that death is naught, faying in this wife:

Or

How wrongfully have men death in disdaine, Of many evils the remedie soveraigne.

For inimitation of him, right well faid he who foever was the authour of this fentence:

Come death to cure my painfull malady, The onely leech that bringeth remedy; For hell is th' haven for worlds calamity, And harbour furein all extremiy.

And verily, a great matter it is, to be able for to fay boldly and with confidence:

How can he be a flave justile, Who careth not at all to die? As also: If death me belpein my har à plight,

No firits nor ghosts shall me affright. For what hurt is there in death? and what is it that should so trouble and molest us when we die: Astrange case this is, & I can not see how it commets to passe, that being so well knowen, so ordinarily, familiar & naturall unto us as it is, yet it should seeme so painfull & dolorous unto us. For what wonder is it, if that be flit or cut, which naturally is given to cleave? if that melt, which is aprto be molten? if that burne, which is subject to take fire? or if that perish & rot, which by 40 nature is corruptible? and when is it that death is not in our felves? for (according as Heraelitus faith) quicke and dead is all one; to awake and to fleepe, is the fame; in yoong and olde, there is nodifference; confidering that these things turne one into another, and as one passeth, the other commeth in place: much after the maner of an imager or potter, who of one maffe of clay, is able to give the forme and shape of living creatures, and to turne the same into a rude lumpe, as it was before; he can fashion it againe at his pleasure, and confound all together, as he list: thus it lieth in his power, to do and undoe, to make and marre, as often as he will, one after another, unceffantly; semblably, nature of the selfe-same matter, framed in times past our anceflours and grandfires, and confequently, afterwards brought foorth our fathers; then the made us; and in processe of time, will of us ingender others; and so proceed still to further posteritie; 50 in fuch fort, that as the current (as it were) of our generation will never flay, so the streame also of our corruption will run on still, and be perpetuall; whether it be the river Acheron or Cocitus, as the Poets call them; whereof, the one fignifieth, privation of joy, & the other betokeneth lamentation. And even so, that first and principall cause which made us to live and see the light of the funne, the fame bringeth us to death and to the darkeneffe of hell. And hereof we may see an evident demonstration and resemblance, by the very aire that compassethus round about; which in alternative course and by turnes, representeth unto us the day, and afterwards the night; it induceth us to a fimilitude of life and death, of waking and fleeping: and therefore, by good right is life called, a fatall debt, which we must duely fatisfie, and be acquit of: for our forefathers entred into it first; and we are to repay it willingly, without grumbling, fighing and groaning, when soever the creditour calleth for it; unlesse we would be reputed unthankfull and unjust. And verily, I believe that nature seeing the uncertainty and shortnesse of our life, would that the end thereof and the prefixed houre of death should be hidden from us, for that shee knew it good & expedient for us fo to be; for if it had bene fore-knowen of us, fome (no doubt) would have languished and fallen away before, with griefe and forrow; dead they would have bene before their death came. Confider now the troubles and forrowes of this life; how many cares and croffes it is subject unto: certes, if wee went about to reckon and number them, wee would condemne it as most unhappie, yea, we would verifie and approove that strong opinion 10 which fome have held: That it were farre better for a man to die than to live; and therefore faid the Poet Simonides:

Aconsolatorie oration sent to Apollonius

Full feeble is all humane puissance: Vaine is our care and painfull vigilance: Mans life is even a hort paffage, Paine upon paine is his arrivage: And then comes death that fareth none. So fierce, fo cruell, without pardone: Over our heads it doth defend, And threats alike those that doe spend Their yeeres in vertue and goodneffe, As in all sinne and wickednesse.

Likewise Pindarus:

For ble sing one which menobtaine, The gods or daine them curses twaine. And those they can not wisely beare, Fooles as they be, and will not heare. Or thus:

They can not reach to life immortall, N or yet endure that which is mortall.

And Sophocles :

Of mortall men when one is dead, Doth thine heart groane, and eie teares shead; N ot knowing once what future gaine May come to him, devoid of paine?

As for Euripides, thus he faith:

In all thy knowledge, canst thou find The true condition of mankinde? I thinke well, No: For whence should come Such knowledge deepe, to all or some? Give eare, and thou halt learne of me The skill thereof, in veritie: All men ordain'd are once to die, The debt is due, and paied must be: But no man know's if morow next. unto his daies shall be annext: And whither fortune bend's her way,

Who can fore-fee, and justly fay? If it be so then, that the condition of mans life is such indeed as these great clearks have delivered and described unto us; is it not more reason to repute them blessed and happy, who are freed 50 from that fervitude which they were subject to therein, than to deplore and lament their estate, as the most part of men doe, through follie and ignorance? Wife Socrates faid, that death refembled for all the world, either a most deepe and found sleepe, or a voiage farre remote into forraine parts, in which a man is long absent from his native countrey; or else thirdly, an utter abolition and finall diffolution both of foule and bodie. Now take which of these three you will, according to him, there is no harme at all in death: for thus he discoursed through them well, and beginning at the first, in this wife he reasoneth: If death (quoth he) be a kinde of sleepe, and those that sleepe feele no ill; we must needs confesse likewise, that the dead have no sense at all of harme: neither is it necessaries to goe in hand to proove, that the deepest sleepe is also the fweetest, and most pleasant; for the thing it selfe is plaine and evident to all the world. To fair nothing of Homers tellimonie, who foeaking of fleepe writeth thus:

Most sweetly doth a man sleepe in his bed, When least he wakes, and scemes most to be dead.

The same he iterateth in many places 3 and namely once in this wise:

With pleasant sleepe she there didmect, Deaths brother germain, you may weet. And againe:

Death and fleepe are fifter and brother, Both twinnes refembling one another.

Where by the way, he lively declareth their fimilitude, and calling them twins; for that brothers and fifters twinnes, for the most part be very like; and in another place befides, he calleth death a brasensleepe; giving us thereby to understand, how sencelesse death is: neither seemeth he unelegandy and befides the purpose, who soever he was, to have expressed as much in this verse when he faid:

That fleepes (who doth them well advise)

Of death are pettie mysteries.

20 And in very deed, fleepe doth represent (as it were) a preamble, inducement, or first profession toward death : in like manner also the cynick philosopher Diogenes said very wisely to this point, for being surpressed and overtaken with a dead sleepe, a little before he yeelded up the ghoft, when the physician wakened him, and demaunded what extraordinary fymptome or grievous accident was befallen unto him? None (quoth he) onely one brother is come before another, to wit, fleepe before death : and thus much of the first refemblance.

Now if death be like unto a farre journey or long pilgrimage, yet even so, there is no evill at all therein, but rather good, which is cleane contrary: for to be in servitude no longer unto the flesh, nor enthralled to the passions thereof; which seizing upon the soule, doe empeach the same, and fill it with all follies and mortall vanities, is no doubt a great bleffednesseand feli-30 citie: for as Plato faith: The body bringeth upon us an infinit number of troubles and hinderances about the necessarie maintenance of itselse; and in case there be any maladies besides, they divert and turne us cleane away from the inquisition and contemplation of the truth; and in itead thereof, petter and stuffe us full of wanton loves, of lusts, scarcs, foolish fansies, imaginations and vanities of all forts; infomuch, as it is most true which is commonly faide: That from the bodie there commeth no goodnesse nor wisedome at all. For what else bringeth upon us warres, feditions, battels and fights, but the bodie and the greedie appetites and lufts proceeding from it; for to fay a truth, from whence arife all warres, but from the covetous defire of money, and having more goods? neither are we driven to purchase and gather still; but onely for to enterteine the bodie, and ferve the turne thereof; and whiles we are amused & em-40 Ploied thereabout, we have no time to fludie Philosophie: finally (which is the woorst and very extremitie of all) in case we find some leasure to follow our booke, and enter into the studie and contemplation of things, this body of ours at al times & in every place is ready to interrupt and put us our; it troubleth, it empeacheth and so disquieteth us, that impossible it is to attaine unto the perfect fight and knowledge of the truth; whereby it is apparent and manifeft, that if ever we would cleerely and purely know any thing, we ought to be sequestred and delivered from this bodie; and by the cies onely of the mind, contemplate & view things as they be; then shall we have that which we defire and wish; then shall we attaine to that which we say we love, to wir, wiscdome, even when we are dead, as reason teacheth us, and not so long as we remaine alive: for if it cannot be, that together with the bodie we should know any thing purely; one of these 50 two things must of necessitie ensue, that either never at all, or else after death we thould attaine unto that knowledge; for then and not before, the foule shall be apart, and separate from the bodie; and during our life time, to much necret shall we be unto this knowledge, by how much leffe we participate with the body, and have little or nothing to doe therewith, no more than very necessitie doth require; nor be filed with the corrupt nature thereof, but pure and neat from all fuch contagion, untill fuch time as God himfelfe free us quite from it; and then being fully cleered and delivered from all fleshly and bodily follies, we shall converse with them and such like pure intelligences, feeing evidently of our felves all that which is pure and fincere, to wit, truth it selfe; for unlawfull it is and not allowable that a pure thing should be infected or once touched by that which is impure; and therefore fay that death feeme to translate men into fome other place, yet is it nothing ill in that respect, but good rather, as Plate hath very well prooved by demostration; in which regard, Socrates in my conceit spake most heavenly & divinely unto the judges, when he faid: My lords, to be affraid of death, is nothing elfe but to feeme wife when a man is nothing leffe, & it is as much as to make femblance of knowing that which he is most ignorant of; for who wotteth certainly what is death? or whetherit be the greatest felicitie that may happen to a man? yet men doe feare and dread it, as if they knew for certaintie, that it is the greatest evill in the world. To these sage sentences he accordeth well who said thus:

Les no man fland in doubt and feare of death,

Since from all travels it him delivereth. and not from travels only, but also from the greatest miseries in the world; whereto it seemeth. that the verie gods themselves give testimonie: for we reade that many men in recompense of their religion and devotion, have received death, as a fingular gift and favour of the gods. But to avoid tedious prolixitie, I will forbeare to write of others, and content my felfe with making mention of those onely who are most renowned and voiced by every mans mouth: and inthe first place, rehearfe I will the historie of those two young gentlemen of A gos, namely, Clobis and Biron; of whom there goeth this report: That their mother being priestresse to Juno, when the time was come that thee should present herselfe in the temple, and the mules that wereto draw her coatch thither, not in readinesse, but making stay behinde; they seeing her drivento 20 that exigent, and fearing left the houre should passe, under-went themselves the yoke, and drew their mother in the coatch to the faid temple: the being much pleafed, and taking exceeding joy to fee fo great pietie and kindneffe in her children, praied unto the goddeffe, that the would vouchfafe to give them the best gift that could befall to man: and they the same night following, being gone to bedde for to fleepe, never rose againe : for that the goddesse sent unto them, death, as the onely recompense and reward of their godlinesse. Pindarus also writeth as touching Againedes & Trophonius: That after they had built the temple of Apollo in Delphos, they demanded of that god, their hire and reward; who promifed to pay them fully at the feven-nights end; meane while he bade them be merie and make good cheere; who did as he enjoined them: fo upon the feventh night following, they tooke their fleepe, but the next morning they were 20 found dead in bed. Moreover, it is reported that when Pindarus himselfe gave order unto the commissioners that were sent from the State of Baotta unto the oracle of Apollo, for to demand what was best for man? this answere was returned from the prophetisse: That he who enjoined them that errand, was not ignorant thereof, in case the historic of Agamedes and Trephonius (whereof he was author) were true; but if he were disposed to make further triall, he should himfelfe fee shortly an evident proofe thereof: Pindarus when he heard this answer, began to thinke of death, and to prepare himfelfe to die; and in trueth, within a little while after changed his life. The like narration is related of one Eurhynous an Italian, who was fonce to Elyfius of Tering, for vertue, wealth and reputation, a principall man in that citie, namely, that he died fuddenlie, without any apparent cause that could be given thereof: his father Elystus, incontinently there-40 upon, beganto grow into some doubt (as any other man besides would have done) whether it might not be, that he died of poilon, for that he was the onely childe he had, and heire apparant to all his riches: and not knowing otherwise how to found the trueth, bee sent out to a certeine oracle, which used to give answere by the conjuration and calling forth of spirits or ghosts of men departed; where (after he had performed facrifices and other ceremonial) devotions according as the law required) he laied him downe to fleepe in the place, where he dreamed, and faw this vition: There appeared unto him (as he thought) his owne father, whom when he faw, he discoursed unto him what had fortuned to his some requesting and beseching him to be asfiftant with him to finde out the tructh, and the cause indeed of his so sudden death: his sather then thould answere thus: And even therefore am I come hither; here therefore receive at this 50 mans hands, that certificate which I have brought unto thee, for thereby thalt thou know all the cause of thy griefe and forrow: now the partie whom his father shewed and presented unto him, was a yoong man that followed after him, who for all the world in stature and yeeres resembled his some Euthynois; who being demanded by him, what he was? made this answere : I am the gholt or angell of your fonne: and with that, offered unto him a little scrowle or letter; which when Elysius had unfolded, he found written within it, these three verses:

The vierre Haune operas ar Spir. Годийо Ф ксти цогеобія Зачато. '() เมาในปี วูอี (อยาว สบาลป์ หลุมภิติข ตาล วุตยงปียา.

Which may be done into English thus:

Élyfius thou foolijh man, aske living Sages read, Euthynous by facall courfe of destimes is dead; For longer life would neither him nor parents fland in flead.

Audithus much may fuffice you, both as touching the ancient hustories written of this matter, of this matter, and also of the second point of the foresaid question.

But to come unto the third branch of Socrates his conjecture: admit it were true, that death is the utter abolition and destruction as well of soule as body; yet even so, it cannot be reckoned fimply ill: for by that recloning there flould follow a privation of all fenfe, and a generall deliverance from paine, anxietic and angush : and like as there commeth no good thereby, even so, no harme at all can enfue upon it; for afmuch as good and evil have no being, but in that thing onely which hath effence and fubliflence, and the fame reason there is of the one as of the other: fo as in that which is not, but utterly becommeth void, anulled, and taken quite out of the world, there can not be imagined either the one or the other. Now this is certeine, that by this reason the dead returne to the same estate and condition wherein they were before their nativitie: like as therefore, when we were unborne, we had no fenfe at all of good or evill; no more and as those things which preceded our time, nothing concerned us; fo whatfoever hapneth after our death, thall touch us as little,

No paine feele they that out of world be gone: To die, and not be borne, I holde all onc.

For the fame state and condition is after death, which was before birth. And do you thinke that there is any difference betweene, Never to have bene, and To cease from being? furely they differ no more, than either an house, or a garment, in respect of us and our use thereof after the one is ruined or fallen downe, and the other all rent and torne, from that benefit which we had by them before they were begun to be built or made; and if you fay, there is no difference in them in these regards; as little there is be you fure, between our estate after death, and our condi-20 tionbefore our nativitie: a very pretie and elegant speech therefore it was of Arcefilaus the philosopher when he faid: This death (quoth he) which every man tearmeth evill, hath one peculiar propertie by it felfe, of all other things that be accounted ill; in that when it is prefent, itnever harmethany man; onely whiles it is abfenrand in expectance it hurteth folke. And in very truth, many men through their folly and weakenelle, and upon certaine flanderous calummations and falle furmifes conceived against death, fuster themselves to die because for sooth they would not die. Very well therefore and aptly wrot the poet Epicharmus in these words:

That which was knit and joined fast, Is loofed and distolv' dat last: Each thing returnes into the fame, Earth into earth from whence it came: The firit up to beaven anon;

Wherefore what harme heerein? just none. And as for that which Creshontes in one place of Euripides, speaking of Hercules said:

If under globe of earth, with those he dwell, Who being none, have left, laid once in grave: Amanof him might fay, and that right well, That puiffance and strength be none can have. By altering it a little in the end, you may thus inferre:

If under glube of earth with those he dwell. Who being none have left, laid once in grave: Aman of himm ght fay, and that right well, That sense at all of paine, he can none have.

A generous and noble faying also was that of the Lacedamonians:

Now are we in our gallant prime, Before as other's had their time, And after us shall others floure, But we shall never see that houre, eth chat Cicero, Tufni. 1. m tranflating read it thus :

Asalfothis:

N ow dead are they who never thought, T hat life or death were simply ought: But all their care was for to dy And live, as they should, honestly.

Right excellent also are those verses of Euripides, as touching them who endure long maladies:

I hate all those by meat and drink, it ho to prolong their daies doethink: By Magick arte and forcery, The course of death who turne awry. If here as they should be glad and faine, then as they see it is but waine Of earth to live upon the face,

For youngers then to quit the place.
As for Merope in pronouncing these manlike and magnanimous words, the mooveth the whole theater to this confideration of her speeches, when she faith;

I am not th' onely mother left,
Who of faire children am bereft;
Nor yet a widow am I alone,
Who my decre bushand have for gone:
For others in finite there bee,
Who have felt the calamice.

tinto this, a man may very aptly adjoine these verses also:

a man may very apply adjoint their venes and What is become of that magnificence?
Where is king Cracius with his opulence?
Or Xerxes, he whole monstrous workeit was,
By bridge, the firth of Hellespont to pas?
To Pluto now they are for ever gon,
To houses of most deepe oblivion.

Their goods, and their wealth, together with their bodies are perished; howbeit, beleeve me, 30 fome will say; many are mooved perforce to weepe and lament, when they see a yoong person die before due time; and yet I assure you, this hastie and untimely death admitteth so readie consolation, that even the meanest and most vulgar comicall poets have seene into the thing, and devised good meanes, and effectuall reasons of comfort: for consider what one of them shith in this case, to him that mourned and lamented for the untipe and unseasonable death of a friend of his, in these words:

If thou hadf knowne for certaine, that thy friend Who have is dead, should have beene blessed ay, Throughout that course of life which was behind, In case the gods had shad his dying day;
His death had beene unimely, I would say,
But if long life, should bring him greeses incurable, To him high was death, than now more savorable.

Seeing then uncertaine it is whether the issue and end of this life will be expedient unto a man; and whether he shall be delivered and excused thereby from greater evils, or no; we ought not to take ones death so heavile, as if we had utterly lost all those things which we hoped for, and promised our selves by his life to enjoy; and therefore me thinks that Amphiaraus in a certaine tragedy of a poet, did not impertinently and without good purpose, comfort the mother of Archemorus, who tooke it to the heart, and grieved excessively, that her sonne a yoong infant died so long before the ordinarie time: for thus he saith unto her:

No man there is of womans body born,
But in his dates much travell he doth beare:
Children fome die the purents long beforn,
And are by them enterred: then they reare
And get yoong babes for those that buried were:
Listly, themselves into the graves doefall,
This is the course, this is the end of all.

Tet men for them doe weepe and forrow make, Whofe bodies they on biere to earth doe fend, Although in truth a way direct they take, As eares of corne full ripe, which downward bend, As some begm, so others make an end. Why should men grieve and figh at natures sore that must, shall be, thinke it not hard therefore.

In fumme, every man ought both in meditation within himfelfe, and in earnest discourse also with others, to hold this for certaine; that the longest life is not best, but rather the most vertous: for neither the that plaieth most upon a lute or citterne, is commended for the cunningest musician; no more than he who pleadeth longest, is held the most eloquent orator; nor he that sitteth continually at the helme, is praised for the best pilot; but they that doe best, deserve the greatest commendation: for we are not to measure goodnesse by the length of time, but by vertue, by convenient proportion and measure of all words and deeds: for this is that amiable beautie which is esteemed happie in this world, and pleasing to the gods: which is the reason that the poets have left unto us in writing, that the most excellent worthies or denie gods, and such (as by their saying) were begotten by gods, changed this their mortal life, and departed before they were old: for even * he

Ampliarans

Who was of mightie Jupiter, and Phabus loved best, permitted was not long to live, and in old age to rest.

For this we alwaics fee, that ordinarily the maturitie of yeeres, and the same well emploied, is preferred before old age and long life: for thus we repute those trees and plants best, which in leaft time beare most frute; as also those living creatures which in little space yeeld greatest profit and commodity to mans life : furthermore, little difference you shall finde betweene short time and long, in comparison of eternitie; for that a thousand, yea and ten thousand yeeres according to Simondes are no more than a very prick, or rather the smallest indivisible portion of a prick, in respect of that which is infinit. We reade in histories that there be certaine living creatures about the land of Fontus, whose life is comprised within the compasse of one day; for in the morning they are bred, by noone they are in their vigor and at best, and in the evening 30 they be old, and end their lives: would not these creatures thinke you, if they had the soule of man, and that use of reason which we have, seele the very same passions that we doe, if the like accidents befell unto them? certes, those that died before noone, would minister occasion of mourning and weeping; but fuch as continued all day long, thould be reputed happy. Well, our life should be measured by vertue, and not by continuance of time; so that we are to esteem such exclamations as these, foolish and full of vanitie: Oh, great pittie, that he was taken waie so yoong; it ought not to have beene that he should dieyet: and who is he that dare fay; This or that ought? But many things else have beene, are, and shall be done heereafter, which some man might fay, ought not to have been done: howbeit, come we are not into this life for to preferibe lawes, but rather to obey those lawes which are decreed and set down already by the gods, 40 who governe the world, and the ordinances of destinie and divine providence.

But to proceed, those who so much deplore & lament the dead, do they it for love of theselves, or for their fake who are departed? If in regard of their own felves, for that they find how they are deprived of some pleasure or profit, or els disappointed of support in their old age, which they hoped to receive bythose who are departed? furely this were but a small occasion, & no honest pretence of lamentation; for that it feemeth they bewaile not the dead persons, but the losse of those comodities which they expected from them:but in case they grieve in the behalf of those that be gone out of this world, soone wil they shake off their forrow, if they be perswaded and bekeve, that after death they feele no ill; & obey they wil that ancient & wife fentence, which teachethus to extend as much as we can all good things, but to draw in and restraine those that be 50 ill:now if forrow is robe counted good, we ought to augment and encrease the same as much as possibly we can; bit if we acknowledge it (as it is indeed) to be naught, we are to thorten & diminish it, as much as we may, yea, & to abolish it quite, if it lie in our power: and that this may be eafily effected, it appeareth by the precedent, of fuch a confolation as this: We reade that a certaine ancient Philosopher went upon a time to visit queene de sinoe, who mourned & lamented much for a sonne of hers lately departed this life; & to her he used these or such like words: Madame, at what time as Jupiter dealt among the petie gods, goddeffes, & other heavenly wights, certaine honors and dignities, it chaunced that dame Sorom, was not present among the rest: but after that the distribution and dole was made, the also came in place and presented her selfe, craving of Jupiter, her part of honor as well as the other: Jupiter being thus driven to his shifts, for that he had divided and given away all before, not having any thing else to bestow, gave unto her the honor which is done unto those that be departed this life, to wit, teares, plaints, and a mentations: as other petic gods and goddesses therfore, love those who honor them and none else; even so (good lady). Soron (if you make not much of her, and give her divine honor) will not come neere unto you; but in case you worship and honor her dutifully with those prerogatives which be allotted unto her, to wit, weeping, wailing, and lamentations, she will affect and love you, she will haunt you, yea, she will alway minister matter unto you, that the may be continually honored by you. This device of the Philosopher, wonderfully wrought with the woman, and perswaded her in such fort, as the staicd her plaints, gave over her weeping, and cast off all legs for you.

In one word, a man may deale in this wife with one that is in forrow, and demand of him: Whether art thou minded one day to cease this mourning, and make an end of pitcous lamentation? or to perfift ftill in afflicting and tormenting thy felfe as long as thou liveft? for if thou continue all thy life time in this dolourous anguish, thou wilt procure and bring upon thy felfe perfect miserie & infelicitie in the highest degree, through thy esteminate softmesse and seeble. neffe of heart; but if thou meaneft at the length to change this fit, and to lay all mourning afide, why doeft not thou beginne betimes, and refolve out of hand, to be delivered from this miferie at once ? for looke what reasons and meanes thou art to use hereafter, for to be freed from these 20 paines and perplexities; by the helpe of the fame thou maiest presently be quit of this unhappie plight and flate wherein thou art. And as it fareth in our bodies, the fooner that wee ridde away the crafte indispositions and maladies thereof, the better it is for us; even so it is in the difeafes and paffions of the foule: that therefore, which thou art minded and disposed to yeeld unto long time, give forthwith unto reason, unto literature and knowledge; discharge thy selfe (I fay, and that with speed) of these calamities which now environ and compasse thee roundabout. But haply you will fay, I never thought that this would have befallen unto me, neither did I fo much as doubt any fuch thing: yea, but you ought to cast doubts afore hand; you should long time before have confidered and meditated of the vanitie, weakeneffe and instabilitie of mans affaires; by which meanes you had not bene furprifed as you are, nor taken fo unprovi- 20 ded, as by fome sudden incursion of enemies. Very well and wifely therefore it seemeth, that noble The few in Euripides, was prepared and armed against all such accidents of fortune, when he thus faid:

According as a wife man once me taught, I did in minde all miferies forecast; And namely, how I might be overeaught With bitter spight; and not to sit so fast in native soile, but fore't to she at last: Untimely death of wise, of childe, of friend, How some might hop, full er offe unto my minde. In summe, I did missortunes manifolde Estsoones propose and set before mine cies, To she end that I acquainted thus of olde With such fore-casts, might some learne to despife, And set noughs by adverse calumities:

For no mischance, or for tune over thwart, Could noy be strange, and nip me to the hart.

But those who are effeminate, base-minded, and not exercised before-hand in such premeditations, never plucke up their spirits, nor set their mindes to deliberate and consult as touching any honest or profitable course; but suffer themselves to breake out into extremities and mise so ries remediles afficing and punishing their harmelesse bodies, and as Alexan was woontto say, forcing them to be sicke with them for companie, which ailed nought before. Anotherefore Plato (in my conceit) gave a very wise admonition: That in such casualties and mischances as these, we should be quiet; as well, for that it is uncerteine whether it be good or ill for them whose death we seeme to lament; as also because there can no good ensue unto us by such pensivenesse and forow: for this is certeine: That as sage consultation in a mans selse (as touching that which is happed alreadie) doth remove forrow; so griese impeacheth wise counsell, which would have a man to employ and accommodate all his affaires and occurrences the best way he can; like as in playing at the tables, to dispose so of his cast and chance what soever, as may most serve to win the game.

If it be our hap therefore, to flumble and catch a fall, by the crooked afpect of adverte fortune, we must not doe as little children, who laying their hands upon that part which is hurt, fall appling or fetting up a crie; but apply our minds prefently to feeke for remedie; to fet that upright, which is fallen; to rectifie that which is out of frame, by helpe of good medicines; and in one word, to put away all moanes and lamentations.

Certes, it is reported, that he (whofoever he was) that fet downe lawes and flatutes to the Ly10 cians, ordeined exprefly: That whenfoever they were difpofed to mourne and lament, they 10 cians, ordeined exprefly: That whenfoever they were difpofed to mourne and lament, they 10 cians, ordeined exprefly: That whenfoever they were difpofed to mourne and lament, 10 they have been a feminine and fervile paffion, nothing at all befirting grave perfons, well defended, or honefly brought up: for (to fay a trueth) to weepe and walle thus, is meete womaninh, 11 and bewraieth a bafe and abject minde: and like as women ordinarily be more prone and forward thereto than men; fo Barbarians rather than Greeks; and the woorfe fort of people are given thereto more than the better: also, if you goe thorow all barbarous nations, you shall not
12 finde those who are most haughtie-minded and magnanimous, or cary any generofitie of spirit 13 in them, such as be the Almans or Gaules addicted hereunto; but Aegyptians, Syrians, Lydians, and such there hide themselves for many daies together, and not fo much as see the light of 13 the summer of the second of such as see the light of 14 the summer, because (forfooth) the dead partie whom they mourne for, is deprived thereof. In 15 which regard, son the Tragicall Poet having (as it should feeme) heard of such societies, bringethin upon the stage, a woman speaking in this wise:

Come for th am I, now as the last, Tour nourse and childrens governesse, Our of deepe caves, where some daies past, I kept in bale full beavinesse.

Others there be also of these Barbarians, who cut away some parts, and dismember themfelves, flit their owne no fes, crop their cares, mifule & disfigure the rest of their bodies, thinking 20 to gratifie the dead in doing thus, if they feeme to exceed all measure, & that moderation which is according to nature. There are befides, who reply upon us and fay: That they thinke we ought not to waile and lament for every kind of death, but onely in regard of those that die before their time; for that they have not as yet tafted of those things which are esteemed bleffings in this life, to wit, the joies of marriage, the benefit of literature and learning, the perfection of yeeres, the management of common weale, honors and dignities; for these be the points that they stand upon, and grieve most who lose their friends or children by untimely death, for that they be disappointed and frustrate of their hopes before the time; ignorant altogether that this hastic and overspeedie death, in regard of humane nature, differeth nothing at all from others: for like as in the returne to our common native countrey, which is necessarily imposed upon al, 40 and from which no man is exempted, some march before, others follow after, and all at length meet at one and the same place; even so in traveling this journey of fatall destinie, those that arrive late thither, gaine no more advantage than they who are thither come betime: now if any untimely or hastie death were naught simply, that of little babes and infants that sucke the breft, and cannot speake, or rather such as be newly borne were woorst; and yet their death we beare verie well and patiently, whereas we take their departure more heavily, and to the heart, who are growen to some good yeeres, and all through the vanitie of our soolish hopes; whereby we imagine and promife to our felves affuredly, that those who have proceeded thus farre, be past the woorst, and are like to continue thus, in a good and certaine estate. If then the prefixed terme of mans life were the end of twentie yeeres, certes, him that came to be fifteene yeeres 50 old we would not judge unripe for death, but thinke that he had attained to a competent age; and as forhim who had accomplished the full time of twentie yeeres, or approched neere thereto we would account him absolute happy, as having performed a most blessed and perfect life: but if the course of our life reached out to two hundred yeeres, he who chanced to die at one hundred yeeres end, would be thought by us to have died too foone; and no doubt his untimely death we would bewaile and lament. By these reasons therefore, and those which heeretofore we have alledged, it is apparent, that even the death which we call untimely, foone admitteth confolation, and a man may beare it patiently; for this is certaine, that Troilus would have wept

leffe; yea even Priamu himfelfe; shed fewer teares, in case he had died fooner; at what time as the kingdome of Troy flourished, or whiles himfelfe was in that wealthy estate; for which he lamented so much; which a man may evidently gather by the words which he gave to his some Hestor, when he admonished and exhorted him to retire from the combat which he had with Achilles in these verses:

Returne my some within these wals, that thou from death maist save The Trojan men and women both , let not Achilles have Of thee that honour, as thy life fo fweet to take away, By victorie in single fight, and hast thy dying day: Have pittie yet my sonne of me, thy wofull aged fire, Ιø Erethat my wits and fenfes faile, whom Jupiter inire Will else one day at the end of this my old and wretched reeres. Consume with miserable death, out-worne and spent with teeres. As having many objects seene, of sorrow and hearts griefe; My sonnes cut short by edge of sword, who should be my reliefe; My daughters trail dby haire of head, and ravisht in my sight; My pallace rac'd, their chambers fackt, wherein I tooke delight: And sucking babes from mothers brests pluckt, and their braines dasht out Against the stones of pav'ment hard, lie sprawling all about: When enemie with (word in hand, in heat of bloudy heart 20 Shall havocke make : and then my selfe at last must play my part : Whom when some one by dint of sword, or launce of dart from farre, Hath quite bereft of vitail breath, the hungry dogs shall arre About my corps, and at my gates hale it and drag along, Gnawing the flesh of hoarie head, and gristed chin among, Mangling besides the privile parts of me a man soold, Unkindly flaine, a spectacle most piteous to behold. Thus fake the aged father tho, and pluckt from head above His haires milke-white, but all thefe words, did Hector nothing move.

Seeing then, formany examples of this matter presented unto your cies, you are to thinke and consider with your felle, that death doth deliver and preserve many men from great & gree. vous calamities, into which without all doubt they should have fallen, if they had lived longer: But for to avoid prolixitie, I will omit the rest, & my selfe, with those that are related already, as being sufficient to proove & shew; that we ought not to breake out beside nature, and beyond measure into vaine forrowes and needleffe lamentations, which bewray nothing else but base and feeble minds. Crantor the philosopher was wont to fay: That to suffer adversine causelesse, was no small easement to all finister accidents of fortune: but I would rather say: That innocencie is the greatest and most soveraigne medicine to take away the sense of all dolour in adversitie: moreover, the love and affection that we beare unto one who is departed, confifteth not in afflicting and punishing our selves; but in doing good unto him so beloved of us: now the pro- 40 fit and pleasure that we are able to performe for them who are gone out of this world, is the honour that we give unto them by celebrating their good memorials; for no good man deferveth to be mourned and bewailed; but rather to be celebrated with praile and commendation: Heis not woorthy of forrow and lamentation, but of an honorable and glorious remembrance; he requireth not teares as testimonials of griefe and dolour; but honest offrings, and civill oblations: if it be true, that he who is gone out of this world, doth pertake a more divine and heavenly condition of life, as being delivered from the servitude of this bodie, and the infinite ares perplexities, and calamities which they must needs endure, who abide in this mortall life, untill such time as they have runne their race, and performed the prefixed course of this life, which nature hath not granted unto us for to be perpetuall, but according to the lawes of fatall deftiny hath 50 given to every one in feverall proportion, Such therefore as be wife and well minded, ought not in forow and griefe for their friends departed, to passe beyond the bounds and limits of nature, and in vaine plaints and barbarous lamentations forget a meane, and never know to make an end, expecting that which hath befallen to many before them, who have bene fo far gone in heavinesse and melancholie, that before they had done lamenting, they have finished their daies, and ere they could lay off the mourning habit for the funerals of others, they have bene ready themselves to be carried forth to their unhappie sepulture: insomuch as the sorowes which they enterteined for the death of another, and the calamities proceeding from their owne folly, have bene buried together with them; fo as a man might very well and truely fay of them as Whiles they their plaints and sorowes made, Darke-night over-spread them with her shade.

And therefore in fuch case we are effoones thus to speake unto our selves, and reason in this manet : What? fhall we make an end once? or rather never cease so long as we live? but still keepea weeping and wailing as we do? for I affure you, to thinke that forrow thould never end, were a point of extreame folly, confidering that often times we see even those, who of all others to take on and fare most impartiently in their fits of griefe and heavinesse, become (in processe of time) so well appealed, that even at those tombs and monuments where they piteously cried out and knocketheir brefts, they metafterwards folemnly to make magnificent feafts, with muficke, minstrellie, and all the meanes of mirth that might be devised. It is the propertie therefore of a mad man and one bereft of his wits, to refolve and fet downe with himselfe to dwell evermore in forow, and not to give it over: but if men thinke and reckon, that it will cease at length and paffe away, by occasion of some thing that may occurre, let them call this withall, that space of time, will (after a fort) doe it: for that which once is done, can not by God himselfe be undone: and therefore that which now is hapned contrary to our hope and expectation, is a sufficient proofe&demonstration of that which is wont to befall unto many others by the same meanes. How then? is not this athing that we are able to comprehend by learning and discourse of reafonin nature? to wit:

The earth is full, and sea likewise,
Of sundricevils and miseries.
As also:
Such mischiefs ay, and strange calamities,
Are daily one after another sent Tomortall men by fatall destinies;

The skie it felfe is not thereof exempt. For not onely in these daies, but time out of minde, many men (and those of the wifer sort) have 30 deploted the miseries of mankinde, reputing life it selse to be nothing els but punishment; and the verie beginning of mans birth and nativitie, to be no better than woe and miserie. And Arifotle faith: That even Silenus, when he was caught and taken captive, pronounced as much untoking Midas. But forafmuch as this matter maketh fo well to our purpose, it were best to ferdowne the very words of the faid Philosopher; for in his booke entituled Eudemus or Of the Soule, thus he saith: Therefore (quoth he) ô right excellent and of all men most fortunate, as we esteeme the dead to be blessed and happy, so we thinke that to make a lie or speake evil of them, is meere impietic, and an intolerable abuse offered unto them, as being now translated into a far better and more excellent condition than before: which opinion and custome in our countrey is so ancient and of such antiquitie, that no man living knoweth either the time when it first began, or the first authour thereof, who brought it in: but from all eternitie this custome hath 40 began, or the first antifort thereof, who or only beneamong us observed for a law. Moreover, you know full wel the old faid faw, that from time beneamong us observed for a law. to time hath run currant in every mans mouth: And what is that? quoth he: then the other presently inferred this answere, and said: That simplie it was best, not to be borne at all, and to diebetter than to live: and hereto have accorded and given testimonie, the very gods themfelves, and namely, unto king Midas who having in chafe and hunting (upon a time) taken Silenus, demanded of him what was best for man? and what it was that a man should wish for and chuse above all things in the world? at the first he would make no answere, but kept silence, and gave not fo much as a word, until fuch time as Midas importuned and urged him by all means; to as at length (leeing himfelfe compelled even against his will) he brake out into this speech, 30 and faid unto him: O generation of small continuance! ô secd of laborious and painfull destinie!ô issue of fortune, wretched and miserable! why force you me to say that unto you, which it were better for you to be ignorant of? for that your life is leffe dolorous and itselome, when ithathnoknowledge at all of her owne calamities; but so it is, that men by no meanes can have that which fimply is best, nor be partakers of that which is most excellent: for best it had beene for all men and women both, never to have bene borne at all; the next to it, and indeed the principall and chiefe of all those things that may be effected, (however in order it falleth out to be fecond) as to die immediatly after one is borne. So that it appeareth plainly, that Silenus judged and pronounced the condition of the dead to be better than of the living. For the proofe of which conclution, ten thouland fentences and examples there be, and ten thouland more upon the head of them, which may be alledged: but needleffe it were, to difcourfe farther of this point, and make more words thereof. Well then: we ought not to lament the death of yong folke, in this regard, that they be deprived of those bleffings and benefits which men doe enjoy by long life: for uncerteine it is (as we have thewed often times before) whether they be deprived of good things or delivered from bad; confidering that in mans life there be farre more for once, than joics; and those (as few as they be) we get with much paines, great travell, and many cares; whereas calaunties and evils come cally unto us; infomuch (as fome men fay) they be round and united close, and following aprly one upon another; whereas good things be separate and disjoined, infomuch as hardly they neet together at the very end of mans life; and to therefore it seemeth that we forget our selves; for as Europides sant:

Not onely worldly goods are not Proper to 1 sen when they are got, but not any thing els whatfoever; and therefore of all fuch things we are thus to fay:

The gods have all inrig bifull propertie, And under them, at will we tenants be, To bold and ufe the fame, some more some lesse,

Untill they please to quite to dispossiffe. We ought not therefore to be grieved and discontented, if they redemand of us that which 10 they have lent and put into our hands, onely for alittle while; for even the banquers themfelves (as we were wont oftentimes to fay) are not displeased or offended when they be called unto or conftrained to render and give up those stocks of money that have beene committed unto them, if they be boneft men, and well minded: for a man may by good right fay unto those who are mowilling to redeliver the same: Hast thou forgotten that thou didst receive these monies to repay againe? And the very fame may be applied unto all mortal men: for we have our life at Gods hands, who upon a fatall necessitie, have lent and left the same unto us; neither is there any time fore-fet or prefixed, within which we ought to yeeld the fame; no more than the forefaid banquers are limited to fome appointed day, on which they are bound to deliver up those flocks of money which be put into their hands; but unknowen and uncerteine it is when they 30 thall be called unto, for to render the fame to the owners. He therefore who is exceeding much displeased, & angrie, when he perceiveth himselfe readie to die; or when his children have changed this life; is it not evident that he hath forgotten, both that himselfe is a man, and also thathe begot children mortall? for furely it is no part of a man whose understanding is cleere and entire, to be ignorant in this point, namely that man is a mortall creature, or that he is borne upon this condition, once to die: and therefore if dame Niebe, according as fables recount unto us, had been alwaies furnished with this opinion and tetled resolution; That the would never have fared to, and fallen into fuch despaire, as to defire to be out of the world, for the unsupportable burden of her calamitie, and even to conjure the gods for to fetch her away, and plunge her into most horrible destructions. Two rules and precepts there are written in the temple of whollow, at Delphas, which of all others be most necessaries for mans life; the one is, know thy selfe; and the other; Too much of nothing; for of these twaine depend all other bestions, and these two accord and sound very well together; for it seemeth that the one doth declare the other, and containe the force and efficacie one of the other; for in this rule; know thy so selfic, is comprised; Nothing too much: likewise in this, a mandoth comprehend the know-kalge of himselse; and therefore some temples who poets the selfice is not the supplementation.

Know thy felfe; awordbut flort, Implies aworke not quickly done, Of all the gods and heavenly fort None skils thereof but heavenly jove alone. And Pindur wwitcth in this wife: This fentence briefe: Nothing excessively, N'ise men have prais' d alwaies exceedingly.

Wholoever therefore setteth alwaies before the cies of his minde these two precepts, and holdesh them in such reverence as the oracles of Apollo deserve, he shall be able to apply them easily unto all the affaires and occurrents of humane life, and to beare all things modestly as it becommeth, both having a regard to his owne nature, and also endevouring neither to mount up too high with pride and vain-glorie, sor any happie fortune that may befall, nor yet be dejected and cast downe beyond measure, to mourning and lamentation upon infirmitic offortune, or rather of the minde, or by reason of that inbred seare of death imprinted deepely in our hearts for want of knowledge and good consideration of that which is ordinary, and customably happeth in mans life, either through necessitie, or according to the decree of stall destinic. Notable is that precept of the Pythagoreans:

What part thou haft of griefe and woe, which unto man is fent, By hand of God, take well in woorth, and shew no discontent.

And the tragicall poet Aefchylus faid very well:

Wife men and vertuous in all woe and diffresse,

Against God will not murmure more or lesse.

As also Euripides:

The man who yeelds unto nece fitie,
Well skilled is in true divinitie:
And fuch we count, and not un woorthily

To beare themselves among men most wisely.

And in another place:

Who knows the way, what ever doth befall

With patience meekely to suffer all; Inmy conceit, he may be thought right well, In vertue and wifedome all men to excell.

But contrariwife, most men in the world complaine and grumble at every thing; and whatsoever falleth out crosse and contrary to their hope and expectation, they imagine the same to go proceed alwaies from the malignitie of fortune and the gods; which is the reason that in all accidents they weepe, waile, and lament; yea, and they blame their owne froward and adverse fortune: tinto whom we may very well and with great reason reply in this maner:

No God it is, nor heavenly wight, That works thy woe, and all this spight.

but even thine owne felfe, thy folly and errour proceeding from ignoraunce: and upon this falfe perfuafion and erronious opinion it is, that these men complaine of all forts of death; for if any of their friends chaunce to die in a forreine countrey, they fetch a deepe sigh in his behalfe, and cry out saying:

Alas poore wretch, wo's me for thee, that neither father thine, Nor mother deere shall present be, to close thy sight-lesse cien.

Dieth he in his owne native foile, and in the prefence of father and mother? they mourne and lament, for that being taken out of their hands, he hath left unto them nothing elfe behind, but adeepe impression of griefe, in seeing him die before their eies: Is it his hap to depart out of this world in silence, and without giving any charge of ought concerning him or them? then they cry out amaine, and breake foorth into these words; as he did in Homer:

Also the while that no wife speech and lesson thou me gave, Which while my breath and life doth last, I should remembred have.

Againe, if he delivered any words unto them at the houre of his death, they will evermore have the fame in their mouthes to kindle anew and refresh their forow: went he suddenly, and never 50 bad his friends strewell, when he departed? they lament and say: That he was ravished away and forcibly taken from them: if he languished, and was long in dying, then they sal a complaining, and give out; that he consumed and pined away; enduring much paine before hee died: to be thort, every occasion & circumstance whatsoever, is enough to thire up their griefe, and minister matter to mainteine forowfull plaints. And who be they who have mooved and brought in all these outcries and lamentations, but Poets, and even Homer himselfe, most of all other, who is the chiefe and prince of the rest, who in this maner writeth:

Like as a father, in the fire of wofull funerals,

Burning the bones of his yoong fonne, foone after his espousals, Sheds many teares for griese of minde, and weepesh bitterly: The mother likewise (tender heart) bewailes him piteously, Thus he by his untimely death, both parents miserable, Afflicts with sorrowes mansfold, and woes mexplicable:

But all this while it is not certeine whether it bewel and rightly done, to make this forrow; for fee what followeth afterwards:

He was their onely fonne, and borne to them in their olde age, Sole heire of all, and so enjoy a goodly heritage.

And who knoweth, or is able to fay, whether God in his heavenly providence and fatherly cate of mankinde, hath taken some out of the world by untimely death, foreseeing the calamities and miseries which otherwise would have hapned unto them? and therefore we ought to thinke that nothing is befallen them which may be supposed odious or abominable:

For nothing grievous thought may be, Which commeth by necessitie.

Nothing (I fay) that hapneth to man, either by primitive cause immediatly, or by consequences aswell in this regard, that often times most kinds of death preserve men from more grievous aduersities, and excuse them for greater miseries; as also for that it is expedient for some, never to have bene borne, and for others, to die in their very birth; for fome, a little after they been tred into this life, and for others againe, when they are in their flower, and growen to the verie height and vigor of their age: all which forts of death, in what maner foever they come, men are to take in good part, knowing that whatfoever proceedeth from fatall destinie, can not possible be avoided; and befides, reason would, that being well taught and instructed, they should consider and premeditate with themselves, how those whom we thinke to have bene deprived of their life before their full maturitie, go before us but a little while; for even the longest life that is can be effeemed but fhort, and no more than the very minute and point of time, in comparison of infinit eternitie: also, that many of them who mourned and lamented most, within a while have gone after those whom they bewailed, and gained nothing by their long forow; onely they have in vaine afflicted and tormented themselves: whereas, seeing the time of our pilgrimage here in this life is so exceeding short, we should not consume our selves with heavine steam sadnesse, 10 nor in most unhappie forrow and miserable paines, even to the punishing of our poore bodies with injurious mifulage; but endeyour and strive to take a better and more humane course of life, in converfing civilly with those persons who are not ready to be pensive with us, and fitto ftirre up our forrow and griefe after a flattering fort; but rather with fuch as are willing & meet to take away or diminish our heavinesse, with some generous and grave kinde of consolation: and we ought to have ever in minde these verses in Homer, which Hellor by way of comfortdelivered unto his wife Andromache, in this wife:

Unhappy wight, do not my heart vexe and follicit still,
For noman shorten shall my daies, before the heavenly will:
And this (I say) Andromache, that fatall destinie,
No person good or had, once borne, avoide an possibly.
And of this shall destinic the same Poet speaketh thus in another place:
No sooner out of mothers wombe, are babes brought forth to light,
But destinic hash shuthe thread for every mortall wight.

These and such like reasons, if we would conceive and imprint before-hand in our mindes, we should be free from this soolish heavinesse, and delivered from all melancholy; and namely, considering how short is the terme of our life betweene birth and death, which we ought therefore to spare and make much of, that we may passe the same in tranquillitie, and not interrupt it with carking cares and dolefull dumps, but laying assisted the marks and habits of heavinesse, have a regard both to cheerish our owne bodies, and also to procure and promote the welfare and good of those who live with us. Moreover, it will not be amisse to call to minde and remember those arguments and reasons, which by great likelihood wee have sometime used to our kindes sold and striends, when they were afflicted with like calamities, when as by way of consolation we exhorted and perswaded them to be are the common accidents of this life with a common course of patience, and humanic cases, humanely. Neither must we show our selves so far short and faultie, as to have bene sufficiently furnished for to appease the sorrow of others, and not be able by the remembrance of such comforts, to do our selves good: we ought therefore present.

ly to cure the anguish of our heart with the sovereigner emedies and medicinable drogues (as it were) of reason; and so much the sooner, by how much better we may admit delay in any thing els than in discharging the heart of griefe and melancholie: for whereas the common proverbe and by-word in every mans mouth, pronounceth thus much:

Who loves delaies, and his time for to flacke,

Lives by the loffe, and shall no forrows lacke. Much more dammage (I supose) he shall receive, who deferreth and putteth off from day to dayto be discharged of the grievous and adverse passions of the minde. Aman therefore is to turne his eies toward those worthy personages who have shewed themselves magnanimous and 10 of great generofitie in bearing the death of their children: as for example, Anaxagoras the Clanomenian, Pericles and Demosthenes of Athens, Dion the Syracufian, and king Antigonus, befides many others, both in these daies and also in times past : of whom, Anaxagor as (as we reade in historie) having heard of his sonnes death by one who brought him newes thereof, even at what time as he was disputing in naturall philosophie, and discoursing among his scholers and disciples, paused a while, and staied the course of his speech, and said no more but thus unto those who were about him: Well I wish that I begat my sonne to be a mortall man. And Perieles who for his paffing eloquence and excellent wisedome, was surnamed Olympius, that is to fay, divine and heavenly; when tidings came to him that his two fonnes Paralus and Xamippus hadboth changed this life, behaved himfelfe in this manner as Protagoras reporteth of him in 20 thefe words: When his two fonnes (quoth he) both yoong and beautifull, died within eight daies, one after the other; he never shewed any fad countenance or heavie cheere, but tooke their death most patiently: for in truth he was a man at all times furnished with tranquillitie of foirit, whereby he daily received great frute and commoditie; not onely in respect of this happinesse; that he never tasted of hearts griefe; but also in that he was better reputed among the people; for every man feeing him thus flourly to take this loffe and other the like croffes, esteemed him valiant, magnanimous, and of better courage than himselfe; the one being privie to his owne heart, how he was woont to be troubled and afflicted in such accidents: As for Perules I say, immediately after the report of both his sons departure out of this world, he ware a chaplet of floures neverthelesse upon his head, after the maner of his country, put on a white 30 tobe, made a folemne oration to the people, propounded good and fage counfels to the Athenians, & incited them to war. Semblably Xenophon one of the followers & familiars of Socrates; when he offred facrifice one day unto the gods, being advertifed by certaine meffengers returned from the battel, that his fonne Gryllus was flaine in fight; prefently put off the garland which was upon his head, and demannded of them the manner of his death; and when they related unto him that he bare himselfe valiantly in the field, and fighting manfully lost his life, after he had the killing of many enemies; he tooke no longer paule for to represse the passion of his mind by the discourse of reason, but after a little while, set the coronet of flowers againe upon his head, and performed the folemnitie of facrifice; faying unto those who had brought those tidings; I never praied unto the gods that my fonne should be either immortall, or long lived, 40 for who knoweth whether this might be expedient or no ? but this rather was my praier, that they would vouchfafe him the grace to be a good man, and to love and ferve his countrey well, the which is now come to paffe accordingly. Dion likewife the Syracufian, when he was fet one day in confultation, and devifing with his friends, hearing a great notic within his house, and a loud outery, demannded what it was? and when he heard the mischaunce that hapned; to wit, that a sonne of his was fallen from the top of the house, and dead with the fall; without anie fhew or figne at all of aftonishment or trouble of mind, he commanded that the breathlesse corps should be delivered unto women, for to be interred according to the maner of the countrey; and as for himselfe, he held on and continued the speech that hee had begun unto his friends. Demostheres also the oratour is reported to have followed his steps; after he had buried 50 his onely and entirely beloved daughter, concerning whom, Aefchines thinking in reprochfull wife to chalenge her father, faid thus: This man within a feven night after his daughter was departed, before that he had mourned or performed the due obsequies according to the accustomed manner; being crowned with a chaplet of flowers, and putting on white robes, facrificed an oxe unto the gods, and thus unnaturally he made no reckoning of her that was dead, his onely daughter, and the that first called him father, wicked wretch that he is: this Rhetorician thus intending to accuse and reproch Demosthenes, used this manner of speech, neverthinking that in blaming him after this manner he praised him, namely, in that hee rejected and cast behind him all mourning, and shewed that he regarded the love unto his native countrey, more than the naturall affection and compaffion to those of his owne bloud. As for king Antigonus, when he heard of the death of his founc Alegoness, who was flaine in a battell, he beheld the mellengers of these wofull tidings, with a constant and undaunted countenaunce; but after he had muled a while with filence, and held downe his head, he uttered these words: O Aleyoners, thou hast loft thy life later than I looked for, ventring thy felfe to refolutely as thou halt done among thine enemies, without any care of thine owne fafetic, or respect of my admonitions. These no. ble perfonages, there is no man but doth admire and highly regard for their constance & mag. nanimitie; but when it commeth to the point and triall indeed, they cannot imitate them through the weakenesse and imbecillitie of mind, which proceedeth of ignorance, and want of good instructions: howbeit, there be many examples of those who have right nobly and vertuoully caried themselves in the death and losse of their friends and neere kinsmen which we may reade in histories, as well Greeke as Latin; but those that I have rehearsed already may suffice (Huppose) to moove you for to lay away this most irksome mourning, and vaine forrow that you take, which booteth not, nor can ferve to any good: for that young men of excellent vertue, who die in their youth, are in the grace and favour of the gods, for being taken away in their best time, I have already thewed heeretofore, and now also will I addresse my selfe in this place as briefly, as possibly 1 can to discourse, giving testimonic of the truth to this notable wiseson tence of Menander :

To whom the gods vouchfafe their love and grace, He lives not long but loone hath runne his race.

Bur peradventure (my most loving and right deere friend) you may reply in this maner upon me: Namely, that young Apollorine, your fonne, enjoied the world at will, and had all things to his hearts define; yea, and more befitting it was, that you should have departed out of this life, and beene enterred by him, who was now in the flower of his age, which had beene more answerable to our nature, and according to the course of humanitie. True it is Leonsestly in haply not agreeable to that heavenly providence and government of this universall world; and verily in regard of him who is now in a blessed end end government of this investall world; and this lite longer than the terme prefixed and limited unto him; but after the had honestly performed the course of his time, it was need tall and requisit for him to take the way for to returne upon his destinite that called for him to come sugardon him the hard beful of the happier heas, in that he hath felt no more miseries of this life for as Emipides said very well:

That which by name of life we call, Indeed is travell communil.

Certes, this fonne of yours (I must needs say) is soone gone, and in the very best of his yeeres and flower of his age, a yoong man in all points entire and perfect, a fresh bacheler, affected, effectmed and well reputed of all those who kept him companie, loving to his father, kinde to his mother, affectionate to his kinfefolke and friends, studious of good literature, and (to lay allina word) a lover of all men; respecting with reverence (no lesse than fathers) those friends, who 40 were elder than himselfe, making much of his equals and familiars, honoring those who were his teachers; to strangers aswell as to citizens most civill and courteous; gracious and pleasant to all; generally beloved, aswell for his sweet attractive countenance, as his lovely affabilitie. All this (I confesse) is most true; but you ought to consider and take this withall: That he is translated before us in very good time out of this mortall and transitorie life into everlasting eternity, carying with him the generall praise and bleffed acclamation of all men for his pietre and observance toward you, as also for your fatherly regard of him; and departed he is as from some banquet, before he is fallen into drunkennesse and follie, which hee could not have eschewed, butit would have enfued upon olde age: and if the faying of ancient Poets and Philosophers bettue, as it feemeth verily to be, namely: That good men and those that devoutly serve God, when to 50 ever they die, have honour and preferment in the other world, and a place allotted them apart, where their foules abide and converfe; furely you are greatly to hope very well, that your fonne is canonized and placed in the number of those bleffed faints; concerning the state of which happie wights deceased, Pindurus the Lyricke Poet, writeth in his canticles after this maner:

When we have herethe fludie night, The shining sunne to them gives light: The medowes by their citie side Wish roses red are beautified, Shaded with trees which please the sense,
Wish golden fruits and sweet incense:
Some, borses ride for exercise,
Disporting in most comely wise;
Others delight in harmonic,
In musicke and in symphonic.
I be slive where plensic ever ie houre
Of all delights doub frestly sloure;
Where alt ars of the gods do sume
In every coast with sweet persume,
Of odors all most redolent,
Burning in fire farre resplendent,
Which is maintein d cominnally:
Thus they converse right pleasants.

And a little after he proceedeth to another lamentable dittie, wherein speaking of the soule, he uses the words:

Happie is their condition,
Whom death from all wexation
Exempted but h: all books dis
Perforce, there is no remedie:
The foule, of perpetuitie
The througe, from divinitie
Onely dervi d, dath live alway,
And is not knowen for to decay:
Whiles limmes to wake and worke are press,
She takes her sleepe and quiet rest,
And doth by many dreames present
To those who sleepe, * her owne judgement,
As well of things which her displease,
As of such as do her well please.
Or thus:

* the due judgement, Afwell for vertuom deeds well done, As for foule facts which be misdone.

And as for that divine Philosopher Plato, he hath disputed much, and alledged many reasons in his * treatife of the foule, as touching the immortalitie thereof, like as in his books of policie, in * Called the dialogue intituled Menon, in that also which beareth the name of Gorgias, and in diversplaces of many others: But as concerning those discourses which he hath expresly made in his di-40 alogue, I will give you an extract thereof apart by it felfe, according to your request; and for this present I will deliver those points which are to the purpose, and expedient to the matter in hand, to wit, what Socrates faid to Callieles the Athenian, a familiar friend and scholar of Gorgias the Rhetorician. Thus therefore faith Socrates in Plato: Give eare then, and liften unto a most elegant speech, which you (I suppose) will thinke to be a meere fable or tale, but I esteeme an undoubted trueth, and as a true report I will relate it unto you! So it was, that (according to the narration of Homer) Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto, parted betweene themselves, the empire which fell unto them from their father: now this law there was concerning men, during the reigne of Saturne (which also stood in force time out of minde, and remaineth even at this day among the gods) That looke what man foever lead a just & holy life, after his death he should take his way 56 directly to certain fortunate illands, there to remain in bliffe & happineffe, freed fro all mifery and infelicitie; but contrariwife, he that lived unjuftly, without feare and reverence of the gods, should goe to a certeine prison of justice and punishment, named Tartarus, that is to say, Hell: now the judges who far judicially, and gave their doome of fuch persons, aswell in Saturnes daies, as in the beginning also of the reigne of Jupiter, were those men alive, who gave sentence and judgement of other men living, even upon that very day wherein they were to depart this life:by reason wherof there passed many judgements, not good, until such time as Pluto & other procurators or superintendents of those fortunate Isles came and made report unto Jupiter, that there were thither fent fuch persons as were not woorthy. Unto whom Jupiter made this answer I will take order from hencefoorth, and provide that it shall be so no more: for the cause of this disorder and abuse in judgement is this; that they who are to be tried, come clad and arraied unto the barre, for to receive their doome, whiles they are yet living; yea, & many of them haply having filthic foules, are apparelled (as it were) with faire and beautifull bodies, with nobilitie of birth and parentage, yea, and adorned with riches; and whiles they stand before the tribunal to be judged, many there be who come to depofe and give testimonic in their behalfe, that they lived well: the judges therefore (being dazzeled and amazed with these witnesses and depositions, being themselves also likewise arraied) do give sentence, having before, their minds, their cies, cares, teeth, and whole bodic covered; no marvell therefore if these be impediments to impeach found and fincere judgement, to wit, as well their owne vefture, as the raiment of the judges. First and formott therefore, good heed would be had, that men may know no more befor chand the houre of their death; for now they foresee the terme and end of life: whereup. on let Prometheus have first in charge, that from henceforth men may have no fore-knowledge of their dying day ; and then all judgements hecreafter shall passe indifferently of them that be all naked. For which purpose it were requisit that they be all first dead, as well the parties in que ftion, as the judges themselves; so that they come to heare causes and fit in judgement with their foules onely, upon the foules likewise of those who are departed; even so some as they are seperated from the bodies, being destitute now and forlorne of all kinsfolke and friends to assist them, as having left behind them upon earth, all the vefture and ornaments which they were to woont to have; by which meanes, the judgement of them may passe more just and right; which I knowing well enough, before you were acquainted therewith, have ordained mine owne founes to be judges; namely for Afia two, Minos and Rhadamanthus; and one for Europe, to wit, Aeneus: Thefe therefore after they be dead, shall fit in judgement within a meddow, at a quarrefour or croffe-way, whereof the one leadeth to the fortunate ifles, the other to hell: Rhidamant has thall determine of them in Afia; Meacus of those in Europe; and as for Minos I wil grant unto him a preeminence in judgement above the rest; in case there happen some matter unknowen to one of the other two, and escape their censure, he may upon weighing and examining their opinions, give his definitive fentence, and so it shall be determined by a most sincere and just doome, whether way each one shall goe. This is that O Callieles which I have heard, and 30 believe to be most true; whereout I gather this conclusion in the end; that death is no other thing than the separation of the soule from the body. Thus you see (ô Apollonius my most deere friend) what I have collected with great care and diligence, to compose for you fake a consolatorie oration or discourse, which I take to be most necessarie for you, as well to affwage and rid away your prefent griefe, to appeale likewife, and cause to cease this heavinesse and mourning that you make, which of all things is most unpleasant and troublesome; as also to comprise within it that praise and honour which (me thought) I owed as due unto the memorial of your fonne Apollonius, of all others exceedingly beloved of the gods: which honour in my conceit is a thing most convenient and acceptable unto those, who by happie memorie, and everlasting gloric are confectated to immortalitie. You shall doe your part therefore, and verie wifely, if 40 you obey those reasons which are therein conteined; you shall gratifie your sonne likewife, and doe him a great pleasure, in case you take up in time and returne from this vaine affliction (wherewith you punish and undoe both bodie and mind) unto your accustomed, ordinarie and naturall course of life: for like as whiles he lived with us he was nothing well appaied, and tooke no contentment to fee either father or mother fadde and defolate; even fo now, when he converfeth and solaceth himselfe in all joy with the gods, doubtlesse he cannot like well of this state wherein you are. Therefore plucke up your heart, and take courage like a man of woorth, of magnanimitie, and one that loveth his children well: release your selfe first, and then the mother of the yoong gentleman together with his kinsfolke and friends from 50 this kind of miserie, and take to a more quiet & peaceable maner of life, which will be both to your fonne departed, and to all of us (who have regard of your person, as it becommethus) more agreeable.

CONSOLOTARIE

LETTER, OR DISCOURSE

SENT UNTO HIS OWNE WIFE, AS TOUCHING THE DEATH OF HER AND HIS DAUGHTER.

Lutarch being from home, and farre absent, received newes concerning the death [] of a little daughter of his , a girle about two yeeres old,named Timoxene, a childe of a gentle nature, and of great hope: but fearing that his wife would apprehend such a loffe, too neere unto her heart; he comforteth her in this letter, and by giving teflimome unto her of vertue and constancie herved at the death of other children, of hers more forwardin age than she was ; he exhorteth her likewise to patience and inederation in this newe. occurrence and triall of hers; condemning by fundry reasons the excessive seriow, and unwoorthy sathion of many fond mothers, thewing withall, the inconveniences, that fuch excessive heavineffe dianethafter it. I hen continuing his confolution of her, he declareth with what cie we ought to regard infants and children afwell before, as during and after life; how happiethey be, who can content themselves and rest in the will and pleasure of God, that the blessings past, ought to dulce and mitigate the calamities present, to stay us also that we proceed not to that degree and height of infortunitie, as to make account onely of the misadventures and discommodities happing in this our life. Which done, he 30 answereth to certeine objections which his wife might propose and set on foot; and therewith delivereth his owne advice as touching the incorruption and immortalitie of mans foule (after he had made a medly of divers opinions which the ancient Philosophers held as teuching that point); and in the end concludeth: That it is better and more expedient to die betimes, than late: which position of his, he confirmeth by an ordinance precisely observed in his owne countrey, which expressly for bad to mourne and lament for those who departed this life in their childhoed.

A CONSOLATORIE LETTER

or Discourse, sent unto his owne wife, as touching the death of her and his daughter.

PLUTARCH unto his wife; Greeting.

He messenger whom you sent of purpose, to bring me word as touching the death of our little daughter, went out of his way (as I suppose) and so missed of me, as he journeyed toward Athens; howbeit, when I was arrived at Tonagra, I heard that the had changed this life. Now, as concerning the funerals and enterring of her, I am verily perswaded, that you have already taken sufficient order, so as that the thing is not to doe; and I pray God, that you have performed that ductie in fuch fort, that neither for the prefent, nor the time to come, it worke you any grievance & displeasure but if haply you have put off any fuch complements (which you were willing chough of your felfe to accomplish) untill you knew my minde and pleasure, thinking that in so doing, you should with better will and more patiently beare this adverse accident; then I pray you, let the same be performed without all curiositic and superstition; and yet I must needs say, you are as little given that way as any woman that I know: this onely I would admonish you, deare heart, that in this case, you show (both in regard of your selfe and also of me) a constancie and tranquillitie of minde : for mine owne part, I conceive and measure in mine owne heart. this loffe, according to the nature and greatnesse thereof, and so I esteeme of it accordingly; but if I should finde, that you tooke it impatiently, this would be much more grievous unto me. and wound my heart more, than the alamitie it felfe that caufeth it; and yet am not I begotten and borne either of an oake or a rocke; whereof you can beare me good witnesse, knowing that wee both together have reared many of our children at home in house, even with our owne hands; and how I loved this girle most tenderly, both for that you were very desirous (after foure fonnes, one after another in a row) to beare a daughter, as also for that in regard of that fancie. I tooke occasion to give her your name: now, besides that naturall fatherly affection, which men 10 comonly have toward little babes, there was one particular propertie that gave an edge thereto. and caused me to love her above the rest; and that was a speciall grace that she had, to make joy and pleasure, and the same without any mixture at all of curstnesse or frowardnesse, and no. thing given to whining and complaint; for the was of a woonderfull kinde and gentle nature. loving the was againe to those that loved her, and marvellous desirous to gratiste and pleasure others; in which regards, the both delighted me, and also yeelded no small testimonic of tare debonairitie that nature had endued her withall; for thee would make pretie meanes to her nourse, and sceme (as it were) to intreather to give the brest or pap, not onely to other infants, like her felfe, her play feeres, but also to little babies and puppets, and such like gauds as little ones take joy in, and wherewith they use to play; as if upon a fingular courtesie and humanitie 20 fhee could finde in her heart to communicate and distribute from her owne table, even the best things that shee had, among them that did her any pleasure. But I see no reason (sweetwise) why these lovely qualities and such like, wherein we tooke contentment and joy in her life time, should disquiet and trouble us how, after her death, when we either thinke or make relation of them : and I feare againe, left by our dolour and griefe, we abandon and put cleane away all the remembrance thereof, like as Clymene defired to do, when the faid:

as avoiding alwaies and trembling at the remembrance and commemoration of her fonne, which did no other good but renew her griefe and dolour; for naturally we feeke to flee all that 30 troubleth and offendeth us. We ought therefore to demeane our felves, that as whiles the lived, we had nothing in the world more fweet to embrace, more pleafant to fee, or delectable to heare than our daughter; so the cogitation of her, may still abide and live with us all our life time, having by many degrees our joy multiplied more than our heavinefle augmented: if it be meet and fit that the reasons and arguments which wee have often times delivered to others, thould profit us when time and occasion requireth, and not lie still and idle for any good wee have by them, nor challenge and accuse us, for that in stead of joies past, we bring upon our felves many more griefs by farre. They that have come unto us, report thus much of you, and that with great admiration of your vertue, that you never put on mourning weed, nor fo much as changed your robe, & that by no meanes you could be brought to disfigure your felfe or any 40 of your waiting maidens and women about you, nor offer any outrage or injurie to them in this behalfe; neither did you fet out her funerals with any fumptuous panegyricall pompe, as if it had bene some solemne feast, but performed every thing soberly and civilly, after a still maner, accompanied onely with our kinfefolke and friends. But my felfe verily made no great woonder (that you who never tooke pride and pleafure to be seene, either in theater or in publike proceffion, but rather alwaies effected all fuch magnificence fo vaine, and fumptuofitie superfluous, even in those things that tended to delight) have observed the most safe way of plannesse and simplicitie, in these occasions of forrow and sadnesse. For a vertuous and chastematrone ought not onely to keepe herselfepure and inviolate in Bacchanall feasts; but also to thinke thus with herfelfe, that the turbulent stormes of sorrow, and passionate motions of anguish had 50 no lesse need of continencie to resist and withstand, not the natural love and affection of mothers to their children, as many thinke, but the intemperance of the mind. For we allow and graunt unto this naturall kindnesse, a certaine affection to bewaile, to reverence, to wish for, to long after, and to beare in minde those that are departed; but the excessive and infatiable defire of lamentations, which forceth men and women to loud out-cries, to knocke, beat, and mangle their owne bodies, is no leffe unfeemely and shamefull, than incontinence in pleasures: howbeit, it seemeth by good right to deserve excuse and pardon, for that in this undecencie, there is griefe and bitternesse of forrow adjoined, whereas in the other, pleasure and delight: for what is more abfurd and fenceleffe, than to feeme for to take away exceffe of laughter and mirth; but contrariwife to give head unto streames of teares which proceed from one fountain, and to fuffer folke to give themselves over to weeping and lamentation as much as they will; as also that which fome use to doe, namely, to chide and rebuke their wives for some sweet perfinnes, odoriferous pomanders, or purple garments, which they are defirous to have; and in the meane while permit them, to teare their haire in time of mourning, to have their heads, to put on blacke, to fit unfeemely upon the bare ground, or in afters, and in most painfull manner tocrie out upon God and man; yea and that which of all others is woorst, when their wives 10 chastifeexceffively, or punish unjustly their fervants, to come betweene and state their hands; but when they rigorously and cruelly torment themselves, to let them alone and neglect them in those crosse accidents, which contrariwise had need of facilitie and humanitie? But betweene us twaine, fweet heart, there was never any need of fuch fraie or combat, and I suppose there will never be. For to speake of that frugalitie which is seene in plaine and simple apparell, or of sobrietie in ordinary diet, and tending of the bodie; never was there any philosopher yet converling with us in our house, whom you put not downe and strucke into an extraordinarie amaze, nor fo much as a citizen whom you caused not to admire (as a strange and woonderfull fight, whether it were in publicke facrifices, or infrequent theaters, and folemne processions) your rare simplicitie: femblably, herretofore you shewed great constancie upon the like con-20 flict and accident at the death of your eldest fonne; and againe when that gentle and beautifull Charon departed from us untimely, in the prime of his yeeres; and I remember very well that certainestrangers who journeied with me along from the sea side, (at what time as word was brought of my fonnes death) came home with others to my house, who seeing all things there felled, nothing out of order, but all filent and quiet (as they themselves afterward made report) began to thinke that the faid newes was falle, and no fuch calamitic had hapned; fo wifely had you composed all matters within house, when as iwis, there was good occasion given that might have excused some disorder and confusion; and yet this sonne you were nurse unto your felfe, and gave it fuck at your owne pappe; yea, and endured the painfull incifion of your breft, by reason of a cancerous hard tumour that came by a contustian. Oh, the generositie of a ver-30 tuous dame, and behold the kindneffe of a mother toward her children! whereas you shall fee many other mothers to receive their yoong babes at the hands of their nurses, to dandle & play withall forfooth, in mirth & pastime; but afterwards the same women (if their infants chance to die) give themselves over to al vain mourning, & bootlesse forow, which proceedeth not doubtleffe from good will indeed; (for furely heartie affection is reasonable, honest and considerate) but rather from a foolish opinion mingled with a little naturall kindnesse; and this is it that engendreth favage, furious, & implacable forowes. And verily Aefope (as it should feeme) was not ignorant heereof, for he reporteth this narration: That when Jupiter made a dole or distribution of honors among the gods and goddeffes; Sorrow came afterwards and made fute likewife to be honored, and so he bestowed upon her, teares, plaints, and lamentations; little for them 40 onely who are willing thereto, and ready to give her intertainment. And I affore you, this they commonly doe at the very beginning; for everie one of his owne accord bringeth in and admitteth forrow unto him, who (after the is once entertained, and in proceffe of time well fetled, fo that the is become domesticall and familiar) will not be driven out of dores nor be gone, if a man would never fo faine; and therefore refultance must be made against her, even at the verie gate, neither ought we to abandon our hold, and quit the fort, renting our garments, tearing or thearing our haires, or doing other fuchthings, as ordinarily happen every day; caufing a man to be confused, shamefull, and discouraged, making his heart base, abject and thut up, that he cannot enlarge it, but remaine poore and timorous; bringing him to this paffe, that he dare not be metrie, supposing it altogether unlawfull to laugh, to come abroad and see the sunne light, 50 to converse with men, or to eate or drinke in companie; into such a captivitie is he brought through forrow and melancholie: upon this inconvenience after it hath once gotten head, there followeth the neglect of the bodie, no care of annointing or bathing, and generally a retchlessend contempt of all things belonging to this life; whereas contrariwise and by good reason, when the mind is ficke or amisse, it should be helped and sustained by the strength of an able and cheerefull body: for a great part of the foules griefe is allaied, and the edge thereof as it were dulled, when the bodie is fresh and disposed to alacritie, like as the waves of the sea be laid even, during a calme and faire weather : but contrariwife, if by reason that the bodie be evill entreated, and not regarded with good diet and choifekeeping, it become dried, rough, and hard, in fuch fort, as from it there breathe no fweet and comfortable exhalations unto the toule, but all smookie and bitter vapors of dolour, griefe, and sadnesse annoy her; then is it no easie matter for men (be they never so willing and desirous) to recover themselves, but that their foules being thus feized upon by fo grievous passions, will be afflicted and tormented still. But that which is most dangerous and dreadfull in this case, I never feared in your behalfed to wit) That foolith women thould come & visit you, and then fall a weeping, lamenting, and crying with you; a thing (I may fay to you) that is enough to whet forrow, and awaken it if it were afleepe, not fuffring it either by it felfe, or by meanes of helpe and fuccour from another, to paffe, fade, & vanish away; for I know verie well what adoe you had, & into what a conflict you 10 entred about the fifter of Theon, when you would have affifted her & refifted other women who came into her with great cries & loud lamentations, as if they brought fire with them, in al hafte to maintaine & encrease that which was kindled already. True it is indeed, that when a friends or neighbors house is seene on fire, every man runneth as fast as he can to helpe for to quench the fame; but when they fee their foules burning in griefe and forrow, they contrariwife bring more fewel & matter stil to augment or keepe the faid fire: also if a man be diseased in his cies, he is not permitted to handle or touch them with his hands, especially if they be bloud shotten, and post fessed with any inflammation; whereas he who fits mourning and forrowing at home in his house, offereth and presenteth himselfe to the first commer, and to every one that is willing to irritate, fline, and provoke his passion, (asit were a floud or streame that is let out and set arun-10 ning) infomuch as where before the grievance did but itch or fmart a little, it now beginnes to shoot, to ake, to be fell and angrie, so that it becommeth a great and dangerous maladie in the end: but I am verily perswaded (I say) that you know how to preserve your selse from these extremnies. Now over and befides, endevour to reduce and call againe to mind the time when as we had not this daughter, namely, when the was as yet unborne; how we had no cause then to complaine of fortune; then, see you joine (as it were with one tenon) this present, with that which is palt, setting the case as if we were returned agains to the same state wherein we were before: for it will appeare (my good wife) that we are discontented that ever she was borne, in case we make thew that we were in better condition before her birth, than afterwards; nor that I wish we should abolish out of our remembrance the two yeeres space between her nativitie and decease; 20 but rather count and reckon it among other our pleasures and bleffings, as during which time, we had the fruition of joy, mirth, and passime, and not to esteeme that good which was but little and endured a forall while, our great infortunitie; nor yet feeme unthankfull to fortune, for the favour which the hath done unto us, because the added not thereto that length of life which we hoped and expected. Certes to rest contented alwaies with the gods; to thinke and speake of them reverently as it becommeth; notto complaine of fortune, but to take in good woorth whatfoever it pleafeth her to fend, bringeth evermore a faire and pleafant frute: but he who in these cases, putteth out of his remembrance the good things that he hath, transporting and turning his thoughts and cogitations from obscure and troublesome occurrents, unto those which be electe and resplendent; if he doe not by this meanes utterly extinguish his sorrow, yet at 40 leastwife by mingling and tempring it with the contrary, he shall be able to diminish or else make it more feeble: for like as a fweet odor and fragrant ointment delighteth and refresheth alwaies the fense of finelling, and besides is a remedic against stinking savours; even so the cogiragion of these benefits which menhave otherwise received, serveth as a most necessarie and present succour in time of adversitie unto as many as refuse not to remember and call to minde their joies paffed, and who never at all for any accident whatfoever complaine of fortune; which we ought not to doe in reason and honestie, unlesse we would seeme to accuse and blame this life which we enjoy, for fome croffe or accident; as if we cast away a booke if it have but one blut or blot in it, being otherwise written throughout most cleane and faire; for you have heard itoftentimes faid; that the beatitude of those who are departed, dependeth upon the right and sound 50 discourses of our understanding, and the same tending to one constant disposition; as also, that the chaunges and alterations of fortune beare no great fivay, to inferre much declination or cafualitie in our life: but if we also as the common fort, must be ruled and governed by external things without us, if we reckon and count the chaunces and casualties of fortune, and admit for judges of or felicitie our miserie, the base and vulgar fort of people; yet take you no heed to those teares, plaints, and moanes that men or women make who come to visit you at this prefent, who also (upon a foolish custome & as it were of course) have them ready at command for every one; but rather confider this with your felfe; how happie you are reputed, even by those who come unto you, who would gladly and with all their hearts be like unto you, in regard of those children whom you have, the house and family which you keepe, & the life that you leade; for it were an evill thing to fee others defire to be in your effate and condition for all the forrow which now afflicteth us, and your felfe in the meane time complaining and taking in ill part the fame, and not to be so happy and bleffed, as to find and feele (even by this crosse that now pincheth you, for the loffe of one infant) what joy you thould take, and how thankefull you ought to be for those who remaine alive with you: for heerein you should resemble very well, those Criticks, who collect and gather together all the lame and detective verfes of Homer, which are to but few in number; and in the meane time, paffe over an infinite fort of others, which were by him most excellently made. In this maner (I say) you did, if you would search narrowly, and examine every particular mishap in this life, and finde fault therewith; but all good bleffings in grofe, let go by, and never once respect the same; which to do, were much like unto the practise ofthosecoverous mifers, worldlings and peni-fathers, who cake and care, punish both bodic and minde, untill they have gathered a great deale of good together, and then enjoy no benefit or use thereof; but if they chance to forgo any of it, they keepe a piteous wailing and wofull lamentation.

Now if haply you have compaffion and pitie of the poore girle, in that the went out of this world a maiden unmarried, and before that the bare any children; you ought rather on the contarie fide, to rejoice and take delight in your felfe above others, for that you have not failed of the belfings, nor bene difappointed either of the one or the other: for who would holde and mainteine; that these things should be great to those who be deprived of them; and but simall to them, who have and enjoy the same? As for the childe, who doubtless is gone into a place where the feeleth no paine, surely she requireth not at our hands that we should afflict & grieve our selves for her sake: for what harme is there befallen unto us by her, if the her selsen ow feele nohurt? And as for the losses of great things indeed, surely they yeeld no sense at all of dolor, when they are come once to this point, that there is no more need of them, or care made for the. But verily, thy daughter Timoxena is bereft, not of great matters, but of small things, for in trueth, she had no knowledge at all, but of such neither delighted the in any, but in such; seeing then, that she had no perceivance nor thought of those things, how can she properly and truely be said to be deprived thereof?

Moreover, as touching that which you heard of others, who are woont to perswade many of the vulgar fort, faying: That the foule once separate from the bodie, is diffolved, and seeleth no paine or dolor at all: I am affured, that you yeeld no credit and beliefe to fuch politions; aswell in regard of those reasons and instructions which you have received by tradition from our anceftors, as also of those facred and symbolical mysteries of Bacchus, which we know well enough, who are of that religious confraternitie, and professed therein. Being grounded therefore in this principle, and holding it firmely for an undoubted trueth: That our foule is incorruptible and immortall; you are to thinke, that it fareth with it, as it doth with little birds that are caught 40 by the fowler alive, and came into mens hands: for if it have bene kept and nourished daintily a long time within the bodie, so that it be inured to be gentle and familiar unto this life, to wit, by the management of fundry affaires and long custome, it returneth thither againe, and reentreth a second time (after many generations) into the bodie; it never taketh rest nor ceaseth, but is inwrapped within the affections of the flesh, and entangled with the adventures of the world, and calamities incident to our nature: for I would not have you to thinke that olde age is to be blamed and reproched for rivels and wrinckles, nor in regard of hoarie white haires, ne yet for the imbecillitie and feeblenesse of the body; but the worst and most odious thing in it, is this: That it causeth the soule to take corruption by the remembrance of those things whereof it had experience whiles it staied therein, and was too much addicted and affectionate unto it, whereby 50 it bendeth and boweth, yea, and reteineth that forme or figure which it tooke of the bodie, by being fo long devoted thereto; whereas that which is taken away in youth, pretendeth a better estate and condition, as being framed to a gentler habit, more soft, tractable and lesse compact, Putting on now a naturall rectitude, much like as fire, which being quenched, if it be kindled agame, burneth out, and recovereth vigor incontinently: which is the cause that it is farre better

And frome to passe the gases of death, before that the soule have taken too deepe an imbibition or liking of terrene things herebelow, and cre it be made foft and tender with the love of the bodie, and (as it were) by certeine medicines and forcible charmes united and incorporate into it. The trueth hereof may appeare yet better, by the fathions and ancient customes of this countrey; for our citizens (when their children die yong) neither offer mortuaries, nor performe any facrifices & ceremonies for them, as others are wont to do for the dead: the reason is, because they have no part of earth nor earthly ly affections; neither doe they keepe about their tombs and sepulchres, nor lay forth the dead corps abroad to be seene of men, nor fit necre unto their bodies: for our lawes and statutes doe not permit and suffer any mourning at all for those that so depart in their minoritie, as being a custome not holy and religious; for that wee are to thinke they passenint a better place and happier condition. Which ordinances and customes, fince it is more dangerous nortogive redit unto, than beleeve, let us carie and demeane our selves according as they command, for outward order; as for within, all ought to be more pure, wise and uncorrupt.

THE PUNISHMENT OF WICKED PERSONS,

The Summarie.

Orasmuch as the order of all considerate sustice importeth and requireth, that goodmen 30 should be mainteimed and cherished, but contrariwise, wicked per sons repressed and put in sustained for their leud acts: the Epicureans (drunken & intoxicate with susse supposals, ceing in the conduct of this worlds assaires, some that be honest and versuous, districtives and oppressed by divers devices and practises; whereas others againe, who be naught and victous, continue in repose, without any chastifement at all for their misdemeanors) would needs take from God the dispose and government of humane affaires, holding and mainteining this point: That all things roll and run at a venture, and that there is no other cause of the good and evil accidents of this life, but enther fortune or els the will of man. Now among other arguments which they have to confirme themselves in this unhappie and impious opinion, the patience and long suffering 10 of the divine justice, is one of the principall; concluding thereby very fondly, that (considering makfa-Etors are thus supported and seene to escape all chastifement) there is no Deitie or Godhead at all, which regardeth men, either to reward them for vertue, or to punish and do vengeance for their iniquity and transgresson. Plutarch therefore, having to deale in his time with such dangerous spirits, confutesh them in this treatise, which of all others is most excellent, and deserves his beread and perm sedower againe in these wretched daies, wherein Epicurisme beareth up the head as high as at any time ever before. True it is (I confesse) that Theologie and Divinitie is able to furnish us with reasons and answeres more firme and effectuall (without comparison) than all the Philosophie of Pagans what soever: how beit, for all that, there is here sufficient to be found (as touching this point) for to stoppe the mouthes of those who have any remnant of shame, boneftie or conscience behinde in them. 50 This present treatise may very well be divided into two principall parts: in the former, Epicurus being brought in to dispute against devine providence, and so departing without stay for answere, other Philosophers deliberate to be resolved of this point in his absence : and before that they refute his objection, two of them doe amplifie and exaggerate the same at large: which done, our authour taketh the question in hand, and by seven soreible arguments or firme answeres, refelleth the blashbemie of the Epicureans, proving by fundry arguments, enriched with similitudes, fentences, examples and notable histories, that wieked persons never continue unpunished, but that the vengeance of God accompanieth quickly and cominually their miscleds. In the second part, they debate a certaine question depending of the precedent objection, to wis, Wherefore children be chassised for the similar and their stations and ancessors and increase a certaine Philiopher, named Timon, who handled this matter, taxing after an oblique maner, the justice of God, which Plutarch mainteineth and defendeths, showing by divers reasons, that what soever Timon had alledged, was meere false; and that God did no injurie at all until to those children, in with drawing his grace and seven from them, and chassissipped them with their parents, finding them likewise culpable for their pare. But in this place, our authour answereth not sufficiently and to the purpose; as being ignorant of originall sinne, and the universall corruption of Adams children, which enwrappeth them all in the same condemnation, although some are swither gone in sinsulins, which enwrappeth them all in the same condemnation, although some are swither much as we may well marvell at this, that a poore Pagan hat be for proceeded in this point of Theologie; and Christians have so much greater occasion to looke unto themselves, in the mids of this light which directes themse, considering how this mancould see so cleare in anxenife, which appeare the sufficiently in the end of this discourse; where he intermedice be certain fables as touching the state of our soules after they be parted from the bodies.

the divine justice deferreth otherwhiles the punishment of wicked persons.

Fter that Epicurus had made this speech (ô Cynius) and before that any one of us had answered him, by that time that we were come to the end of the galleric or walking place, he went his way out of our sight, and so departed; and we woondering much at this strange fashion of the man, stood still a pretie while in silence, looking one upon another, and so we betooke our selves to our walking againe, as before: then Patroeless began first to moove speech and conserence, saying in this maner: How now my masters! if youthinke so good, let us discussed this question, and make answere in his absence, to those reasons which be hath alledged, as well as if he were prefentin place: hereupon Timon tooke occasion to speake, and said: Certes it were not well done of us, to let him escape so without revenge, who hath left his dart sticking in us; for captaine Brasidas (as it appeareth in the Chronicles) being wounded with the shot of a javelin, drew it out of his bodie his owne selfe, and therewith simot his enemie who had hurt him, so as he will him outright: as for us, we need not so greatly to be revenged of those who have let slie among us, some rash, soolish and salse speeches; for it will be sufficient, to shake the same off, and send them backe againe, before our opinion take holde thereof. And what was it, I pray you (quoth 40 I) of all that which he delivered, that moved you most? for the man handled many things confusedly together, and nothing at all in good order, but kept a prating and babling against the providence of God, facing and inveighing most bitterly and in reprochfull tearmes, as if he had benein a fit of anger and rage. Then Paroeless: That which he uttered as touching the long delay and slacknesses of divine justice in punishing the wicked, in my conceit was a great objection and troubled me much, and to say a truth, their reasons and words which he delivered have imprinted in me a new opinion, so as now I am become a novice, and to begin againe to learne. True it is that long since I was discontented in my heart to heare Europides speake in this wise;

He putteth off from day to day, Gods nature is, thus to delay.

50 For itwere not meet and decent, that God should be slow lin any action whatsoever, and least of all in punishing sinners; who are themselves nothing slothfull, normake delaie in perpetrating wicked deeds, but are caried most specially and with exceeding violence of their passions, pricked forward to do wrong and mischiese. And verily when punishment ensueth hard after injury and violence committed; there is nothing as (Thursaides saith) that so some stoppeth up the passing against those who are most prone and ready to runne into all kinde of wickedness; for there is no delay of paiment that so much coseebleth the hope, and breaketh the heart of a man wronged and offended, nor causeth him to be so insolent and audacious, who is disosted disposed to mischiefe, as the deferring of justice and punishment: whereas contrariwise the corrections, & chastifements, that follow immediately upon leud acts, and meer with the malefactours betimes, are a meanes both to represse all future outrage in offenders, and also to com. fort and pacific the heart of those who are wronged. For mine owne part the saying of Bias trou. bleth me many times, as often as I thinke upon it, for thus he spake unto a notorious wicked man: I doubt not but thou shalt one day smart for this geere, and pay for thy leudnesse; but I feare I shall never live to fee it. For what good unto the Messenians being slaine before, did the punishment of Aristocrates, who having betraied them in the battell of Cypres, was not detec. ted and discovered for his treason in twentie yeeres after, during which time, he was alwaies king of Areadia, and being at the last convicted for the faid treacherie, suffred punishment for 10 his deferts? meane while, those whom he had caused to be massacred, were not in the world to fee it. Or what comfort and confolation received the Orchomenians, who lost their children, kinsfolke, and friends, through the treason of Lycifers, by the maladie which long after feized upon him, eating & confuming al his bodie? who ever as he dipped and bathed his feet in thetiver water, kept a swearing and cursing, that he thus rotted and was eaten away, for the treachers which most wickedly he had committed? And at Athens the childrens children of those poore wretches who were killed within the privileged place of fanctuarie, could never fee the vengeance of the gods which afterwards fell upon those bloudie and facrilegious caitifes, whose dead bodies and bones being excommunicate, were banished, and cast out beyond the confines of their native countrey. And therefore me thinkes Euripides is very abfurd, when to divert men 20 from wickednesse he useth such words as these:

Juffice (feare not) will not thee overtake, To pierce thy heart, or deepe wound ever make In liver thine; nor any mortall wight Befides, though leud he be, and doe no right. But flow she goes, and filent to impeach And chastife such, if over them she reach.

For I affure you, it is not like, that wicked & ungracious persons use any other perswalions, but even the very fame to incite, move and encourage themselves to enterprise any leud and wicked acts, as making this account and reckoning, that injustice will quickly yeeld her frute ripe in due 20 time, and the same evermore certaine: whereas punishment commeth late and long after the pleasure and fruition of the said wickednesse. When Parrocleas had discoursed in this wise, olympiacus tooke the matter in hand and faid unto him: Marke moreover (ô Patrocleas) what inconvenience and abfurditie followeth upon this flownesse of divine justice, and prolonging the punishment of malefactors? for it causeth unbeliefe in men, and namely, that they are not perfinaded that it is by the providence of God that fuch be punished; & the calamitie that cometh upon wicked ones, not presently upon every finful act that they have committed, but long time after, is reputed by them infelicitie, and they call it their fortune, and not their punishment; whereupon it commetts to passe, that they have no benefit thereby, nor be any whit better, for howfoever they grieve and be discontented at the accidents which befall unto them, yet they 40 never repent for the leud acts they have before committed. And like as in punishment among us, a little pinch, stripe, or lash given unto one for a fault or error, presently upon the dooing thereof, doth correct the partie, and reduce him to his dutie; whereas the wrings, fcourgings, knocks, and founding thumps, which come a good while after; feeme to be given upon fome occasion beside, and for another cause rather than to teach; and therefore well may they put him to paine and griefe, but instruction they yeeld none; even so naughtinesse rebuked and repressed, by some present chastisement, every time that it trespasset and transgresseth, howso ever it be painfull at first, yet in the end it bethinketh it felfe, learneth to be humbled, and to feare God as a severe justicier, who hath an eie upon the deeds and passions of men, forto punish them incontinently, and without delay; whereas this justice and revenge which commeth 50 fo flowly, and with a foft pace (as Euripides faith) upon the wicked and ungodly perfores, by reafon of the long intermission, the inconstant and wandring incertitude, and the consuled disorder resembleth chance and adventure more than the desseigne of any providence : insomuch as I cannot conceive or see what profit can be in these grindstones (as they call them) of the gods, which are folong a grinding; especially, seeing that the judgement and punishment of finners is thereby obleured, and the feare of finne made flight, and of no reckoning. upon the deliverie of these words, I began to studie and muse with my selfe: then Timon: Would you (quoth

he) that I should cleere this doubt once for all, and so make an end of this disputation ? or permithim first to dispute and reason against these oppositions? And what need is there (answered I) to come in with a third wave for to overflow and drowneat once our speech and discourse, if hebe not able to refute the former objections, nor to escape and avoid the chalenges alreadie made. First and formost therefore to begin at the head, and (as the manner is, to fay) at the goddesse Vesta, (for the reverent regard and religious feare that the Academick philosophers profeffe to have unto God, as an heavenly father) we utterly disclaime, and refuse to speake of the Deitie, as if we knew for certaintie what it is: for it were a greater prefumption in us who are but mortall men, to enterprise any set speech or discourse as touching gods or demi-gods, than To for one who is altogether ignorant in fong, to dispute of musick, or for them who never were in campe, nor faw fo much as a battell fought, to put themselves forward to discourse of armes and warfare; taking upon us, (unskilfull as we are, and void of art) a fantafticall knowledge, grounded onely upon some light opinion, and conjecture of our owne, as if we were right cunning workemen and artifanes: for it is not his part, who is not studied in the arte of Physick, to gesse at the reason and consideration that the physician or chirurgian had, why he made incission no fooner in his patient, but staied long ere he proceeded thereto? or wherfore he bathed him not vefterday, but to day ? femblably, it is neither easie nor fase for a mortall man to speake otherwife of the gods, than of those who knew well enough the due time and opportunitie to minister ameer and convenient medicine, unto vice and finne; and exhibit punishment to every tref-20 paffe, as an appropriate drouge, or confection to cure and heale ech maladie; notwithflanding that the fame measure and quantitie be not common to all delinquents, nor one onely time and the fame, is alwaies meet therefore. Now that the physicke or medicine of the foule, which is called Right and Justice, is one of the greatest sciences that are; Pindarus himselfe befides an infinit number of others, beareth witnesse; when he calleth the Lord and governour of the world, to wit, God, a most excellent and perfect artificer, as being the author and creatour of justice, unto whom it appertaineth to define and determine, when, in what manner, and howfar foorth, it is meet and reasonable to challice and punish each offender. Plato likewise faith: That Minos the fonne of Jupiter (was in this science) the disciple of his father; giving us hecreby to understand, that it is not possible for one to carie himselfe well in the execution of 30 justice, nor to judge a right of him that doth as he ought; unlesse he have before learned that science, and be throughly skilfull therein. Furthermore, the positive lawes which men have established, seeme not alwaies to be grounded upon reason, or to sound and accord in all respects with absolute equitie and justice; but some of their ordinances be such, as in outward appearance may be thought ridiculous, and woorthy of mockerie; as for example, At Laceda. mon the high controllers called Ephori, fo foone as they be enstalled in their magistracie, cause proclamation to be published by found of trumper, that no man should we are mustaches, or nourish the haire on their upper lips; also that willingly every man should obey the lawes, to the end that they might not be hard or grievous unto them. The Romans also, when they affranchife any flave, and make him free; cast upon their bodies a little small rodde or wande: like-40 wife when they draw their last wils or testaments, institute some for their heires, whom it pleafeth them, but to others they leave their goods to fell; a thing that carieth no fenfe nor reason with it. But yet more abfurd and unreasonable is that statute of Solons making, wherein it was provided: That what citizen foever, in a civill fedition, ranged not himfelfe to a fide, nor tooke part with one or other faction, should be noted with infamie, and disabled for being capable of any honorable dignitie. In one word, a man may alledge an infinit number of abfurdities befides, contained in the civill lawes; who neither knoweth the reason of the lawgiver that wrot them, nor the cause why they were set downe. If then it be so difficult to conceive and understand the reasons which have mooved men thus to doe, is it any marvell that we are ignorant of the cause, why God chastiseth one man sooner and another later? howbeit, this that I have said, 50 is not for any pretence of flarting backe and running away, but rather for to crave leave and pardon, to the end that our speech having an eie thereto, (as unto an haven and place of refuge;) might be the more hardie, with boldnesse to raunge foorth still in probabilities, to the matter in doubt and question: But I would have you to consider first, that (according to the saying of Plato) God having fet himselse before the eies of the whole world, as a perfect pattern and example of all goodnesse, doth unto as many as can follow and imitate his divinitie, infuse humane vertue, which is in some fort conformable and like unto him; for the generall nature of this univerfall world, being at the first a confused and disordered Chaos, obtained this principle and element, for to change to the better, and by some conformitie and participation of the Idea of divine vertue, to become this beautifull frame of the world: And even the verie same man of divine vertue, to become this beautifull frame of the world: And even the verie same man statch when the same, that by the site wand admiration of those celeticall bodies which moove in heaven, our soule might learne to embrace and be accustomed to love that which is beautifull and in good order, as also to be an enemie unto irregular and inordinate passions; yea, and to avoid doing of things rashly and at adventure, which in truth is the very source of all vice and sinne; for there is nothing in the world wherein a man may have a greater fruition of God, than by the example and imitation of his good and decent qualities, to become honest and vertuous: wherefore if we perceive him to proceed flowly, and in tract of time to lay his heavie hand upon the wicked, and to punish to them, it is not for any doubt or feare that he should doe amisse, or repent afterward if he chasticed them sooner, but by waining us from all beastly violence, & hastinesse in our punishments, to teach us not immediately to flie upon those who have offended us, at what time as our blowl is most up, and our choler set on a light fire, making haste as it were to fatisfic some great hunger, or quench exceeding thirst, but (by imitating his elemencie, and his maner of prolonging and making delay) to endevor for to execute justice in all order, at good leisure, and with most carefull regard; taking to counsell Time, which seldome or never is accompanied with repentance; for as Socrates was wont to say: Lesse, which seldome or never is accompanied with repentance; for as Socrates was wont to fay: Lesse, which seldome and danger there is, if a man meet with troubled and muddle water, and intemperately take and drinke thereof, than whiles his reason is confounded, corrupt, and full of choler and furious rage, to be set altogether upon revenge, and runne hastily ypon the punishment of another bodie, even one who is of his owne kinde and nature, before the same reason be seled againe, clensed and fully purissed. For it is nothing so as Thurydides writeth: That vengeance the neerer it is unto the offence, the more it is in the owne kind; but cleane contrary, the farther off it is, and longer delaied, the better it apprehendeth and judgeth of that which is sit and decent. For according as Melanthius saith:

When furious yre in hart so leapes and boiles,

When anger once dislodged bath the wit, even fo reason performeth all just and honest actions, when it hath chased and removed out of Foule worke it makes, and ourrage doth commit. the way, ire and wrath: and therefore men are mollified, appeafed, and become gentle by examples of men, when they heare it reported, how Plato, when hee lifted up his staffe against his page, stood so a good while, and forbare to strike; which hee did (as he said) for to represent choler. And Architas, when he found some great negligence and disorder at his ferme-house in the countrey, in his houfhold fervants, perceiving himfelfe moved and difquieted therewith, infomuch as he was exceeding angrie, and readie to flie upon them, proceeded to no act, but onely turning away and going from them, faid thus : It is happie for you, that I am thus angie with you. If then it be so, that such memorable speeches of ancient men, and woorthy acts reported by them, are effectuall to represse the bitternesse and violence of choler; much more 40 probable it is, that we (feeing how God himselfe, although he standeth not in feare of any perfon, nor repenteth of any thing that he doth, yet putteth off his chastisements, and laieth them up a long time) should be more wary and considerate in such things, and esteeme, that clemencie, long sufferance and patience is a divine part of vertue that God doth shew and teachus, which by punishment doth chastise and correct a sew, but by proceeding thereto slowly, doth instruct, admonish and profit many. In the second place, let us consider, that judiciall and exemplarie processe of justice practised by men, intendeth and aimeth onely at a counterchange of paine and griefe, refting in this point: That he who hath done evill, might suffer likewife; proceeding no farther at all and therefore baying and barking (as it were) like dogges at mens faults and trespasses, they follow upon them, and pursue after all actions by tract and footing: 50 but God (as it should seeme, by all likelihood) when hee setteth in hand in justice to correct a finfull & difeased soule, regardeth principally the vicious passions thereof, if haply they may be bent & wrought fo, as they will incline & turne to repentance; in which respect he stateth long before that he inflict any punishment upon delinquents, who are not altogether past graceincorrigible; for confidering withall, and knowing as he doth, what portion of vertue, foules have drawen from him in their creation, at what time as they were produced first and came into the world; as also how powerfull and forcible is the generolitie thereof, and nothing weake and see ble in it selfe; but that it is cleane contrary to their proper nature, to bring forth vices, which are engendered either by ill education; or els by the contagious haunt of leaud company; and how afterward, when they be well cuted and medicined (as it falleth out in some persons) they soone returne unto their owne naturall habitude, and become good againe: by reason heereof, God dothnot make hafte to punish all men alike, but looke what he knoweth to be incurable, that he quickly riddeth away out of this life, and cuteth it off, as a very huttfull member to others, but yet most harmefull to it felfe, if it foould evermore converse with wickednesse; but to such pertons in whom (by all likelihood) vice is bred and ingendred, rather through ignorance of goodnelle, than upon any purpose and will to chusenaughtinesse, hee giveth time and respit for to change and amend: howbeit, if they perfilt Hill, and continue in their leand waies, hee paieth them home likewise in the end, and never feareth that they shall escape his hands one time or other, but suffer condigne punishment for their deferts. That this is true, consider what great alterations there happen in the life and behaviour of men, and how many have beene reclaimed and turned from their leaudneffe; which is the reason that in Greeke our behaviour and converfation is called partly Tpomos that is to fay, A convertion; and in partifies, the one, because mens maners be subject to change and mutation; the other, for that they be ingendered by use or cuftome; and the impression thereof being once taken, they remaine firme and fure: which is the cause also (as I suppose) that our ancients in olde time attributed unto king Cecrops a double nature and forme, calling him Double; not for that (as some faid) of a good, element and gracious prince, he became a rigourous, fell and cruell tyrant, like a dragon; but contrariwife, because (having bene at the first perverte, crooked and terrible) he proved afterward, a milde and gentle lord : and if we make any doubt hereof in him, yet we may be fure (at leastwife) that Gelon and Hieroin Sicilie, yea, and Pifistratus the sonne of Hipocrates, all usurpers (who atteined to their tyrannicall dominion by violent and indirect meanes) used the same vertuously: and howsoever they came unto their fovereigne rule by unlawfull and unjust meanes, yet they grew in time to be good governours, loving and profitable to the common weale, and likewife beloved and deareunto their subjects; for some of them having brought in and established most excellent lawes in the countrey, and caused their citizens and subjects to be industriuous and painfull in tilling the ground; made them to be civill, fober and discreet, whereas before, they were given to be ridiculous, as noted for their laughter and lavish tongues; tobe true labourers also, and painfull, who had bene idle and playfull. And as for Gelon, after he had most valiantly warred against the Carthaginians, and defaited them in a great battell; when they craved peace, would never grant it unto them, unleffe this might be comprised among the articles and capitulations: That they should no more facrifice their children unto Saturne. In the citie also of Megalopolist here was a tyrant named Lydiades, who in the mids of his usurped dominion repented of his tyrannie, and made a conscience thereof, detesting that wrongfull oppression wherein he held his subjects, in such fort, as he restored his citizens to their ancient lawes and liberties, yea, and afterwards died manfully in the field, fighting against his enemies in the defence of his countrey. Now if any one had killed Atilitiades at the first, whiles he exercised tyrannie in Chersonefus; or if another had called judicially into question Cimon, enditing him for keeping his owne 40 fifter, and so being condemned of incest, had caused him to be put to death; or disfranchised and banished Themistocles out of the citie, for his loose wantonnesse and licentious insolencie thewed publickly in the Common place, as Alcibiades afterwards was ferved and profcribed, for the like excelle and rior committed in his youth:

Where had bene then that famous victorie Archieved on the plannes of Marathon? Where had bene that removemed chivalrie Performed neere the stream Eurymedon? Or at the mount, sure Artemission? Where Athens youth (as poet Pindare said) Freedome sir it the glorious ground-morke laid?

For foir is, that great natures and high minds can bring foorth no meane matters; nor the vehement force of action which is in them remaine idle, folively and fubtile it is, but they wave to and frocontinually, as if they were toffed by tempelt and winde upon the fea, untill fuch time as they come to be fetled in a constant firme, and permanent habitude of maners: like as therefore, he who is altogether unskilfull of husbandrie and tillage, maketh no reckoning at all of a ground which he feeth full of rough bushes and thickets, befer with savage trees, and overspread with ranke weeds; wherein allo there be many wilde beafts, many rivers, and by confequence, great flore of mudde and mire: but contrariwife, an expert husband, and one who hath good judgement, and can difference the difference of things, knoweth these and all such fignes, to betoken a fertile and plentifull foile; even fo great wits and hautie spirits, doe produce and put foorth at the first, many strange, absurd, and leud pranks, which we not able to endure, thinke, that the roughnesse & oficultive pricks thereof, ought immediately to be cropt off and cut away. but he who can judge better (confidering what proceedeth from thence good and generous) attendeth and expecteth with patience, the age and feafon, which is cooperative with vertue and reason, against which time, the strong nature in such, is for to bring foorth and yeeld her proper and peculiar frute. And thus much may fuffice of this matter.

But to proceed forward: Thinke you nor that fome of the Greeks have done well and wifely, 19 to make a transcript of a law in Egypt, which commaundeth; that in case a woman who is attaint and convicted of a capital crime, for which in justice the ought to die, be with childe, she should be kept in prison untill the were delivered? Yes verily, they all answered? Well then (quoth I) Set case there be some one who hath no children conceived in his wombe to bring foorth, but breedeth fome good counfell in his head, or conceiveth a great enterprise in his minde, which he is to bring to light, and effect in time, either by discovering an hidden mischiefe, or setting abroad an expedient and profitable counfell, or inventing fome matter of necessarie confequence: Thinke you not that he did better, who deferred the execution of fuch an ones punishment & flay until the utilitie that might growby him were feene, than he who inconfiderately 20 & in all hafte proceedeth to take revenge, & prevent the opportunitie of fuch a benefit? Cettes. for mine owne part, I am fully of that minde; and even we no leffe, answered Patrocleas, Well then (quoth I) it must need be so; for marke thus much: If Dionysius had beene punished for his usurped rule, in the beginning of his tyraunie; there should not one Grecian have remained inhabitant in Sietlie, for the Carthaiginans would have held the fame and driven them al outlike as it must needs have befallen to the citie Apollonia, to Anactorium, and the Chersonese ordemic itland Leucadia, if Periander had fuffered punishment at first, and not a long time after, as he did. And I suppose verily that the punishment and revenge of Casander was put off and prolonged of purpose, untill by that meanes the citie of Thebes was fully reedified and peopled againe . And many of those mercenary soldiers and strangers, who seized and held this temple 30 wherein we are, during the time of the facred warre, passed under the conduct of Timoleon into Sicilie, who after they had defaited in battell, the Carthaginians, and with all suppressed & abolished fundrie tyrannies, they came to a wretched end, wicked wretches as they were. For God in great wisedome and providence, otherwhiles maketh use of some wicked persons, as of butchers and common excutioners, to torment and punish others, as wicked as they or woorle, whom afterwards he destroieth; and thus in mine opinion he dealeth with most part of tyrants. For like as the gall of the wild beaft Hyana, and the rendles or rennet of the Sea-calfe, as also other parts of venemous beafts and ferpents, have one medicinable propertie or other, good to heale fundry maladies of men; even fo God feeing some people to have need of bitte and bridle, and to be chastised for their enormities, sendeth unto them some inhumane tyrant, or 40 a rigorous and inexorable lord to whip and fcourge them, and never giveth over to afflict and vexe them, untill he have purged and cleered them of that maladie wherewith they were infected. Thus was Phalaris the tyrant a medicine to the Agrigentines: thus Marius was sent as a remedie to cure the Romanes: as for the Sicyonians, even god himfelfe Apollo foretold them by oracle: That their citie had need of certaine officers to whippe and fcourge them, at what time as they would perforce take from the Cleoneans, a certain yong boy named Teletias, who was crowned in the folemnitie of the Pythian games, pretending that he was their citizen, and borne among them, whom they haled and pulled in fuch fort, as they difmembred him: But these Sicyonians met afterwards with Orthagoras that tyrannized over them; and when he was gone, they were plagued also with Myron and Clisthenes, and their favorites, who held them in 50 fo fhort, that they kept them from all outrages, and stated their insolent follies: whereas the Cleoneans, who had not the like purgative medicine to cure them, were subverted and through their mildemeanor come to nothing. Marke well therefore that which Homer in one place

His sonne he was, and in all kind of valour did surmount His father farre, who was (to fay a truth) of base account. And yet this sonne of Coprem never performed (in all his life) any memorable act, beseeming a man of woorth and honour: whereas the ofspring of Sifyphus, the race of Antolycus, and the posteritic of Phlegyas flourished in glorie, and all maner of vertue among great kings and princes. At Athens likewife, Pericles descended from an house excommunicate and accursed: And so at Rome Pompeius surnamed Magnus, that is, the Great, had for his father one Strabo, a man whom the people of Rome fo hated, that when he was dead, they threw his corps out of the hierewherein it was caried foorth to buriall, and trampled it under their feet. What abfurditio then were it, if as the husbandman never cutteth up or stocketh the thorne or bush, before he hath gathered the render sprouts and buds thereof: nor they of Libya burne the boughes of the plant Ledrom, untill they have gotten the aromaticall gumme or liquor out of it called Ladanum; to even fo God never plucketh up by the root, the race of any noble and roiall familie (wicked and wretched though they be) before it hath yeelded fome good and profitable frute: for it had bene farre better and more expedient for the men of Phoeis, that ten thousand beefs and as many horfes of Iphitus had died; that the Delphians likewife had loft much more gold and filver by farre, than that either ultiffes or Aefculaping thould not have bene borne; or others in like cafe, whole parents being wicked and vicious, were themselves honest and very profitable to the commonwealth. Are we not then to thinke, that it were far better to punish in due time and maner convenient, than to proceed unto revenge haltily and out of hand? like as that was of Callippus the Athenian, who making femblance or friendship unto Dion, stabbed him at once with his dagger, and was himselfe afterwards killed with the same, by his friends? as also that other of Mirius 20 the Argive, who was murdered in a certeine commotion and civill broile : for it hapned fo, that in a frequent affembly of the people, gathered together in the market place, for to beholde a folemne shew, a statue of brasse fell upon the murderer of Mitius, and killed him outright. And youhave heard (I am fure) ô Patrocleas (have you not?) what befell unto Beffus the Poconian, and Arifton the Octeian, two colonels of mercenarie and forren fouldiers ? No verily (quoth he) but I would gladly know: This Ariston (quoth I) having stollen and caried away out of this temple, certaine jewels and coffly furniture of queene Eriphyle, which of long time had there benekept fafe, by the grant and permission of the tyrants who ruled this citic, carried them as a present to his wife; but his sonne being on a time (upon some occasion) displeased and angrie with his mother, set fire on the house, and burnt it with all that was within it. As for Bessius, who 20 had murdered his owne father, he continued a good while not detected, until fuch time, as being one day at Supper with certains of his friends that were strangers, with the head of his speare he pierced and cast downe a swallowes neast, and so killed the yong birds within it: and when those that flood by, feemed (as good reason there was) to say unto him: How commeth this to passe, good fir? and what aile you, that you have committed fo lend and horrible an act? Why (quoth heagaine) doe these birds crie aloud and beare false witnesse against me, testisying that I have murdered mine owne father ? hee had no sooner let fall this word, but those who were present tooke holde thereof, and wondering much thereat, went directly to the king, and gave information of him; who made so diligent inquisition, that the thing upon examination was discovered, and Beffus (for his part) punished accordingly for a parricide. Thus much (I say) have we 40 related, that it may be held as a confessed trueth and supposition, that wicked men otherwhiles have some delay of their punishment: as for the rest, you are to thinke that you ought to hearken unto He fiedus the Poet, who faith not as Plate did, that the punishment of finne doth followfinne hard at the heeles, but is of the fame time and age, as borne and bred in one place with it, and springing out of the very same root and stocke: for these be his words in one place:

Bad counsell who deviseth first, unto himfelfe hall finde it worft.

And in another:

Who doth for others mischiefe frame, To his owne heart contrives the fame.

The venimous flies Cantharides are faid to conteine in themselves a certeine remedie, made and compounded by a cotrarietie or antipathie in nature, which ferveth for their owne counterpoilon; but wickednesse ingendering within it selfe (I wot not what) displeasure and punishment, not after a finfull act is committed, but even at the very instant of committing, it beginneth to fuffer the paine due to the offence: neither is there a malefactour, but when he feeth others like himselfe punished in their bodies, beareth forth his owne crosse; whereas mischievous wickednesse frameth of her selfe, the engines of her owne torment, as being a wonderfull artisan of a milerable life, which (together with thame and reproch) hath in it lamentable calamities, many terrible frights, fearefull perturbations and passions of the spirit, remorse of conscience. desperate repentance, and continuall troubles and unquietnesse. But some men there be, who for all the world resemble little children, that beholding many times in the theater, leand and naughtic persons arraied in cloth of golde, rich mantles, and robes of purple, adorned also with crownes upon their heads, when they either dance or play their parts upon the stage, have them in great admiration, as reputing them right happie, untill fuch time as they feethem how they be either pricked and pierced with goads, or fending flames of fire out of those gorgeous, cost. ly and fumptuous vestments. For to say a tructh, many wicked persons, who dwel in stately hou. fes, are descended from noble parentage, sit in high places of authoritie, beare great dignities and glorious titles, are not knowen (for the most part) what plagues and punishments they fu- 10 fleine, before they be seene to have their throats cut, or their necks broken, by being cast downe headlong from on high; which a man is not to tearme punishments simply, but rather the sinall end and accomplishment thereof. For like as Herodicus of Selymbria, being fallen into an incurable phthificke or confumption, by the ulcer of his lungs, was the first than (as Plato faith) who in the cure of the faid diteafe, joined with other Phylicke, bodily exercise, and in so doing, drew out and prolonged death, both to himfelfe and to all others who were likewise infeded with that maladie; even so may we say, that wicked persons (as many as seeme to have escapeda present plague, and the stroke of punishment out of hand) suffer in truth, the paine due for their finfull acts, not in the end onely and a great time after, but fufteine the fame a longer time: fo that the vengeance taken for their finfull life is nothing flower, but much more produced and 20 drawen out to the length; neither be they punished at the last in their olde age, but they waxe olde rather in punishment, which they have endured all their life. Now when I speake of long time, I meane it in regard of our felves; for in respect of the gods, the whole race of mans life (how long foever it be thought) is a matter of nothing, or no more than the very moment and point of the instant. For fay, that a malefactour should suffer the space of thirtie yeres for some hainous fact that he hath committed, it is all one, as if a man should stretch him upon the racke, or hang him upon a jibbet in the evening toward night, and not in the morning betimes; especially, feeing that fuch an one (all the while that he liveth) remaineth close and fast shut up (as it were) in a strong prison or cage, out of which he hath no meanes to make an escape and get away. Now if in the meane while they make many fealts, manage fundry matters, and entertheir disports and pleasures; it is even as much, and all one, as when malefactours (during the time they be in prison) should play at dice or cockall game, having continually over headthe rope hanging, which must strangle them; for otherwise, we might aswell say, that prisoners condemned to die, fuffer no punishment all the whiles they lie in hard and colde yrons, nor until the executioner come and strike the head from the shoulders; or that he who by sentence of the judges hath drunke the deadly potion of hemlocke, is not punished, because he walketh stil, and goeth up and downe alive, waiting untill his legs become heavie, before the generall colde and congelation surprise him, and extinguish both sense and vitall spirits, in case it were so, that we esteeme and call by the name of punishment, nothing but the last point and extremity thereof; 40 letting paffe and making no reckoning at all of the paffions, feares, painfull pangues, expediance of death, pricks and forrowes of a penitent conscience, wherewith every wicked person is troubled and tormented: for this were as much as to fay, that the fifh which hath swallowed downe the hooke, is not caught, untill we fee the faid fifth cut in pieces, or broiled, roafted and fodden by the cooke. Certes every naughty person is presently become prisoner unto justice, so foone as he hath once committed a finfull act, and fwallowed the hooke together with the bait of sweetnesse and pleasure, which he taketh in leaudnesse and wrongfull doing; but when theremorfe of conscience imprinted in him, doth pricke, he feeleth the very torments of hell, and can not rest;

But as in seathe Tuny si,h doth swiftly crossethewaves, . And travers still while tempest lasts, so he with anguish raves.

For this audacious raftnesse and violent infolence (proper unto vice) is verie puissant, forward, and readie at hand, to the effecting and execution of sinfull acts; but afterwards, when the passion (like unto a winde) is laied, and beginnes to faile, it becommeth weake, base and feeble, subject to an infinite number of searce and superstitions; in such fort, as that Stesichorus the Poet seemeth to have devised the dreame of queene Clytemnesser, very conformable to the trueth, and answerable to our daily experience, when he bringeth her in speaking in this maner:

Methought I saw a dragoncome apace, Whose *crest alost on head * with bloudwas stein d; With that anon there did appeare in place. Plisthenides the king, who that time reign d.

For the visions by night indreames, the fantasticall apparitions in the day time, the answers of Free Harms oracles, the prodigious fignes from heaven, and in one word, what loever men think to be done a main head. immediately by the will and finger of God, are woont to strike great troubles and horrors into fuch persons so affected, and whose consciences are burdened with the guilt and privitie of finne. Thus the report goeth of Apollodorus, that he dreamed upon a time, how he faw himfelfe first flaied by the Scythians, then cut as finall as flesh to the pot, and so boiled; he thought alfo that his heart spake softly fro out of the cauldron, and uttered these words: I am the cause of all thefe thy evils: and againe, he imagined in his fleepe, that his own daughters, all burning on a light flaming fire, ran round about him in a circle. Semblably Hipparchus the fonne of Pififfratwo, a little before his death, dreamed that Penus out of a certaine viall sprinkled bloud upon his face. The familiar friends likewife of king Ptolomaus, furnamed Ceraunos, that is to fay, Lightning, thought verily in a dreame that they faw Selenew accuse and indite him judicially before wildewolves, and greedie geires that were his judges, where he dealt and diffribued a great quantitie of fleth among his enemies. Paulanias also at Bizantium, sent for Cleonice, a virgin and gentlewoman free borne, of a worthipfull house; intending perforce to lie with her all night, 20 and abuse her body; but being halfe a sleepe when she came to his bed, he awakened in a fright, and suspecting that some enemies were about to surprise him, killed her outright; whereupon everafter he dreamt ordinarily, that he fawher, and heard her pronounce this speech:

To judgement feat, approach thou neere I fay, Wrong dealing is to men most hurtfull ay.

Nowwhen this vision as it thould seem ceased not to appeare unto him night by night; he embarked and failed into Heraclea, to a place where the spirits and ghosts of those that are departed beraifed and called up, where after he had offered certaine propitiatorie facrifices, and powredfoorth funerall effusions, which they use to call upon the tombes of the dead; he wrought foeffectually, that the ghost of Cleonice appeared; and then she said unto him, that so soone as 30 he was arrived at Lasedamon, he should have repose and an end of all his troubles: and so in very truth, no fooner was he thither come, but he ended his life and died. If therefore the foule had no fense after it is departed out of the bodie, but commeth to nothing; and that death were the finall end and expiration as well of thankefull recompenses, as of painfull punishments, a man might fay of wicked persons who are quickly punished, and die soone after that they have committed any mildeeds; that God dealeth very gently and mildly with them: For if continuance of time, and long life bringeth to wicked persons no other harme; yet a man may at least wife fay thus much of them, that having knowne by proofe, and found by experience, that injuffice is an unfrutefull, barren, and thankleffething, bringing foorth no good thing at all, nor ought that deserveth to be esteemed after many travels and much paines taken with it; yet the verie 40 feeling and remorfe of confeience for their finnes, disquieteth and troubleth the mind, and turneth it upfide downe. Thus we reade of king Lysmachus, that being forced through extreame thirst, he delivered his owne person, and his whole armie into the hands of the Getes; and when being their prisoner, hee had drunke and ouenched his thirst, he said thus : O what a miserie is this, and wretched case of mine, that for so short and transitorie a pleasure, I have deprived my selfe of so great akingdome, and all my roiall estate. True it is, that of all things it is an exceeding hard matter to relift the necessitie of a naturall passion; but when as a man for covetousneffe of money, or defire of glorie, authoritie, & credit among his countrimen and fellow-citizens, or for fleshly pleasures, falleth to commit a foule, wicked, and execrable fact, and then afterwards in time, when as the ardent thirst and furious heat of his passion is past, seeing that there 50 abide and continue with him, the filthy, thamefull, and perilous perturbations onely of injustice and finfulnesse; but nothing at all that is profitable, necessarie, or delightsome; is it not very likely and probable, that he shall eftsoones, and oftentimes recall into this thought, and confideration? how being seduced and caried away by the meanes of vain-glory, or dishonest pleafures, (things bale, vile, and illiberall) he hath perverted and overthrowen the most beautifull and excellent gifts that men have, to wit, right, equitie, justice, and pietie; and in stead thereof, bath filed and polluted his life, with shame, trouble, and danger? For like as Simonides was woontto fay in mirth: That he found one coffer of filver and money alwaies full; but that other offavors, thanks, and benefits, evermore emptie; even fo wicked men, when they come to examine and perufe aright the vice that is in themselves, they finde it presently (for one pleasure which is accompanied with a little vaine and glosing delight) void altogether and destitute of hope; but fully replenished with searcs, cares, anxieties, the unpleasant remembrance of missements past, suspension of future events, and distrust for the present: much after the manner as we do heare ladie 100 in the theaters, repenting of those soule facts which she had committed, and speaking these words upon the stage:

How should I now, my friends and ladies deere Begin to keepe the house of Athamas, Since that all whiles that I have lived heere, Nought hath beene done by me that decent was? Or thus:

How may I keepe, ô ladies deere alas, The house againe of my lord Athamas, As who therein had not committed ought Of those leud parts which I have done and wrought.

For femblably it is meet that the minde and foule of every finfull and wicked person should ruminate and discourse of this point in it selfe after this maner: After what fort should I forget and put out of remembrance the unjust and leud parts which I have committed? how should I cast off the remorfe of conscience from me? and from hencefoorth begin to turne over a new lease, 20 & lead another life : for furely with those in whom wickednesse beareth sway, & is predominant, there is nothing affured, nothing firme & constant, nothing sincere and sound; unlesse haply we will fay and maintaine; that wicked perfons and unjust, were some Sages and wise philosophers. But we are to thinke, that where avarice reigneth & exceffive concupifcence, and love of pleafure, or where extreme envie dwelleth, accompanied with spight and malice; there if you mark and looke well about, you shall finde superstition lying hidden among, sloth and unwillingnesse to labour, feare of death, lightneffe and quicke mutabilitie in changing of minde and affection, together with vaine glory proceeding of arrogancie: those who blame them, they seare, such as praise them, they dread and suspect; as knowing well how they are injured and wronged by their deceitful semblance, and yet be the greatest enemies of the wicked, for that they commend 30 fo readily, and with affection, those whom they suppose, and take to be honest: for in vice and finne (like as in bad iron) the hardnesse is but weak and rotten, & the stiffenesse also brittle & eafie to be broken: and therefore wicked men (learning in proceffe of time, better to know themfelves what they are) after they come once to the full confideration thereof, are displeased, and discontented, they hate themselves, and detest their owne leud life: for it is not likely that if a naughtic person otherwise (though not in the highest degree, who hath regard to deliver again a pawne or piece of money left in his hands to keepe; who is ready to be furetie for his familiat friend, & upon a braverie and glorious minde, hath given largeffes, and is prest to maintaine & defend his countrey, yea, and to augment and advance the good estate thereof) soone repent and immediately be grieved for that which he hath done, by reason that his mind is so mutable, 40 or his will so apt to be seduced by an opinion or conceit of his: considering that even some of those who have had the honor to be received by the whole bodie of the people in open theater, with great applause and clapping of hands, incontinently fall to figh to themselves, and groane againe, fo foone as avarice returneth fecretly, in place of glorious ambition: those that kill and facilifice men to usurpe and fet up their tyrannies, or to maintaine and compasse some conspiracies, as Apollodorus did; circumvent and defraud their friends of their goods and monies, which was the practife of Glaucus, the sonne of Epicydes, should never repent their misdeeds, nor grow into a detestation of themselves, nor yet be displeased with that they have done: For mine owne part, I am of this opinion (if it be lawfull fo to fay) That all those who commit such impleties and missemeanors, have no need either of God or man to punish them; for their owne life 50 onely being fo corrupt, and wholy depraved and troubled with all kind of wickednesse, is sufficient to plague and torment them to the full: But confider (quoth I) whether this discourse seeme not already to proceed farther, and be drawen out longer than the time will permit. Then Timon answered: It may well so be, if peradventure we regard the length and prolixitie of that which followeth and remaineth to be discussed; as for my selfe, I'amnow ready to rise as it were out of an ambush, and to come as a fresh and new champion with my last doubt and question, foralmuch as me thinks, we have debated enough already upon the former: for this would I have you to thinke, that although we are filent and fay nothing, yet we complaine as Emiphes did, who boldly chalenged and reproched the gods, for that

The parents finne and their iniquitie, They turne on children and posteritie.

Ia

For fav that themselves, who have committed a fault, were punished, then is there no more need to challife others, who have not offended, confidering it were no reason at all to punish twife for one fault the delinquents themselves : or beit so, that through negligence they having omitted the punishment of wicked perfons and offenders, they would long after make them to pay for it who are innocent; furely they doe not well, by this injuffice to make amends for the 10 faiding ligence. Like as it is reported of Aefope, who in times past came hither to this city, being fent from king Cr. fis with a great fumme of golde, for to facufice unto god Apollo in magnificent wife, yea, and to diffribute among all the citizens of Delphos, * foure pounds a piece : but it *unagram of Delphos fortuned to that he fell out with the inhabitants of the city upon fome occation, and was excee- esding anary with them, infomuch as he performed in deed the facrifice accordingly, but the reft of the money which he should have dealt among the people, he sent backe against to the city of Sardis, as if the Delphians had not bene worthy to enjoy the kings liberalitie; whereupon they taking greatindignation, laied facriledge to his charge, for determing (in fuch fort) that facred money; and in trueth, after they had condemned him thereof, they pitched him downe headlong from that high rocke, which they call Hyampia: for which act of theirs, god Apollo was fo 20 highly displeased, that he sent upon their land sterilitie and barennesse, besides many and sundryffrange and unknowen difeafes among them, fo as they were confireined in the end, to goe about in all the publicke feafts and generall aftemblies of the Greeks, of purpose, to make proclamation by found of trumpet: That who foever hee was (kinternan or friend of Aclope) that would require fatisfaction for his death, should come foorth, and exact what penaltie he would defire and thus they ceafed not continually to call upon them; untill at length, and namely, in the third generation after, there prefented himselfe a certeine Samian, named Idmon, who was nothing at all of kin to Aefope, but onely one of their posteritie, who at the first had bought him for a flave in open market, within the ifle of Samos; and the Delphians having in some measure made fatisfaction and recompense unto him, were immediatly delivered from their calamities: 30 and it is faid, that from that time forward, the execution of facrilegious persons, was translated from the forefaid rocke Hyampia, unto the cliffe of Nauplia. And verily, even those, who of all others most admire Alexander the Great & celebrate his memorial, of which nuber we also confesse our selves to be, can in no wise approve that which he did unto the Branchides, when he rafed their citie to the very ground, & put all the inhabitants thereof to the fword, without respect either of age or of fex, for that their ancestours in olde time had betraied and delivered up by treason, the temple of Miletum. And Agathoeles the tyrant of Syracu/a, who laughed and scoffed at the men of Corphu: for when they demanded of him the occasion why hee forraied their ifle, made them this answere: Because (quoth hee) your forefathers in times past, received and enterteined ulyffes. Semblably, when the islanders of Ithnea made complaint unto him of his fouldiers, for driving away their theepe: Why? (quoth he) your king, when he came one time into our illand, not onely tooke away our sheepe, but also put out the eie even of our shepheard. Thinke you not then that Apollo dealt more abfurdly and unjustly than all these, in destroying the Pheneotes at this day, in Hopping up the mouth of that bottomleffe pit that was wont to receive and foake up all the waters which now doe overflow their whole countrey; because that a thousand yeeres agoe (by report) Hercules having taken away from the Delphians, that sacred trefect, from which the oracles were delivered, brought the fame to the citie Pheneum? And as for the Sybarites, he answered them directly: That their miseries should then cease, when they had appealed the ire of Juno Leucadia, by three fundry mortalities. Certes, long agoe it is not, fince that the Locrians defifted and gave overfending every yeere their daughters, virgins, un-50 to Troie,

Who there went bare-foot, and did ferve all day from morne to night, In habit of poore wretched flaves, in no apparell dight; No coffe, no casle, nor honest veile, were they allow d to weare In decent wise, for womanhood, though aged now they were:
Refembling such as never rest,
but Pallas temple sweepe,
And sacredater dayly cleanse,

where they do atway keepe. and all for the lascivious wantonnesse and incontinence of Ajax. How can this be either just or reasonable, considering that we blame the very Thracians, for that (as the report goes) they use flill (even at this day) to beat their wives in revenge of Orpheus death? Neither do we commend the barbarous people, inhabiting along the river Po, who (as it is faid) do yet mourne and weare blacke, for Phaeton his fall. Yet (in my conceit) it is a thing rather fortish and ridiculous, that 10 whereas the men who lived in Phaeton his time, made no regard of his ruine: those that came five (yea, and ten) ages after his wofull calamitie, should begin to change their raiment for his fake, and bewalle his death: for furely, herein there is nothing at all to be noted, but meere folly, no harme, no danger or absurditie (otherwise) doth it conteine. But what reason is it, that the wrath and judgement of the gods, hidden (upon a fudden) at the very time of some hainous fact committed (as the propertie is of some rivers) should breake out, and shew it selfe afterwards, upon others, yea, and end with some extreame calamities? He had no sooner paused awhile, and thired the current of his speech: but I doubting whereto his words would tend, and fearing left he should proceed to utter more absurdities and greater follies, presently made this replie upon him: And thinke you, fir, indeed, that all is true that you have faid? What if all (quothhe) 20 be not true, but some part thereof onely, thinke you not yet, that the same difficultie in the que. Rion still remaineth? Even so peradventure (quoth I) it fareth with those who are in an extreame burning fever, who whether they have more or leffe clothes upon them, feele evermore within them the same excessive heat of the ague; yet for to comfort and refresh them a little, and to give them some case, it is thought good to diminish their clothes, and take off some of them. But if you are not fo disposed, let it alone, you may do your pleasure; howbeit, this one thing I will fay unto you, that the most part of these examples resemble fables and fictions, devited for pleasure: Call to mind therefore and remembrance, the feast celebrated of late in their honour, who fometime received the gods into their houses, and gave them intertainment; also that beautifull & honorable portion fet by apart, which by the voice of an herald was published 30 exprelly to be for the posterity descended from Pindarus, and record with your selfe how honorable and pleasant a thing this seemeth unto you. And who is there (quoth he) that would not take pleasure to see this preeminence and preference of honour so naturall, so plaine, and fo auncient, after the maner of the old Greeks, unlesse he be such an one, as (according to the fame Pindarus)

Whose heart all black of metall forg drwis And by cold stame,made stiffe and hardened is.

I omit (quoth 1) to speake of the like solemne commendation published in Sparta, which enfued ordinarily after the Lesbian fong, or canticle in the honor and memoriall of that auncient Terpander: for it feemeth, that there is the same reason of them both: But you who are of the 40 race of Opheltes, and thinke your felfe woorthy to be preferred before all others, not Baotians onely, but Phocacaus alfo; and that in regard of your flock-father Daiphant us, have affifted and feconded me, when I maintained before the Lycormians and Satilaians (who claimed the priviledge and honor of wearing coronets due by our lawes and statutes unto the progenie of Hereules) That fuch dignities and prerogatives ought inviolably to be preferved and kept for those indeed who descend in right line from Hercules, in regard of his beneficiall demerites which in times past he heaped upon the Greeks, and yet during his life, was not thought woorthy of reward and recompence: You have (quoth he) revived the memorie of a most pleasant question to be debated, and the same marvelous well befeeming the profession of Philosophie: But I pray you my very good friend (quoth I unto him,) forbeare this vehement and acculato- 50 rie humour of yours, and be not angry, if haply you fee that fome because they be borne of leud and wicked parents, are punished; or else doe not rejoice so much, nor be ready to praise, in case you see nobilitie also of birth to be so highly honored: for if we stand upon this point, and dare avow, that recompence of vertue ought by right and reason to continue in the line and pofleritie; we are by good confequence to make this account, that punishment likewife should not thay and ceale together with misseeds committed, but reciprocally fall upon those that are defeended of mifdoers and malefactors: for he who willingly feeth the progenie of Cimon, ho noured at Athens, and contrariwise is offended and displeased in his heart, to see the race of Lachares, or Ariston banished & driven out of the citie; (he I say) seemeth to be too fost, tender, and passing effeminate, or rather to speake more properly, over-contentious and quarrelsome, even against the gods, complaining and murmuring of the one side; if the children, & childrens children of an impious & wicked person do prosper in the world; and contrariwise is no lesse given to blame and find fault, if he doe fee the posterity of wicked and ungracious men to be held under, plagued, or altogether destroied from the face of the earth; accusing the gods if the children of a naughtie man be afflicted even as much as if they had honest persons to their parents: But as for these reasons alledged, make you this reckoning, that they be bulwarks and rampars to for you, opposed against such bitter & sharpe accusers as these be. But now taking in hand again the end (as it were) of a clew of thread, or a bottom of yearne, to direct us as in a darke place, and where there be many cranks, turnings and windings to and fro (I meane the matter of gods fecret judgements) let us conduct and guide our felves gently and warily, according to that which is most likely & probable, considering that even of those things which we daily manage, and doe our felves, we are not able to fet downe an undoubted certaintie: as for example; who can yeeld a found reason, wherefore we cause and bid the children of those parents who died either of the phthilick and confumption of the lungs, or of the dropfie, to fit with their feet drenched in water, until the dead corps be fully burned in the funeral fire? For an opinio there is that by this meanes the faid maladies shall not passe unto them as hereditarie, nor take hold of their bodies as alfo, what the cause should be, that if a goat hold in her mouth the herbe called Ermgites, that is to fay, Sea holly, the whole flocke will frand still, untill fuch time as the goat herd come and take the faid herbe out of her mouth? Other hidden properties there be, which by fecret influences and paffages from one to another, worke strange effects, and incredible, as well speedily, as in longer tract of time: and in very truth, we woonder more at the intermission and stay of time betweene, than we doe of the distance of place, and yet there is greater occasion to marvell thereat: as namely, that a peltilent maladie which began in Aethiopia, should raigne in the citie of Athens, and fill every street and corner thereof, in such fort, as Pericles died, and Thucydides was ficke thereof, than that when the Phocæans and Sybarits had committed fome hainous fins, the punishment therefore should fall upon their children, & go through their posteritie? For furely these powers and hidden properties have certaine relations and correspondences from the last to the first; the cause whereof, although it be unknowen to us, yet it ceaseth not secretly to bring foorth her proper effects. But there seemeth to be veric apparent reason of justice, that publicke vengeance from above should fall upon cities many a veere after; for that a citie is one entire thing, and a continued body as it were, like unto a living creature, which goeth not befide or out of it felfe for any mutations of ages, nor in tract and continuance of time, changing first into one, and then into another by succession, but is alwaies uniforme and like it felfe, receiving evermore, and taking upon it, all the thanke for well doing, or the blame for mildeeds, of whatfoever it doth or hath done in common, fo long as the focietie that linketh & holdethit together maintaineth herunitie: for to make many, yea & in-40 numerable cities of one, by dividing it according to space of time, were as much as to go about to make of one man many, because he is now become old, who before was a yong youth, & in times past also a very stripling or springall: or else to speake more properly, this resembleth the devifes of Epicharmus, wherupon was invented that maner of Sophisters arguing, which they cal the Croissant argument; for thus they reason: He that long since borrowed or tooke up mony, now oweth it not, because he is no more himselse, but become another: & he that yesterday was invited to a feast, cometh this day as an unbidden guest, cosidering that he is now another man. And verily, divers ages make greater difference in ech one of us, than they do commonly in cities and States: for he that had feene the citie of Athens thirtie yeeres agoe, and came to visit it at this day, would know it to be altogether the very same that then it was; infomuch as the maoners, cultomes, motions, games, pastimes, serious affaires, favours of the people, their pleasures, displeasures and anger at this present, resemble wholly those in ancient time: whereas if a man be any long time out of fight, hardly his very familiar friend shall be able to know him, his countenance will be fo much changed; and as touching his maners and behaviour, which alter and change so soone upon every occasion, by reason of all sorts of labour, travell, accidents and lawes, there is fuch varietie and so great alteration, that even he who is ordinarily acquainted and conversant with him, would marvell to see the strangenesse and noveltie thereof; and yet the man is held and reputed still the same, from his nativitie unto his dying day: and in like case, a citie remaineth alwaies one and the felfe fame; in which respect we deeme it great reason, that it should participate aswell the blame and reproch of ancestours, as enjoy their glorie and puisfance, unlesse we make no care to cast all things in the river of Herachtus, into which (by report) no one thing entreth twife, for that it hath a propertie to alter all things and change their nature. Now if it be fo, that a citie is an united and continued thing in it felfe, we are to thinke no leffe of a race and progenie, which dependent upon one and the fame flocke, producing and bringing foorth a certeine power and communication of qualities, and the same doth reach and extend to all those who descend from it : neither is the thing ingendred of the same nature that a piece of worke is, wrought by art, which incontinently is separate from the workeman, for that it is made by him, and not of him; whereas contrariwife, that which is naturally engendred, is formed of the very substance of that which ingendred it, in such fort as it doth carie about it some part thereof, which by good right deserveth either to be punished or to be honoured even in it selfe. And were it not, that I might be thought to jest & speake in game and not in good earnest I would aver and pronounce affuredly, that the Athenians offered more wrong and abuse unto the brasen statue of Cassander, which they caused to be defaced and melted; and likewise the dead corps of Dionylius suffered more injurie at the hands of the Syracusians, which after his death they caused to be carried out of their confines, than if they had proceeded in rigor of justicea. gainst their of spring and posterity; for the said image of Cassander did not participate one whit of his nature; and the foule of Dionysius was departed a good while before out of his bodie: whereas Nifem, Apollocrates, Amipater, Philip & all fuch other, descended from vicious & wicked 20 parents, reteined still the chiefe and principall part which is in them inbred, and remainethnot quiet, idle and doing nothing, but fuch as whereby they live and are nourifhed, whereby they negociate, reason and discourse: neither ought it to seeme strange and incredible, that being of their iffue, they should likewise reteine their qualities and inclinations. In summe, I say and asfirme, that like as in Phylicke, whatfoever is holefome and profitable, the fame is also just; and woorthy were he to be laughed at and mocked, that calleth him unjust, who for the Sciatica or disease of the huckle-bone, would cauterize the thumbe; or when the liver is impostumate, searific the bellie; and if kine or oxen be tender and foft in the clees, anoint the extremities and tips of their hornes; even so he deserveth to be scorned and reproved as a man of a shallow conceit, who in chastifement of vice, esteemeth any other thing just, than that which may cure and 20 heale the fame; or who is offended and angry, if a medicine be applied, or a course of Physicke used into some parts for curing others; as they do who open a veine for to heale the inflammation of the cies: fuch an one (I fay) feemeth to fee and perceive no further than his owneoutward fenfes leade him, and remembreth not well, that a schoolemaster often times in whipping one of his scholars, keepeth all the rest in awe and good order; and a great captaine and generall of the field, in plitting to death for exemplarie justice, one fouldier in every ten, reformethall befides, and reduceth them to their duetie; and even so there happen not onely to one partby another, but also to one soule by another, certeine dispositions, aswell to worse and impairing, as to better and amendment, yea, and much more than to one body by the meanes of another; for that there, to wit, in a bodie, there must (by all likelihood) be one impression and the same 40 alteration; but here, the foule (which often times is led and caried away by imagination, either to be confident, or distrustfull and timorous) fareth better or woorse accordingly. And as I was going forward to speake, Olympiacus interrupting my speech: By these words of yours (quoth he) you seeme to set downe as a supposall, a subject matter of great consequence and discourse, to wit, the immortalitie of the foule, as if it remained still after the separation from the body: Yea mary (quoth he) & even this have I inferred by that which you do now grant, or rather have granted heretofore; for our discourse hath bene from the beginning prosecuted to this presupposed point: That God dealeth & distributeth to every of us according as we have deserved. And how (quoth he) doth this follow necessarily, that in case God doth behold all humaneassaires, & dispose of every particular thing here upon earth, the soules therfore should become either im-50 mortal & incorruptible, or els continue in their entire estate long after death? O good sir (quoth I)be content; is God(thinke you) so base minded, or imploied in so small & trifling matters, and having so little to do, that (when we have no divine thing in us, nor ought that in any fort resembleth him, or is firme and durable, but that we continually decay, fade and perish like unto the leaves of trees (as Homer faith) and that in a small time) he should all on a sudden make so great account of us (like to those women, who cherish and keepe the gardens (as they say) of Admis within brittle pots and pannes of earth) as to make our foules, for one day to flourish and looke greene within our fleshly body, which is not capable of any strong root of life, and then within a while after, suffer them to be extinguished and to die upon the least occasion in the world? But if you please, let us passe other gods, and consider wee a little this our God onely, him I meane, who is honoured and invocated in this place, namely, whether hee (knowing that the souther of the dead are presently exhaled and vanished away to nothing, like unto a vapour of moake, breathing forth of our bodies) doth ordeine incontinently oblations to be offered, and propiriatoric facrifices to be made for the departed? and whether he demand not great honors, worship and veneration in the memorial of the dead? or whether hee doth it to abuse and decive those that beleeve accordingly? For I assure yo, for my part I will never graunt that the 10 souledieth, but remaineth still after death, unlesses one or other (as by report Hereules did in old time) come suffer and take away the prophetical stoole or tresteet of Pything, and destroy the oracle for ever rendring any more answers, as it bath delivered even unto these our daies, such as by report was given in old time to Corax the Naxian in these words:

Impletie great it is for to beloeve,

That soules doe die, and not for ever live.

Then Patrocles: What prophecie (quoth he) was this ? and who was that Corax? for furely the thing it selfe, & that very name, be both of them strange and unknowen to me: That cannot be (quoth I)but thinke better of the matter; for it is long of me who have used his furname in flead of his proper name; for I mean him who flew Archilochus in battel, whose name indeed was Cal-20 londas, but men lurnamed him Corax: This ma was at the first rejected by the prophetesse Pythia, as a murderer who had killed a worthy personage consecrated & devoted unto the Muses but afterwards having used certaine humble praiers & requests, to gether with divers allegatious of excule, preteding to justifie his fact, in the end he was enjoined by the oracle, to go to the house & habitation of Tetrix, & there by certaine expiatorie facrifices & oblations, to appeale & pacific the ghost of Architechus; now this house of Tettix was the cape or promontory Tenarus; for it is faid, that Tettix the Cadian, arriving with his fleet in times palt, at the head of Tenarus, there builta citie, & inhabited it, necre unto the place where the maner was to conjure spirits, & raise the ghosts of those that were departed: The semblable answer being made to those of Sparta, namely, that they should make meanes to pacific the soule of Pausama, they sent as farre as into 20 Italy for facrificers exorcists, who had the skil to conjure spirits, & they with their facrifices chafed his ghost out of the temple: This is one reason therefore (quoth I) that doth confirme and proove, that both the world is governed by the providence of God, and also, that the soules of men do continue after death: neither is it possible that we should admit the one, & denie the other. If it be so then that the soule of man hath a subsistence & being after death; it is more probable & foundeth to greater reason, that it should then either taste of paine for punishment, or enjoy honor for reward: for during this life here upon earth, it is in continuall combat in maner of a champion; but after al combats performed & finished, then she receiveth according to her deferts. Now as touching those honors or punishments which it receiveth in that other world, lone by her-felfe, and separate from the bodie, the same concern and touch us nothing who remaine alive; for either we know them not, or give no beliefe thereto; but fuch as 40 , who remaine anye; for either we know their children or posteritie, for that they be apparant and be either conferred or inflicted upon their children or posteritie, for that they be apparant and evident to the world, those doe containe and curbe wicked men, that they doe not execute their malicious desseignes: And considering that there is no punishment more ignominous, or that commeth neerer to the quicke, and toucheth the heart more, than for men to see their of spring, or those that depend upon them, afflicted for their fake & punished for their faults; & that the foule of a wicked person, enemie to God and to all good lawes, seeth after his death, not his images & statues, or any enfignes of honor overthrowne, but his owne children, his friends & kinsfolk ruinate, undone & perfecuted with great miseries & tribulations, suffring grievous punishment for it; there is no man I thinke, but would chuse rather to forgoe all the honors of 50 Jupiter, if he might have them, than to become again either unjust or intemperate & lascivious. And for the better testimonie & truth hereof, I could relate unto you a narration which was delivered unto me not long fince, but that I am afraid you will take it for a fabuolus tale, devifed to make sport: In regard wherof I hold it better to alleage unto you nothing but substantial reasons, and arguments grounded upon very good likelihood and probabilitie. Not so (quoth Olympiaeus) in any case; but reheatse unto us the narration which you speake of: And when others also requested the same at my hands: Suffer me yet first (quoth I) to set abroad those reasons which carie some good shew of truth, and then afterwards, if you thinke well of it, I will recite the fable also, if so be it is a fable: As for Bion when he faith, that God in punishing the children of wicked men and finners for their fathers, is much more ridiculous than the physician, who for the maladie of father or grandfire, goeth about to minister medicine unto the child or nephew; furely this comparison faulteth heerein, that things be partly semblable, and in partdivers and unlike; for if one be cured of a difease by medicinable meanes, this doth not by and bu heale the maladie or indisposition of another: For never was there man yet being sicke of a fea. ver, or troubled with bleered and impostumate eies, became cured by feeing an ointment applied, or a falve laid unto another: But contrariwife, the punishment or execution of justice upon malefactors, is for this cause done publikely before all the world, that justice being miniftred with reason and discretion, should effect thus much, namely to keepe in, and retaine some 10 by the chasticement and correction of others: But that point wherein the foresaid comparison of Bion answereth to our matter in question, himselfe never understood; for many times it falleth out, that a man being fallen ficke of a dangerous disease, how beit not incurable, yet through his intemperance and diforder afterwards, fuffreth his bodie to grow into greater weakneffe and decay, untill at last he dieth: whereupon his some after him being not actually surprised with the same disease, but onely disposed thereto, a learned physician, some trustie friend, or an expert annointer, and mafter of exercises, perceiving so much, or rather indeed a kind friend and gentle mafter & governor, who hath a carefull cie over him, taketh him in hand, bringeth him to an exquisite maner of austere diet, cutteth off all superfluity of viands, deintie cates, & banketting dilhes, debarreth him of unfeafonable drinkings, and the company of women, purgeth 20 him continually with foveraigne medicines, keepeth his body downe by ordinarie labour and exercife, and so doth diffipate and dispatch the first beginning and small inclination to a dangerous disease, in not permitting it to have head & to grow forward to any greatnesse: And is not this an usual practife among us to admonish those who are borne of fickly and diseased parents, to take good heed unto themselves, and not to neglect their indisposition, but betimes and even at the very first to endevor for to remoove and rid away the root of such inbred maladies, which they bring with them into the world? for furely it is an easie matter to expell and drive out, yea and to conquer and overcome the same, by prevention in due time: Yes verily anfwered they all. Well then (quoth I) we commit no abfurditie, nor doe any ridiculous thing, but that which is right, necessarie and profitable, when we ordeine and prescribe for the children to of those who are subject to the falling sicknesse, to madnesse, phrenesse and the gout, exercises of the bodie, diets, regiments of life, and medicines appropriate for those maladies, not when they are ficke thereof, but by way of precaution, to prevent that they should not fall into them: for the bodie ingendred of a corrupt and diseased bodie, neither needeth nor deserveth any punishment, but physicke rather by good medicines and carefull attendance; which diligence and heedfull regard, if any one upon wantonnesse, nicetie and delicacie doe call chastissement, because it deprive tha man of pleasures and delights, or haply inferreth some pricke of dolour and paine, let him goe as he is, we passe not for him. Now if it be expedient to cure and medicine carefully one body iffued and descended from another that is corrupt, is it meet and convenient to let go the resemblance of an hereditarie vice, which beginneth to bud and sprout in a yoong 40 man, to ftay and fuffer it (I fay) to grow on still, burgen and spread into all affections, untill it appeare in the view of the whole world? for as Pindarus faith:

Her hidden fruit, corrupt and full of sin.

And thinke you not that in this point God is wifer than the Poet Hesiodus, who admonished us and giveth counsell in this wise:

No children get, if thou be newly come From dolefull grave or heaviefunerall: Bu: fare not when thou arreturned home as if he would induce men to beget their children, when they be jocund, fresh and mery, for that the generation of them received the impression, not of vertue and vice onely, but also of joy, sadnesse, all other qualities: howbeit, this is not a worke of humane wisdome (as Hesiodus supposed) but of God himselfe, to discern & foreknow perfectly either the conformities or the diversities of mens natures, drawen from their progenitors, before such time as they breake forth into some great enormities, whereby their passions & affections be discovered what they are; for the yong whelps of beares, wolves, apes & such like creatures, thew presently their natural inclinations.

on even whiles they be very yong, because it is not difguised or masked with any thing; but the nature of man calting it felle, and fetling upon maners, cultomes, opinions & lawes, concealeth often times the ill that it hath, but doth imitate & counterfeit that which is good and honeft sin fuch fort as it may be thought either to have done away cleane all the flaine, blemifh & imperie-Ation of vices inbred with it, or els to have hidden it a long time, being covered with the vaile of craft & fubriltie; fo as we are not able, or at leaftwife have much adoe to perceive their malice, by the fling, bit & pricke of every feveral vice. And to fay a truth; herein are we mightily deceived; that we thinke men are become unjust then only and not before; when they do injurie; or diffolute, when they play fome infolent and loofe part; cowardly minded, when they run out of the to field; as if a man should have the coceit; that the sting in a scorpion was then bred & not before, when he gave the first pricke; or the posson in vipers was ingendred then only, when they bit or flung; which furely were great simplicitie and meere childithnesse: for a wicked person becommeth nor then fuch an one, even when he appeareth fo, and not before; but hee hath the rudiments and beginnings of vice and naughtineffe imprinted in himfelfe, but hee sheweth and tifeth the fame, when he hath meanes, fit occasion, good opportunitie, and might answerable to his minde; like as the thiefe spieth his time to robbe, and the tyrant to violate and breake the lawes. But God, who is not ignorant of the nature and inclination of every one, as who fearcheth more into the fecrets of the heart and minde than into the body, never waiteth and staieth untill violence beperformed by ftrength of hand; impudencie bewraied by malepart speech; or 20 intemperance and wantonneffe perpetrated by the naturall members and privile parts, ere he punish: for he is not revenged of an unrighteous man, for any harme and wrong that he hath received by him; nor angry with a thiefe or robber, for any forcible violence which he hath done unto him; neyet hateth an adulterer, because he hath suffered abuse or injurie by his meanes; but many times he chastifeth by way of medicine, a person that committeth adulterie; a covetous wretch and a breaker of the lawes; whereby otherwhiles he riddeth them of their vice, and preventeth in them (as it were) the falling ficknesse before the fit surprise them. Wee were crewhile offended and displeased, that wicked persons were over-late and too slowly punished; and now discontented we are, & complaine, for that God doth represse & chastise the evill habit and vicious disposition of some, before the act committed; never confidering and knowing, that 30 full often a future mischiese is worse and more to be seared, than the present; and that which is fecretand hidden, more dangerous than that which is open and apparent. Neither are we able to comprehend and conceive by reason, the causes wherefore it is better otherwhiles to tolerate and fuffer fome persons to be quiet, who have off-inded and transgressed already; and to prevent or flay others, before they have executed that which they intend: like as (in very trueth) wee known or the reason, why medicines and physicall drogues (being not meet for some who are ficke) be good and holfome for others, though they are not actually difeased, yet haply in a more dangerous estate than the former. Hereupon it is, that the gods turne not upon the children and pofterity, all the faults of their fathers and anceftours : for if it happen, that of a bad father there descend a good fonne, like as a sickly and crasse man may beget a found, strong and 40 healthfull childe, fuch an one is exempt from the paine and punishment of the whole house and race, as being translated out of a vicious familie, and adopted into another: but, that a yoong fonne (who thall conforme himfelfe to the hereditarie vice of his parents) is liable to the punishment of their finfull life, aswell as he his bound to pay their debts by right of succession and inheritance. For Antigonus was not punished for the finnes of his father Demetrius; nor (to speake of leand persons) Phileto for Augens, ne yet N estor for Neleus his sake; who albeit they were descended from most wicked fathers, yet they prooved themselves right honest: but all fuch, as whose nature loved, embraced and practifed that which came unto them by descent and parentage; in those (I say) divine justice is wont to persecute and punish that which resembleth vice and finne: for like as the werts, blacke moales, foots and freekles of fathers, not appearing 50 at all upon their owne childrens skinne, begin afterwards to put foorth and shew themselves in their nephews, to wit, the children of their fonnes and daughters : And there was a Grecian woman, who having brought foorth a blacke infant, and being troubled therefore, and judicially accused for adultrie, as if thee had beene conceived by a blacke-moore, thee pleaded and was found to have been eherfelfe descended from an Aethiopian, in the fourth degree remooved: As also it is known for certaine; that of the children of Python the Nisibian who was descended from the race and line of those old Spartans, who were the first lords and founders of Thebes, the youngest, and he that died not long since, had upon his body the print and forme of a speare, the very true and natural marke of that auncient line; so long and after the revolution of to many yeeres; there fprang and came up againe as it were out of the deepe, this refemblance of the stocke and kinred : even so it falleth out many times, that the first generations and descents, doe hide and after a fort drownethose qualities and affections of the minde which are affected and appropriate to fome kinred; but afterwards, at one time or other, puttlien foorth, and drive them outward to appeare in those that follow, and the same doe represent that which is proper to each race, as well in vertue as vice. Now when I had finished this speech, I held my peace; and with that Olympicus finiled and faid: Wee would not have you to thinke (quoth he) that we commend you, as having fufficiently proved your discourse by demonstration, left we might feeme to have forgotten or to neglect the tale or narration which you pro-mifed to relate unto us: Mary then will we give our fentence and opinion thereof, when we shall to likewife have heard the fame. Thus therfore I began againe to enter into speech, and followmy intended purpole. There was one Thespesius, of the city of Soli in Cilicia, a great friend and family liar of Protogenes, who formetime here converfed with us, who having led his youthful daies very loofely, within a small time had wasted and confumed all his goods, whereby he was fallen for a certaine foace to extreme want and necessitie, which brought him also to a leud life, infomuch as he proved a very badde man; and repenting his former follies and difpense, began to make thifts, and feeke all meanes to recover his state againe; much like unto those loose and lascivious persons, who making no account of their lawfull and espoused wives, nor caring at all for them whiles they have them; afterwards, when they have cast them off, and put them away, see 20 ing them wedded unto others, follicite them to yeeld their bodies, & give the attempt to force and corrupt them most wickedly: Thus he forbare no leud, indirect, and shamefull practifes, so they turned to his gaine and profit, and within a little while, he gat together not great flore of goods, but procured to himfelfe a bad name of wicked dealing, much shame, and infamie: But the thing that made him famous, and so much spoken of; was the answer delivered unto him from the oracle of Amphilochus, for thither had he fent, as it should feeme, to know whetherhe should live the rest of his life better than he had done before? Now the oracle returned this anfwer: That it would be better with him after he was dead; which in fome fort hapned unto him not long after: For being fallen from an high place with his head forward, without any limme broken, or wound made; onely with the fall, the breath went out of his body, and there heelay 10 for dead; and three daies after, preparation being made for his funerals, caried foorth he wasto be buried; but behold all on a fudden, he revived, and quickly came to himfelfe againe; whereupon there enfued fuch a change and alteration in his life, that it was wonderfull; for by thereport and testimonic of all the people of Cicilia, they never knew man of a better conscience in all his affaires and dealings, whiles he did negotiate and dwell among them; none more devout and religious to God-ward, none more fast and fure to his friends, none bitterer to his enemies; infomuch, as they who were most inward with him, and had kept his company familiarly a long time, were very defirous & earnest with him, to know the cause of so strange and sudden alteration; as being perfy. .ded that fo great amendment of life (fo loofe & diffoline as it was before) could not come by meere chaunce and cafualtie, (as in truth it did,) according as himfelfemade 40 relation unto the faid Protogenes, and other fuch familiar friends of his; men of good woorth & reputation; for thus he reported unto them & faid: That when the spirit was out of his bodie, he fared at the first (as he thought himselse) like unto apilot, flung out of his ship, and plunged into the bottome of the fea; so woonderfully was he astonished at this chaunge; but afterwards when as by little & little he was raifed up againe and recovered, fo that he was ware that he drew his breath fully, and at libertie, he looked round about him, for his foule seemed as if it had beene one eie fully open; but he beheld nothing that he was woont to view, onely he thought that he saw planets and other starres of an huge bignesse, distant an infinit way a funder, and yet for multitude innumerable, calting from them a woonderfull light, with a colour admirable, and the same glittering and thining most resplendent, with a power and force incredible, in 50 fuch fort, as the faid foule being gently and eafily caried, as in a chariot, with this fplendor and radiant light, as it were upon the fea in a calme, went quickly whether foever the would; but letting passe a great number of things woorthy there to be seene; he said that he beheld how the foules of those that were departed this life, as they rose up and ascended, resembled certains fmall firie bubbles, and the aire gave way and place unto them as they mounted on high; but anon when these bubbles by little and little brast in funder, the soules came foorth of them, and appeared in the forme and shape of men and women, very light and numble, as discharged from all poise to beare them downe: howbeit, they did not move and bestir themselves all alike and after one fort; for fome leaped with a wonderful agilitie, and mounted directly and plumbe upright; others turned round about together like unto bobins or fpindles, one while up and another while downe, fo as their motion was mixt and confused, and so linked together, that unnethfor a good while and with much adoe, they could be staied and severed as funder. As for these soules and spirits, many of them he knew not (as hee faid) who they were; but taking knowledge of two or three among them who had bene of his olde acquaintance, hee preffed forward to approch neere and to speake unto them : but they neither heard him speake, nor indeed were in their right fenfes; but being after a fort altonied and belide themto felves, refused once to be either seene or felt, wandering and slying to and fro apart at the first; but afterwards, encountring and meeting with a number of others disposed like unto themselves, they closed and clung unto them, and thus lincked and coupled together, they mooved here and there diforderly without difcretion, and were carried every way to no purpose, uttering I wot not what voices, after a maner of yelling or a blacke-fanctus, not fignisicant nor diffinct, but as if they were cries mingled with lamentable plaints and dreadfull feare. Yetthere were others to be seene aloft in the upmost region of the aire, jocund, gay and pleafant, fo kinde also an courteous, that often times they would seeme to approch neere one unto another, turning away from those other that were tumultuous and disorderly; and as it should feeme, they showed some discontentment, when they were thronged and hudled close together, 20 but well appaied and much pleased, when they were enlarged and severed at their liberty. Among there (by his owne faying) he had a fight of a foule belonging to a kinfman and familiar friend of his, & yet he knew him not certeinly, for that he died whiles himselfe was a very childe; howbeit, the faid foule comming toward him, faluted him in these tearmes: God save you Thespesius: whereat he marvelled much, and said unto him: I am not Thespesius, but my name is Arideus: True in deed (quoth the other) before time you were fo called, but from hencefoorth * The specime shall be your name; for dead you are not yet, but by the providence of God and * That is to permission of Destinie, you are hither come, with the intellectual part of the soule; and as for say, Drivine all the rest, you have left it behinde, sticking fast as an anchor to your bodie : and that you may now know this and evermore heereafter, take this for a certeine rule and token: That the fiprits of those who are departed and dead indeed, yeeld no shadow from them; they neither wincke nor yet open their cies. The specius hearing these words, began to plucke up his spirits fo much the more, for to confider and discourse with himselfe: looking therefore every way about him, he might perceive that there accompanied him a certeine shadowy and darke lineature, whereas the other foules thone round about, and were cleere and transparent within forth, howbeit, not all alike; for fome yeelded from them pure colour, uniforme and equall, as doth the full moone when the is at the cleereft; others had (as it were) feales or cicatrices, dispersed here and there by certeine diftant spaces betweene; some againe, were wonderfull hideous and strange to see unto, all to be specked with blacke spots, like to serpents skinnes; and others had lighticarifications and obscure risings upon their visage. Now this kinsman of Thespesius (for 40 there is no danger at all to tearme foules by the names which men had whiles they were living) discoursed severally of each thing, saying: That Adrastia the daughter of Jupiter and Necessitie, was placed highest and above the rest, to punish and to be revenged of all forts of crimes and hainous finnes; and that of wicked and finfull wretches, there was not one (great or fmall) who either by force or cunning could ever fave himfelfe and escape punishment: but one kinde of paine and punishment (for three forts there be in all) belonged to this gaoler or executioner, and another to that; for there is one which is quicke and speedie, called min that is, Penaltie, and this taketh in hand the execution and chaftisement of those, who immediatly in this life (whiles they are in their bodies) be punished by the bodie, after a milde and gentle maner, leaving unpunished many light faults, which require onely fome perie purgation; but fuch as re-30 quire more ado to have their vices and finnes cured, God committeth them to be punished after death to a fecond tormentreffe, named Dice, that is to fay, Revenge; mary those who are so laden with finnes, that they be altogether incurable, when Dice hath given over and thrust them from her, the third ministresse of Adrastia, which of all other is most cruell, and named Erinnys runneth after, chafing and pursuing them as they wander and runne up and downe; these (I say) the courfeth and hunteth with great miferie and much dolor, untill fuch time as the have overtaken them all and plunged them into a bottomleffe pit of darkeneffe inenarrable and invisible. Now of these three sorts of punishments, the first which is executed by Pane, in this life resem-Aaa 3

But if it chance (quoth he) that any one & scape hither unpunished, and who hath not bene well purged there before, him Dice taketh in hand all bare and naked as he is, with his foule discovered and open, as having nothing to hide, to palliate and maske his wickednesse, but lying bare and exposed to the view thorowout, and on every fide, the presenteth and sheweth him first to his parents, good and honest persons (if haply they were fuch) declaring how abominable he is, how dextenerate and unwoorthy of his Da. rentage; but if they also were wicked, both he and they susteine so much more grievous punish. ment, whiles he is tormented in feeing them, and they likewife in beholding him how he is punished a long time, even untill every one of his crimes and sinnes be dispatched and rid away with most dolourous and painfull torments, surpassing in tharpnesse and greatnesse, all comorall griefs, by how much a true vision indeed is more powerfull and effectuall than a vaine dreame or fantafticall illusion: whereupon, the wales, marks, scarres and cicatrices of sinne and vice remaine to be feene, in fome more, in others leffe. But observe well (quoth he) and consi-20 der the divers colours of these soules of all sorts; for this blackish and soule duskish hew, is properly the tincture of avarice and niggardife; that which is deepe red and fierie, betokeneth cruelty and malice; whereas, if it stand much upon blew, it is a signe that there, intemperance and loosenesse in the use of pleasures, hath remained a long time, and will be hardly scowred off, for that it is a vile vice: but the violet colour and sweetish withall, proceedeth from envie, a venimous and poisoned colour, resembling the inke that commeth from the cuttle fish, for in life, vice when the faile is altered and changed by passions, and with all doth turne the body, putteth foorth fundry colours: but heere it is a figne that the purification of the foule is fully finished, when as all these tinettures are done away quite, whereby the soule may appeare in her native hew, all fresh, neat, cleare and lightsome: for so long as any one of these colours remaineth, 30 there will be evermore some recidivation and returne of passions and affections, bringing certaine tremblings, beatings as it were of the pulse, and a panting in some but weake and feeble, which quickly staieth, and is soone extinguished; and in other more strong, quicke, and vehement: Now of these soules, some there be which after they have beene well and throughly chaftised, and that fundry times, recover in the end a decent habitude and disposition; but others againe are fuch, as the vehemence of their ignoraunce, and the flattering shew of pleasures and luftfull defire, transporteth them into the bodies of brute beafts; for the feeblenesse and defect of their understanding, and their sloth and slacknesse to contemplate and discourse by reason, maketh them to incline and creepe to the active part of generation; but then they find and perceive them selves destitute of a lascivious organ or instrument, whereby they may be able to 40 execute and have the fruition of their appetite, and therefore defire by the meanes of the bodie to enjoy the same: forasinuch as, here there is nothing at all but a bare shadow, and as one would fay, a vaine dreame of pleafure, which never commeth to perfection and fulneffe. When hee had thus faid, he brought and lead me away, most swiftly, an infinit way; howbeit, with ease, and gently, upon the raies of the light, as if they had beene wings, unto a certaine place, where there was a huge wide chinke, tending downward still, and thither being come, he perceived that he was forlorne and for faken of that powerfull spirit that conducted and brought him thither; where he saw that other soules also were in the same case; for being gathered and flocked together like a fort of birds, they flie downward round about this gaping chawne, but enter into it directly they durst not; now the said chinke resembled for al the world within, the caves of Bacehus, 50 fo tapiffed and adorned they were with the verdure of great leaves and branches, together with all varietie of gaie flowers, from whence arose and breathed foorth a sweet and milde exhalation, which yeelded a delectable and pleafant favour, woonderfull odoriferous, with a most temperate aire, which no lesse affected them that smelled thereof, than the sent of wine contenteth those who love to drinke: in such fort as the soules feeding and feasting themselves with these fragrant odors, were very cheerefull, jocund, and merrie; so as round about the said place, there was nothing but pastime, joy, solace, mirth, laughing and singing, much after the manner of men that rejoice one with another, and take all the pleasure and delight that possibly they can. And he faid moreover, that Bacchus by that way mounted up into the focietie of the gods, and afterwards conducted Semele; and withall, that it was called, the place of Lethe, that is to fair. Oblivion: Whereupon he would not let The feefin, though he were exceeding defirous, to flay there, but drew him away perforce; instructing him thus much; and giving him to understand, that reason and the intelligible part of the minde is dissolved, and as it were melted and moistened by this pleasure; but the unreasonable part which savoreth of the bodie, being watered and incarnate therewith, reviveth the memorie of the bodie; and upon this remembrance, there groweth and arifeth a luft and concupifcence, which haleth and draweth unto generation (for to he called it) to wit, a confent of the foule thereto, weighed downe and aggravated with overmuch moisture: Having therefore traversed another way as long as the other, he was ware that he saw a mightie standing boll, into which divers rivers feemed to fall and discharge themselves, whereof one was whiter than the fome of the fea, or driven fnow, another of purple hue or fearlet colour, like to that which appeareth in the raine bow; as for others, they feemed a farre off to have every one of them their diffinct luftre, and severall tincture: But when they approached necreunto them, the foresaid boll, after that the aire about was discussed and vanished awaie, and the different colours of those rivers no more seene, left the more slourishing colour, except onely the white: Then he faw there three Dæmons or Angels, fitting together in triangular forme, medling and mixing the rivers together, with certaine measures. And this guid of The-20 Pecius foule faid morever, that Orpheus came fo farre when he went after his wife; but for that hekept not well in minde, that which he there faw, he had fowen one false tale among men; to wit: That the oracle at Delphi was common to Apollo, and the Night, (for there was no commerce or fellowship at all betweene the night and Apollo) But this oracle (quoth he) is common to the moone and the night, which hath no determinate and certaine place upon the earth, but is alwaies errant and wandring among men, by dreames and apparitions; which is the reason that dreames compounded and mingled as you see, of falshood and truth, of varietie and fimplicity, are spread and scattered over the world. But as touching the oracle of Apollo, neither have you feene it (quoth he) nor ever shalbe able to see; for the terrene substance or earthlypart of the foule, is not permitted to arife & mount up on high, but bendeth downward, being fathened unto the bodie: And with that he approached at once neerer, endevoring to thew him the shining light of the threefeet or three-footed stoole, which (as he said) from the bosome of the goddeffe Thenis, reached as farre as to the mount Pernafus: And having a great defire to fee the same, yet he could not, his eies were so dazeled with the brightnesse thereof; howbeit, as he paffed by, a loud and shrill voice he heard of a woman, who, among other things delivered in metre, uttered also as it should seeme by way of prophesie, the very time of his death: And the Demon faid, it was the voice of Sibylla; for the being caried round in the globe and face of the moone, did foretell and fing what was to come; but being defirous to heare more, he was repelled and driven by the violence of the moone as it were with certaine whirle-puffes, cleane a contrarie way; so he could heare and understand but few things, and those very short; namely 40 the accident about the hill * Vefuvius, and how Dicaarchia should be consumed and burnt by * Or Lobins. casuall fire, as also a clause or peece of a verse, as touching the emperour who then reigned, to this effect:

Agracious prince he is, but yet must die, And empire leave by force of maladie.

After this they passed on forward to see the paines and torments of those who were punished; and there at first they beheld all things most piteous and horrible to see to; for Thespesius who doubted nothing leffe, mette in that place with many of his friends, kinsfolke, and familiar companions, who were intorment, and fuffering dolorous paines, and infamous punishment, they moned themselves, lamenting, calling and crying unto him; at the last he had a sight of 50 his owne father, rifing out of a deepe pit, full he was of pricks, gashes, and wounds, and streetching foorth his hands unto him, was (mauger his heart) forced to breake filence, yea and compelled by those who had the charge and superintendence of the said punishments, to confesse with a loud and audible voice, that he had beene a wicked murderer of certaine strangers, and guests whom he had lodged in his house; for perceiving that they had silver and gold about them, he had wrought their death by the meanes of poilon: and albeit he had not beene detected thereof in his life time, whiles he was upon the earth, yet here was he convicted and had fuficined already part of his punishment, and expected to endure the rest afterwards. Now The spe560 fins durst not make fute nor intercede for his father, so affrighted he was and astonied; but defirous to withdraw himselfe and be gone, he lost the fight of that courteous and kind guide of his. which all this while had conducted him, and he saw him no more: but hee might perceive other horrible and hideous spirits, who enforced and constrained him to passe farther, as if it were necessarie that he should traverse still more ground: so he saw those who were notorious malefactours, in the view of every man (or who in this world had bene chastised) how their shadow was here tormented with leffe paine, and nothing like to others, as having bene feeble and imperfect in the reason lesse part of the soule, and therefore subject to passions and affections: but fuch as were difguifed and cloaked with an outward apparence and reputation of vertue abroad, and yet had lived covertly and secretly at home in wickednesse, certeine that were about to them, forced some of them to turne the infide outward, and with much paine and griefe to lav themselves open, to bend and bow, and discover their hypocritall hearts within, even against their owne nature, like unto the scolopenders of the sea, when they have swallowed downean hooke, are wont to turne themselves outward: but others they flaied and displaied, discovering plainly and openly, how faulty, perverse and vicious they had bene within, as whose principali part of the reasonable soule, vice had possessed. He said moreover, that he saw other souls wound and enterlaced one within another, two, three and more togither, like to vipers and other ferpents, and these not forgetting their olde grudge and malicious ranker one against another, or upon remembrance of losses and wrongs susteined by others, fell to gnawing and devouring ech other. Also, that there were three parallel lakes ranged in equal distance one from the 0-20 ther; the one feething and boiling with golde, another of lead exceeding cold, and a third, most rough, confifting of yron: and that there were certeine spirits called Dæmons, which had the overlooking and charge of them; and thefe, like unto mettall-founders or finithes, with certaine instruments either plunged in, or els drew out, soules. As for those who were given to filthie Jucre, and by reason of insatiable avarice, committed wicked parts, those they let downe into the lake of melted golde, and when they were once fet on a light fire, and made transparent by the strength of those flames within the said lake, then plunged they were into the other of lead; where after they were congealed and hardened in maner of haile, they transported them anew into the third lake of yron, where they became exceeding blacke and horrible, and being crackt and broken, by reason of their drinesse and hardnesse, they changed their forme, and then at last 30 (by his faying) they were throwen againe into the forefaid lake of gold, fuffering by the meanes of these changes and mutations, intolerable paines. But those soules (quoth he) who made the greatest moane unto him, and seemed most miscrably (of all others) to be tormented, were they, who thinking they were escaped and past their punishment, as who had suffered sufficiently for their deferts at the hands of vengeance, were taken againe, and put to fresh torments; and those they were, for whose sinnes their children and others of their posteritie suffered punishment: for whenfoever one of the foules of these children or nephewes in lineall descent, either met with them, or were brought unto them, the same fell into a fit of anger, crying outupon them, thewing the marks of the torments and paines that it fuffeined, reproching and hitting them in the teeth therefore; but the other making hafte to flie and hide themselves, yet were 40 not able to doe; for incontinently the tormentors followed after and purfued them, who brought them backe againe to their punishment, crying out, and lamenting for nothing so much, as that they did forefee the torment which they were to fuffer, as having experience thereof alreadie. Furthermore, he faid that he faw fome, and those in number many, either children or nephewes, hanging together fast, like bees or bats, murmuring and grumbling for anger, when they remembred and called to minde what forrowes and calamities they full eined for their fake. But the last thing that he faw, were the foules of such as entred into a second life and new nativitie, as being turned and transformed forcibly into other creatures of all forts, by certeine workemen appointed therefore, who with tooles for the purpose and many a stroake, forged and framed fome of their parts new, bent and wrested others, tooke away and abolished a 50 third fort; and all, that they might fort and be futable to other conditions and lives: among which he espied the soule of Nero afflicted already grievously enough otherwise, with many calamities, pierced thorow every part with spikes and nailes red hote with fire: and when the artifans aforefaid tooke it in hand to transforme it into the shape of a viper, of which kind (as Pindarw faith) the yong ones gnaweth thorow the bowels of the dam to come into the world, and to denoure it, he said that all on a sudden there shone forth a great light, out of which there was heard a voice giving commandement that they should metamorphoze and transfigure it into the forme of another kinde of beaft, more tame and gentle, forging a water creature of it, chanting about standing lakes and marishes; for that he had bene in some fort punished already for the finnes which hee had committed, and befides, fome good turne is due unto him from the gods, in that of all his fubjects, he had exempted from taxe, tallage and tribute, the bell nation and most beloved of the gods, to wit; the Greeks. Thus farre foorth, he faid, he was one iv a spe-Catour of these matters; but when he was upon his returne, he abid all the paines in the world, for very feare that he had; for there was a certaine woman, for vifage and stately bignesse, admirable, who tooke holde on him, and faid: Come hither, that thou maieth keepe in memoric all that thou hast feene, the better: wherewith the put forth unto him a little rod or wand all fierie, to fuch as painters or enamellers use, but there was another that stated her; and then he might perceive himselfe to be blowen by a strong and violent winde with a trunke or pipe, to that in the turning of an hand he was within his owne bodic againe, and to began to looke up with his cies in maner, out of his grave and sepulchre.

THAT BRVTE BEASTES HAVE USE OF REASON:

A discourse in maner of a dialogue, named GRYLLUS.

The Summarie.

They who have given out that man is a living creature endued with reason, have in few words expressed that which every one of wought principally to consider in him: But for want of declaring what this word reason down import, themselves sor the most part have not well under flood this definition, but asmuch as in them is reduced the condition of mento amourfeestate, than that of bruite teasts: For albeit mans bodie mooved and governed by his immortall foule, hath many excellent advantages above beasts; yes if reason the guide of the soule have no other helpe than of her selfe, cortes, it may be well and truely said; that man is the most miserable creature in the world: And heerem it is, that Philosophers defitme of the light of gods word, are become and so remaine farre short, as being ignorant of Adams fall, originall finne, and the hereditarie fource and firing of so many defects and impersections which proceed from the under standing and the will, so much depravate and corrupt in us by sinne, that when we are to raunge and reduce reason, to her true devoir and dutie in deed; namely, to know and serve God, according as he commandeth, she is starke blinde, yea and a very enemie herselfe to that good grace which in offred unto her. By reason therefore, which maketh the difference betweene us and brutebeasts, we are to under stand the true knowledge of God, for to serve and glorific him according to the tenour of his word all the daies of our life; this is called true religion, of which if man be destitute, according to the sentence of our Saviour : It booteth not him to have gained the whole world, if he lose his owne soule: as also; That it were better for a scand slow man, and him by whom offence 50 commeth, never to have bene borne, or at least wife soone exterminate and rooted out : Likewise, that whoseever is proud of himselfe, and forgetteth his God, is no more a man, but resembleth brute beasts, whose soule perisheth together with the bodie. But to enter no farther into this Theologicall discouse we see in this present dialogue somewhat thereof, o that the intention of Plutarch was to Bew that the intelligence and cogitation of God, is the onely true priviledge prerogative and advantage which men have above beafts: howbeit, left he hath this worke imperfect, even in that very point, which of all other is hardest, and impossible to be prooved by him or his like : for what found understanding, apprehension or conseit could they have of God, who knew not at all the true God? So then, it may be laid that this parcell or remnant of the disputation, conteineth a forme of processe against all Pagans and Atheifts, to proove that brute beafts excell them, and be in more happie estate than they. As touching the discourse it selfe, to the end that it might not be odious, in case he had handled it as his owne invention, he helpeth himselfe with the fabulous tale of Circe, who transformed into beasts the companions of Ulylles: By which allegorie, the Philosophers and Poets implie and teach thu much that workally pleasure doth make al persons brutish, save onely the wise, who use & enjoy goods, honore & delights, with a flated mind of first fetled, on hich never miffeth, nor cometh front or wide of the markethat it shooteth at: He bringeth intheresore ulysics, conferring by the leave and permission of Circe, with a Greekenamed Gryllus, transmuted and turned into a swine: and the chiefe point of their disputation is this : Whether the life of man is better to be esteemed than that of beasts? 10 Gryllus for to uphold and maintaine his cause, treateth of fower points principally: First of the vertue in generall; secondly of the valor and fortitude; in the third place of the temperance; and last of all the wisedome of beasts; prooving against ulysics, and that by divers arguments set out and marked in order, that beafts have the flart and vantage of men in all these points; and leaving the Reader to make the conclusion; he sheweth sufficiently, that if men have no other approach to rest upon, than a naturall habitude of an earthly vertue, and can affure the repose of their consciences upon nothing but upon humane valliance, temperance, and wisedome, they doe but goe in the companie of beasts, or rather come behind them. Thus you see why our author maketh ulysses to enter into a discourse as touching the knowledge of God: But whether it were that his other affaires and occupations or the iniquitie of time hath deprived us of the rest, this treatife or dialogue hath beene cut off in that very 20 place, where it described and required to be more throughly and lively prosecuted: And this which remaineth and is come unto our hands may ferve all men in good stead for their instruction and learning, not to glory and vaunt themselves, but in the mercy of him, who calleth them to a better life, wherein bruse beasts, (created onely for our use, and for the present life, with which they perish for ever) bave no part nor portion at all.

THAT BRUTE BEASTES have use of reason.

ULYSSES.

E thinks dame Circe that I have fufficiently conceived, and firmely imprinted these matters in my memorie. Now would I gladly aske the question, and know of you, whether among those men which be transformed into wolves and lions, you have any Greeks or no?

CIRCE. Yes mary have I, and those very many, decre heart ulyffes; but wherefore demaund you this question?

Because I am perswaded, it will be greatly for mine honour among the Greeks, if by your gracious favour I may obtaine thus much, as at your hands to receive them men againe, and fave them, strangers though they be, as well as my companions, nor fo neglect their state, as to suffer them against nature to age & waxe old in the bodies of wilde beafts, leading a life to miferable, ignominous, and infamous. CIRCE.

See the simplicitie of this man; he would through his folly, that his ambitious minde should 50 procure damage and calamity not to himselfe onely and his friends, but also to those who are meere aliens, and nothing belonging to him?

I perceive very well (ô Circe) that you are about the rempering and brewing of another cup and potion of words, to be witch me; for certainly you should make a very beast of me in deed, if I would fuffer my felfeto be perfuaded, that it were a detriment or loffe to become a man againe of a brute beaft.

That brute beasts have use of reason.

Why? have you not already done woorfe for your felfe than fo, and committed greater abfurdities? confidering that letting goe a life immortall, and not fubject to old age, which you might enjoy if you would make your abode and dwell with me; you will needs goe in all the halte to a woman mortall, and (as I date well fay) very aged by this time, and that through ten thousand dangers, which yet you must endure, promiting your selfe, that you shall thereby be better regarded, more honored and renowned from hence foorth, than now you are; and in the meane while you consider not that you seeke after avaine selicitie, and the image or shadow onely for the thing indeed.

ULYSSES. Well Circe, I am content that it be so as you say; for why should we so often contest and debate thus about the same still ? But I pray you of all loves , unbinde and let loose these poore men for my fake, and give them me.

Nay, that I will not; I fweare by Hecate: You shall not come localily by them; for I tell you they be no meane perfons, and of the common fort: But you were best to aske them first if they themselves be willing thereto or no? And if they answer nay? then, like a noble valiant gentleman as you are, deale with them effectually, and induce them thereto: But in case you cannot with all your reasons bring them to it, and that they be able to convince you by force of argu-20 ment, let it suffice you that you have advised your selfe and your friends but badly.

Is it so indeed good lady? and are you about to mocke and make a soole of me? For how can they either yeeld or receive reason in conference, so long as they be asses, swine and lions, as Goe to fir, most ambitious man that you are; let that never trouble you; for I will uphold them sufficient both to heare and understand whatsoever you shall alledge unto them, yea, and able to reason and discourse with you: Or rather, I passe not much if one of them for all his fellowes shall both demaund and answer: Lo heare is one, deale with him as it pleaseth you.

ULYSSES. And by what name shall we call him, Circe? or who might he be, when he was a man? Circe.

What matters that ? and what maketh it to the difputation and question in hand? Howbeit, name him if you thinke good, Gryllus: And to the end that you should not thinke, that for to gratifie or doe me a pleafure, he may feeme to reason crosse and against your minde, I will for the time retire my felfe out of the place.

GRYLLUS

God save you uly Tes.

ULYSSES.

And you also gentle Gryllw.

GRYLLUS.

What is your will with me, and what would you demaund of me?

ULYSSES.

I wot well that you and the rest were sometimes men, and therefore I have great ruth and pitie to fee you all in this estate, but as good reason is, it grieveth memost for the Greeks, that they are fallen into this calamity: But to it is, that even now I requested Circe, to loosen as many of you as be willing thereto, and after the hath restored them to their auncient shape, to give them leave to goe with me.

GRYLLUS. Peace ulysses, and say not a word more I beseech you; for we all have you in contempt now, feeing that you have bene taken and named all this whiles for a fingular man, and feemed far to futpasse all others in wisedome, whereas there is little or no cause thereof; in that you have bene afraideven of this, to change from the woorfe to the better; and never confidered, that as children abhorre the medicines and drogues that Physicians ordeine, and refuse to learne those sciences and disciplines, which of sickly, diseased and foolish, might make them more healthie, found, & wife; even fo you have rejected & cast behind you this oportunitie to be transformed and changed from one to another; and even still you tremble and dare not venture to keepe company companie and lie with Circe, for dread and feare, left ere you be aware, the should make of you either a fwine, or a woolfe; and you would perfwade us, that whereas we live now in abundance. and enjoy the affluence of all good things, we should quit the same, and withall, abandon and for fake her who hath procured us this happinesse, and all to goe away with you, when we are become men againe; that is to fay, the most wretched creatures in the world.

Ulysses.

It feemeth Gryllus that the potion which you dranke at Circes hands, hath not onely marred the forme and fashion of your bodie, but also spoiled your wit and understanding; having intoxicate your braine, and filled your head with corrupt, strange, and monstrous opinions for ever; or els some pleasure that you have taken by the acquaintance of this body solong, hath to cleane bewitched you.

GRYLLU'S.

Nav iwis, good sir, it is neither so nor so, if it please you o king of the Cephallenians; but if you be disposed to argue with reason, rather than to wrangle with opprobrious tearmes, we will foone bring you to another opinion, and proove by found arguments, upon the experience which we have of the one life and the other, that there is great reason why we should love and embrace this present state above the former.

ULYSSES.

For mine owne part I am readie to give you the hearing.

GRYLLUS. And I as willing likewife to deliver my minde: But first and formost, begin I will to speakeof 20 vertues, upon which I fee you fland formuch, and in regard whereof, you woondroufly pleafe your felves, as who would be thought in justice, in wisedome, in magnanimitie and other vertues to excell and farre furpaffe all brute beafts. Answer me therefore I befeech you, the wifest man of all other, to this point: For I have heard fay, that upon a time you made relation unto Circe of the Cyclopes countrey, how the foile there is naturally fo good and fertill, that with. out plowing, fowing, or planting at all, it bringeth footth of it felfe all forts of fruit: Tellme I fay, whether you esteeme better of it (so frutefull as it is) or of Ithaca a rough and mountaine region, good onely for to breed goats in, and which hardly and with great labour yeeldeth unto those that till it, small store (God wot) of poore and leane frutes, which will not quit for the cost 20 and paines? But take heed it grieve you not to answer contrarie to your minde, for the love that you beare unto your native countrey.

ULYSSES.

I love verily (for I must not lie) yea, and I imbrace and holde most deare, mine owne countrey and place of nativitie: howbeit, I praise and admire that other region of theirs.

Gryllus.

Why then belike, the cafe stands thus, and this we are to fay, that the wifest man is of opinion, that there be fome things which are to praise and commend, and other things to chuse and love : and verily, I thinke that your judgement is the fame of the foule; for the like reason there is of it and a land or plot of ground, namely, that the foule is better, which without any travell or 40 labour, bringeth forth vertue, as a fruit springing and growing of it selfe.

ULYSSES.

Well: be it so as you say.

GRYLLUS.

You grant then and confesse already, That the soule of brute beasts is by nature more kinde, more perfect and better disposed to yeeld vertue, considering that without compulsion, without commandement, or any teaching, which is as much to fay, as without tillage and fowing it bringeth forth and nourisheth that vertue which is meet and convenient for every one.

And what vertue is that (my good friend Gryllue) whereof beafts be capable? GRYLLUS.

Nay, what vertue are they not capable of? yea, and more than the wifest man that is. But first, confider we (if you pleafe) valour and fortitude, whereupon you beare your felfe and vaunt fo highly, neither are you abathed and hide your felfe for feare, but are very well pleafed when as men surname you, Hardie, Bolde, and a Winner of cities; whereas you have (most wicked wretch that you are) circumvented and deceived men, who know no other way of making war, but that which is plaine and generous, and who were altogether unskilfull of fraud, guile and lealing, by your wily shifts and subtill pranks, attributing the name of vertue unto cunning casts, the which in deed knoweth not what deceit and fraud meaneth. But you fee the combats of beafts aswell against men as when they fight one against another, how they are performed with out any craftinesse or sleight, onely by plaine hardinesse and cleane strength, and as it were upon anative magnanimitie, they defend themselves, and be revenged of their enemies: and neither by enforcement of lawes, nor for feare to be judicially reprooved and punished for cowardife, but onely through inflinct of nature avoiding the shame and diffrace to be conquered, they endure and holde out fight to the very extremitie, and all to keepe themselves invincible: for fay they be in body the weaker, yet they yeeld not for all that, nor are faint hearted and give To over, but chuse to die in fight: and many of them therebe, whose courage and generositie, even when they are readie to die, being retired into some one corner of their bodie, and there gathering it felfe, refifteth the killer, it leapeth and fretteth flill, untill fuch time as, like a flame of fire, it be quenched and put out once for all: they cannot skill of praying and intreating their enemie, they crave no pardon and mercy; and it were strange in any of them, to confesse that they are overcome; neither was it ever feene that alion became a flave unto a lion, or one horfe unto another in regard of fortitude, like as one man to another, contenting himfelfe and willingly embracing servitude as next cousin and a surname appropriate unto cowardife. And as for those bealts which men have surprised and caught by snares, traps, subtill sleights and devices of engins, such if they be come to their growth and perfect age, reject all food, refuse nourish-20 ment, yea, and endure thirst, to such extremitie, that they chule to die and seeke to procure their ownedeath, rather than to live in servitude, but to their yoong ones and whelps, which for their tender age be tractable, pliable, and caffe to be led which way one will, they offer so many deceitfullbaits to entice and allure them with their fweetnesse, that they have no sooner tasted thereof, but they become enchanted and bewitched therewith: for these pleasures, and this delicatelife, contrary to their nature, in tract of time caufeth them to be fort and weake, receiving that degeneration (as it were) and effectionate habit of their courage, which folke call tameneffe, and in deed but basenesse and defect of their naturall generositie: whereby it appeareth, that beafts by nature are bred and paffing well disposed to be audacious and hardie; whereas contrarivile, it is not kindly for men to be fo much as bolde of speech and resolute in speaking their 30 mindes. And this you may (good ul/sse) learne and know especially by this one argument: for in all brute beafts, nature swaieth indifferently and equally of either side, as touching courage and boldneffe, neither is the female in that point inferior to the male, whether it be in fulleining paine and travell for getting of their living, or in fight for defence of their little ones. And I am fure you heard of a certeine Cromyonian swine, what foule worke she made, being a beast of the fæmale fex, for Thefens, & how the troubled him; as also of that monstrous Sphinx, which kept upon the rocke Phicton, and held in awe all that tract underneath and about it: for furely all her craft and fubrilty in deviling ridles, and propoling darke questions, had booted her nothing, in case the had not been e withall, of greater force and courage than all the Cadmeians. In the very same quarter was (by report) the fox of Telmesus, a wily and craftie beast. And it is given 40 out, that neere unto the faid place, was also the fell dragon which fought in fingle fight hand to hand with Apollo, for the Seignorie of the oracle at Delphi. And even your great king Agamemnon, tooke that brave mare Aethe, as a gift, of an inhabitant of Sycion, for his dispensation and immunity, that he might not be prest to the warres: wherein he did well and wisely in mine opininion, to preferre a good and couragious beaft, before a coward and dastardly man: and you your own felfe(uly/fes) have feene many times lioneffes and the libbards, how they give no place at all to their males in courage and hardineffe, as your lady Penelope doth, who gives you leave to be abroad in warfarre, whiles the fits at home close by the herth, and by the fire fide, and dares not doe so much as the very swallowes, in repelling those back who come to destroy her and her house, for all she is a Laconian woman borne: What should I tell you of the Carian or 50 Mæonian women? for by this that hath beene faid already, it is plaine and evident, that men naturally are not endued with proweffe, for if they were, then should women likewise have their part with them in vertue and valour: And thereupon I inferre and conclude that you and fuch as you are, exerercife a kind of valiance (I must needs say) which is not voluntarie nor naturall, but confireined by force of lawes, subject and servile to (I wot not what) customes reprehenfions; and you meditate I say and practise for vain-glorious opinion, fortitude, gaily set out with trim words; you sustaine travels and perils, not for that you set light by them, nor for any hardinesse and confidence in your selves, but because you are afraid lest others should goe Bbb before you, and be esteemed greater than you. And like as heere among your mates at sea, he that first riseth to his businesse of rowing, laieth hand and seizeth upon the lightest oarethathe can meet with, doth it not, for that he despiseth it, but because he avoideth and is affraid to han. dle one that is heavier: and he that endureth the knocke of a bafton or cudgel, because he would not receive any wound by the fword : as also, he that refisteth an enemie, for to avoid some ignominous infamic of death, is not to be faid valiant in respect of the one, but coward in regard of the other: even so the valour in you, is nothing els but a wise and warie cowardise, and your prowesse and boldnesse, is no better than timerousnesse, accompanied with skill and knowledge how to decline one danger by another. To be briefe, if you thinke your felves to be more har. die and valiant than beafts, how commeth it, that your Poets tearme those who fight manfully to against their enemies, λυκόρουνας that is, wolves for courage; Βυμωλέοντας that is, lion-hearted: and or inches about that is, resembling the wilde boare in animositie and force: but never doth any of them call a lion, and ported year, that is, as valiant as a man : or a wild boare, and expersion about that is . comparable to a man in courage and strength. Yet I wot well, when they would speake excessively in comparison, their maner is to call men that are swift in running, molluneuss, that is, light-footed like the winde: and those who be faire ad beautifull, beenders, that is, angelicall, or to fee to like unto angels: and even fo, they compare and refemble brave warriours in the highest degree, unto beasts, who in that case are much more excellent than men: the reasonisthis, for that choler and heat of courage is (as it were) the steele, the file, yea, the very whetstone that giveth the edge unto fortitude; and this doe brute beafts bring with them pure and fimple unto 20 fight; whereas in you, it being alway mingled and tempered with fome discourse of reason, asif wine were delaied with a little water, it is gone and to feeke in the greatest dangers, and failethat the very point of opportunity, when it is most to be used. And some of you are of opinion, and flicke not to fay, that in battell and fight there is no need at all of anger, but that laying affide all choler, we are to employ fober and staied reason; wherein they speake not amisse, and I holde well with them, when the question is of defence onely, and the securing of a mans ownelife: but furely, if the case be so, that we are to offend, to annoy and defait our enemic, they talke most shamefully. Is it not a very abfurd thing, that we should reproove and blame nature, for that the hath not fet unto your bodies any flings or pricks, nor given you tusks and teeth to revenge your felves with, ne yet armed you with hooked clawes and tallons to offend your enemies; and 30 in the meane while your owne felves take, spoile, and bereave the soule of that naturall weapon which is inbred with it, or at leaftwife cut the fame short and disable it?

ULYSSES.

What Gryllus! you feeme (as farre as I geffe) to have beene heeretofore some wittie and great oration; who now grunting out of your slic or stank, have so pithily argued the case, and discoursed of the matter in hand: but why have you not in the same traine disputed likewise of temperance?

GRYLLUS.

Because for footh I thought that you would first have refuted that which hath already beene spoken; but I see well you defire to heare me speake of temperance, because you are the hul-40 band of a most chaste wife, and you thinke besides, that your selfe have shewed good proofe of your own continencie, in that you have rejected the love & wanton company of Circe; but even heerein you are not more perfect, I meane in continence, than any one beaft, for even they alfo lust not at all to companie or engender with those that are of a more excellent kind than their owne, but take their pleafure with those, and make love to such as be of the same fort, and therefore no marvell, that as the Mendesian buck-goat in Aegypt, when he was shut up with many faire and beautifull women, never for all that made to any of them, but abhorred to meddle with them; whereas he was raging wood in heat of luft after the does or female goats: So you taking delight in your ordinary love, have no defire at all, being a man, to fleepe or deale carnally with an immortall goddeffe: And as for the chastitie and continence of your owne lady Pe- 50 nelope, I tell you there be ten thousand crowes in the world, that after their manner, caing and croking as they doe, will make a meere mocke of it, and thew that it is no fuch matter to be accounted of; for there is not one of them, but if the male or cock chance to die, remaineth a widow without feeking after a make, not for a little while, but even for the space of nine ages & lives of a man; so that in this respect, your faire Penelope commeth behind the poorest crow or raven that is, and deserveth northen inth part of her honour for chastitie: But seeing you are water that I am so eloquent an oratour, I care not much if I observe a methodicall order in this dif-

course of mine, and like a clearke indeed, beginne first with the definition of temperance, and then proceed to the division of appetites and lusts, according to their several distinct kinds right formally. Temperance therefore is a certaine restraint, abridgement, or regularitie of lusts, and defires, a restraint I say, and abating of such as are forten, strange, and superfluous, to wit, unnecessarie, and a regularitie which by election and choise of time and temperature of a meane, doth moderate those that be naturall and necessiarie; for you see that in lusts and desires, there beinfinit differences: As for example, the appetite to drinke, besides that it is naturall, is also necessatic; But the lust of the flesh, or concupiscence, although nature hath given the beginning thereof; yet fo it is, that we may live commodiously without it; fo as well it may be called naturall, but in no wife necessarie. Now there is another fort of defires, that be neither naturall not necessarie, but accidentall, and infused from without by a vaine opinion, and upon ignorance of that which is good, and there be fuch a number of them, that they goe verie neere to chase away and thrust out, all your natural appetites, much like as when the aliens and strangers that fwarme in a citie, drive out and expell the naturall inhabitants; whereas brute beafts give no entrance nor any communication and fellowship to forren affections for to settle in their foules, but in their whole life, & all their actions be farre remote from vain-glory, felfe-conceit, & fond opinions, as if they abode within the mediterranean parts, distant from the sea: True it is that in their port and carriage, they be not so elegant, so fine & curious as men: howbeit otherwife, for temperance & good government of their affections, which be not many in number ci-20 ther domesticall, or strange & forcen, they are more precise & woonderfull exact in the observing of them than they; for the proofe and truth heereof, the time was once, when I my felfe no leffe doated and was befotted upon gold than you are now, thinking verily that there was no good nor possession in the world comparable to it; I was in love also of silver and ivorie. and he that had most store heereof, me thought was a right happie man, and most highlie in grace and favour with the gods, whether he were Phrygian or Carian it skilled not, more base minded than Dolon, or infortunate otherwise than Priamus; infomuch as being linked fast and tied to these desires, I reaped and received no pleasure nor any contentment at all from al other bleffings; for notwithstanding I was sufficiently furnished with them, yet I tooke my selfe left needic and destitute of those which I accounted the greatest; and therefore I well remember, when I faw you upon a time stately arraid, with a rich robe in Candie, I wished not to have your wifedome and vertue, but your beautifull caffock fo deintily and finely wrought, your mantell Ifay of purple, fo delicate & foft, the beautie whereof I beheld with fuch admiration, that I was even ravished and transported with the fight thereof, as for the button or claspe, al of pure gold, belonging thereto, it had in it a fingularitie by it felfe, and an excellent workeman hee was no doubt, who tooke delight in the turning and graving thereof; and verily for mine owne part, I followed after you for to fee it, as if I had beene enchaunted or bewitched; as women that bee amorous of their lovers: But now being delivered from these vaine and foolish ovinions, and having my braine purged from fuch fantafficall conceits, I passe over gold and filver, and make no more account of them, than I doe of other ordinarie stones; your goodly habilliments, 40 your fine embroidered garments of needle worke and tapiffrie, I fet fo light by, that I make more reckoning I affure you, of a good deepe puddle of fost mire and dirt to walter and wallow in at mine ease, and for to fleepe when my belly is ful than of them: neither is there any of thele appetites comming from withour, that hath place in our foule, but our life for the most part we paffe in defires and pleasures necessarie; and even those which are meere naturall onely, and not altogether io needflatie, wee use them neither disorderly, nor yet unmeasurably: And of them let us first discourse: As forthat familiar pleasure which proceedeth from sweet odours, and fuch things, as by their fent doe affect the finelling, over and besides the simple delight that it yeeldeth, which coffeth nought, it bringeth therewith a certaine profit and commoditie, for to discerne nourishment, and make choise of food; for the tongue is named, 50 as it is indeede, the judge of fweet, of sharpe, eager and sowre sapours, namely, when as the juices of those things which are talted, come to bee mingled and concorporate with the discretive faculties, and not before: But our sense of smelling, before wee once taste those juices or sapours, judgeth of the force and qualitie of every thing, yea, and senteth them much more exquifitely than all the tafters that give effaie before kings and princes: As for that which is familiar and agreeable unto us, it receiveth inwardly, but whatfoever is strange and offensive, it rejecteth and sendeth foorth, neither will it suffer the same once to touch us, orto offend our tafte; but it bewraieth, accuseth, and condemneth the evilland noibefore you, and be esteemed greater than you. And like as heere among your mates at sea, he that first riseth to his businesse of rowing, laieth hand and seizeth upon the lightest oare that he can meet with, doth it not, for that he despifeth it, but because he avoideth and is affraid to han. dle one that is heavier: and he that endureth the knocke of a bafton or cudgel, because he would not receive any wound by the fword: as also, he that refisteth an enemie, for to avoid some ignominous infamic of death, is not to be faid valiant in respect of the one, but coward in regard of the other: even so the valour in you, is nothing els but a wise and warie cowardise, and your proweffe and boldneffe, is no better than timerousneffe, accompanied with skill and knowledge how to decline one danger by another. To be briefe, if you thinke your felves to be more har. die and valiant than beafts, how commeth it, that your Poetstearme those who fightmanfully 10 against their enemies, λυκόρεονας that is, wolves for courage; Φυμωλάοντας that is, lion-hearted: and or ixines annulude that is, resembling the wilde boare in animolitie and force: but never doth any of them call a lion, and pount out that is, as valiant as a man : or a wild boare, and extrinsival alalist that is, comparable to a man in courage and strength. Yet I wot well, when they would speake exceffively in comparison, their maner is to call men that are swift in running, and tweeters, that is, light-footed like the winde: and those who be faire ad beautifull, Occasion that is, angelicall, or to fee to like unto angels: and even fo, they compare and refemble brave warriours in the highest degree, unto bealts, who in that case are much more excellent than men: the reasonisthis, for that choler and heat of courage is (as it were) the steele, the file, yea, the very whetstone that giveth the edge unto fortitude; and this doe brute beafts bring with them pure and fimpleunto 20 fight; whereas in you, it being alway mingled and tempered with fome discourse of reason, asis wine were delaied with a little water, it is gone and to feeke in the greatest dangers, and failethat the very point of opportunity, when it is most to be used. And some of you are of opinion, and flicke not to fay, that in battell and fight there is no need at all of anger, but that laying alideall choler, we are to employ fober and staied reason; wherein they speake not amisse, and I holde well with them, when the question is of defence onely, and the securing of a mans ownelife: but furely, if the case be so, that we are to offend, to annoy and defait our enemic, they talke most shamefully. Is it not a very absurd thing, that ye should reproove and blame nature, for that the hath not fet unto your bodies any ftings or pricks, nor given you tusks and teeth to revenge your felves with, ne yet armed you with hooked clawes and tallons to offend your enemies; and 30 in the meane while your owne felves take, spoile, and bereave the soule of that naturall weapon which is inbred with it, or at leastwife cut the same short and disable it?

Hrveere

What Gryllin! you seeme (as farre as I gesse) to have beene heeretofore some wittie and great or atour; who now grunting out of your stie or frank, have so pithily argued the case, and discoursed of the matter in hand: but why have you not in the same traine disputed likewise of temperance?

GRYLLUS.

Because for sooth I thought that you would first have refuted that which hath already beene spoken; but I see well you desire to heare me speake of temperance, because you are the hul- 40 band of a most chaste wife, and you thinke besides, that your selfe have shewed good proofe of your own continencie, in that you have rejected the love & wanton company of Circe; but even heerein you are not more perfect, I meane in continence, than any one beaft, for even they alfo lust not at all to companie or engender with those that are of a more excellent kind than their owne, but take their pleafure with those, and make love to such as be of the same fort, and therefore no marvell, that as the Mendesian buck-goat in Aegypt, when he was shut up with many faire and beautifull women, never for all that made to any of them, but abhorred to meddle with them; whereas he was raging wood in heat of luft after the does or female goats: So you taking delight in your ordinary love, have no defire at all, being a man, to fleepe or deale carnally with an immortall goddeffe: And as for the chaftitie and continence of your owne lady Pe- 50 nelope, I tell you there be ten thousand crowes in the world, that after their manner, caing and croking as they doe, will make a meere mocke of it, and shew that it is no such matter to be accounted of; for there is not one of them, but if the male or cock chance to die, remaineth a widow without seeking after a make, not for a litle while, but even for the space of nine ages & lives of a man, so that in this respect, your faire Penelope commeth behind the poorest crow or raven that is, and deserveth northen inth part of her honour for chastitie: But seeing you are water that I am so eloquent an oratour, I care not much if I observe a methodicall order in this discourse of mine, and like a clearke indeed, beginne first with the definition of temperance, and then proceed to the division of appetites and lusts, according to their several distinct kinds right formally. Temperance therefore is a certaine restraint, abridgement, or regularitic of lusts, and defires, a restraint I say, and abating of such as are forren, strange, and superfluous, to wit, unneceffarie, and a regularitie which by election and choise of time and temperature of a meane, doth moderate those that be naturall and necessarie; for you see that in lusts and desires, there heinfinit differences: As for example, the appetite to drinke, besides that it is naturall, is also necessatio; But the lust of the flesh, or concupiscence, although nature hath given the beginning thereof; yet fo it is, that we may live commodiously without it; fo as well it may be called naturall, but in no wife necessarie. Now there is another fort of desires, that be neither naturall nornecessarie, but accidentall, and infused from without by a vaine opinion, and upon ignorance of that which is good, and there be such a number of them, that they goe verie neere to chase away and thrust out, all your natural appetites, much like as when the aliens and strangers that swarme in a citie, drive out and expell the naturall inhabitants 3 whereas brute beasts give no entrance nor any communication and fellowship to forren affections for to settle in their foules, but in their whole life, & all their actions be farre remote from vain- glory, felfe-conceit, & fond opinions, as if they abode within the mediterranean parts, distant from the sea: True it is that in their port and carriage, they be not fo elegant, fo fine & curious as men: howbeit otherwife, for temperance & good government of their affections, which be not many in number, ei-20 ther domesticall, or strange & forren, they are more precise & woonderfull exact in the observing of them than they; for the proofe and truth hecreof, the time was once, when I my selfe no leffe doated and was befotted upon gold than you are now, thinking verily that there was no good nor possession in the world comparable to it; I was in love also of silver and ivorie, and be that had most store heereof, me thought was a right happie man, and most highlie in grace and favour with the gods, whether he were Phrygian or Carian it skilled not, more base minded than Dolon, or infortunate otherwise than Priamus; informuch as being linked fast and tied to these defires, I reaped and received no pleasure nor any contentment at all from al other bleffings; for notwithstanding I was sufficiently furnished with them , yet I tooke my selfe left needic and destitute of those which I accounted the greatest; and therefore I well remember, when I faw you upon a time stately arraid, with a rich robe in Candie, I wished not to have your wifedome and vertue, but your beautifull caffock fo deintily and finely wrought, your mantell Ifay of purple, fo delicate & foft, the beautic whereof I beheld with fuch admiration, that I was even ravished and transported with the light thereof, as for the button or claspe, al of pure gold, belonging thereto, it had in it a fingularitie by it felfe, and an excellent workeman hee was no doubt, who tooke delight in the turning and graving thereof; and verily for mine owne part, I followed after you for to see it, as if I had beene enchaunted or bewitched; as women that bee amorous of their lovers: But now being delivered from these vaine and foolish opinions, and having my braine purged from fuch fantasticall conceits, I passe over gold and silver, and make no more account of them, than I doe of other ordinarie stones; your goodly habilliments, 40 your fine embroidered garments of needle worke and tapiffrie, I fet fo light by, that I make more reckoning I affure you, of a good deepe puddle of foft mire and dirt to walter and wallow in at mine eafe, and for to fleepe when my belly is ful, than of them: neither is there any of thefe appetites comming from withour that hath place in our foule, but our life for the most part we passe in defires and pleasures necessarie; and even those which are meere naturall onely, and not altogether to needflatie, wee use them neither disorderly, nor yet unmeasurably: And of them let us first discourse. As forehar familiar pleasure which proceedeth from sweet odours, and such things, as by their fent doc affect the smelling, over and besides the simple delight that it yeeldeth, which coffeth nought, it bringeth therewith a certaine profit and commoditie, for to discerne nourishment, and make choise of food; for the tongue is named, 50 as it is indeede, the judge of fweet, of sharpe, eager and sowre sapours, namely, when as the juices of those things which are tasted, come to bee mingled and concorporate with the discretive faculties and not before: But our sense of smelling, before wee once taste those juices or sapours, judgeth of the force and qualitie of every thing, yea, and senteth them much more exquifitely than all the tafters that give effaie before kings and princes: As for that which is familiar and agreeable unto us, it receiveth inwardly, but whatfoever is strange and offensive, it rejecteth and sendeth foorth, neither will it suffer the same once to touch us, orto offend our tafte; but it bewraieth, accuseth, and condemneth the evill and noi-

fome qualitie thereof, before it doth us any harme, and otherwise it troubleth not us at all, as it doth you, whom it forceth to mixe and compound together for perfumes, cinamon, nard, spike, lavander camell, the sweet leafe malabathum, and the aromatical calamus, or cane of Arabia, medling and incorporating one within another, by the exquisit skilling and cunning of the apothecarie and perfumer, forcing drogues and spices of diversnatures to be blended and confected together, and buying for great fummes of money one pleasure, which is not be. feeming men, but rather fit for fine wenches and daintie damosels, and nothing at all profitable: And yet being thus corrupt as it is, it mareth not onely all women, but also the most part of you that are men, in fo much as you will not otherwhiles, lie with your owne espoused wives, unlesse they be perfumed and before ared all over with sweet oiles and ointments, or els bestrewed with 10 odoriferous powders, when they come to companie with you: Whereas contrariwife among us, the fow allureth the bore, the doc or the goat draweth unto her the buck, & other females the males of their kinde, by their owne fent and finell, casting from them the pure and neat favour of the medowes, and the verdure of the fields, and so comming together as in marriage for generation, with a kinde of mutual love and reciprocall pleasure; neither doethe females hold off and make it daintie, difguifing and covering (as it were) their owne lust as harlotsdoe, with looking strange and coie at the matter, pretending colourable excuses, or making semblance of refufall, and all to enchant, entife, and draw on the rather; nor the males when they come unto them, being pricked with the furious inflinet of luft to generation, doe built either for money or for great paine and travell, or for long subjection and servitude, the act of generation; but 20 they performe the fame unfeignedly, and without deceit in due time and feafon, without anie cost, when as nature in the spring stirreth up and provoketh the generative concupiscence of all living creatures, even as it putteth foorth the buds and sprouts of plants, and anon delaiethasit were and quencheth the same ; for neither the semale after she is once sped and hath conceived, feeketh after the male, nor the male wooeth her any more, nor followeth after her; of fo link regard and small price is this pleasure among us; but nature is all in all, and nothing doe wee against it: Heercof also it is, that there bath not beene knowne unto this day, any lust so fare to transpote brute beasts, as that males should joine in this act with males, or females with females; whereas among you, there be many fuch examples, even of fuch as otherwise were accounted great and woorthie personages, for I let those passe who were of no woorth or note 30 to speake of : Even Agamemnon went through all Baotia, chasing and hunting after * Argynnu, who fledde secretly from him; meane while he pretended colourable, yet false excuses of his abode there, to wit, the sea and the windes, and afterwards this faire and goodly knight, bathed himselfe gently in the poole of Copais, as it were there to quench the heat of his love, and to deliver himfelfe from this furious luft. Semblablie Hercules purfuing after a yoong beardleffe Genymade whom he loved, was left behind the other gallants and brave knights that enterprifed the voiage for the golden fleece, and so not embarquing with them, betraied the fleet. Likewife upon a fourchian of the louver or valted roufe of Apollos temple, furnamed Ptoins, there was one of you, who fecretly wrote this infeription; Achilles the faire; even after that Achilles himselse had begotten a sonne; and I heare say, that these letters remaine there to be seene 40 even at this day: Now if it chaunce that a dunghill cocke tread another cocke, when there is no henne at hand; he is burnt quicke, for that some wizard, soothsaier, or interpreter of such straunge prodigies, will pronounce that it is omenous, and prelageth some evill lucke: Thus you see, how men themselves are forced to confesse, that bealts are more continent than they, & that to fatisfie & fulfil their lufts, they never violate nor abuse nature; whereas in youit is otherwise: for nature (albeit she have the helpe and aide of the law) is not able to keepe your intemperance within the limits and bounds of reason; but like unto a violent streame which runneth forcibly, often times and in many places it worketh much outrage, caufing great diforder, scandall and confusion against nature, in this point of carnall love and fleshly lust: for there have bene men who attempted to meddle and deale with fhee goats, with fowes and mares; as 50 alfo women who have bene as wood and raging mad after certeine beafts of the male kinde: and verily, of fuch copulations as these, are come your Minotaures and Aegipanes; yea, and as I verily thinke, those Sphinxes and Centaures in time past, have bene bred by the same meanes. True it is (I confesse) that otherwhiles, upon necessity and extreame famine, a dogge hathbene knowen to have devoured a man or a woman, yea, and some fowle hath tasted of their flesh, and begun to cat it; but there was never found yet any brute beaft to have lufted afterman or woman, to engender with them; whereas men both in this lust and in many other pleasures, have often times perpetrated outrage upon beafts. Now if they be fo unbridled, fo difordinate and incontinent in these appetites, much more diffolite they are knowen to be than bealts in other desires and lusts that be necessiarie, to wit, in meats and drinks, whereof we never take pleasure, but it is with some profit; but you seeking after the tickling pleasure and delight in drinking and eating, rather than the needfull nourishment to content and satisfie nature, are afterwards well punished for it by many grievous and long maladies, which proceed all from one fource, to wit, furfeit and repleation, namely, when you stuffe and fill your bodies with all forts of statulent humors & ventofities, which hardly are purged & excluded forth: for first & formost, ech fort of beafts hath a feverall food and peculiar kinde of nourifhment; fome feed upon graffe, others upon roots, and some there be againe which live by fruits: as for those that devoure flesh, they never touch any other kinde of pasture, neither come they to take from the weaker and more feeblekind, their proper nouriture, but fuffer them to grafe & feed quietly. Thus we fee that the lion permitteth the stag and hinde to grase; and the wolfe likewise the sheepe, according to natures ordinance and appointment: but man (being through his difordinate appetite of pleafures, and by his gluttonic, provoked to all things, talting and affaying whatfoever he can meet with or heare of, asknowing indeed no proper and naturall food of his owne) is of all creatures living, he alone that enteth and devoureth all things; for first, he feedeth upon flesh, without any need or necessitie enforcing him thereto, considering that he may alwaics gather, presse, cut and reape from plants, vines and feeds, all fort of fruits, one after another in due and convenient 20 scalons, untill he be weary againe, for the great quantity thereof; and yet for to content his delicatetooth, and upon a lothforne fulnesse of necessarie sustenance, he seeketh after other victuals, neither needfull nor meet for him, ne yet pure and cleane, in killing living creatures, much more cruelly than those savage beasts that live of ravin: for bloud and carnage of murdered carcases is the proper and familiar food for a kite, a wolfe, or a dragon; but unto man it serveth in flead of his daintie dish: and more than fo, man in the use of all forts of beasts, doth not like other creatures that live of prey, which abletine from the most part, and warre with some small nüber, even for very necessity of food; for there is neither fowle flying in the aire, nor (in maner) any fifth swimming in the sea, nor (to speake in one word) any bealt feeding upon the sace of the earth, that can escape those tables of yours, which you call gentle, kinde and hospitall. But you 30 will fay, that all this standeth in stead of sauce to season your food : beit so : why then doe you kill the same for that purpose, and for to furnish those your milde and courteous tables?

*But the wifedome of beafts, farre different; for it giveth place to no arte whatfoever, that is *Itteemeth vaine and needleffe; and as for those that be necessarie, it enterteineth them not as comming that some from others, nor as taught by mercenatic masters for hire and money; neither is it required, wanting, that it should have any exercise to glue (as it were, and joine after a flender maner) ech rule, principle and proposition, one to another; but all at once of it selfe, it yeeldeth them all as native and inbred therewith. We heare fay, that all the Aegyptians be Physicians; but furely every beast hath in it selfe not onely the art and skill to cure and heale it selfe when it is sicke, but alfo is fufficiently inftructed how to feed and nourifh it felfe, how to use her owne ftrength, how 40 to fight, how to hunt, how to ftand at defence, yea, and in very muficke they are skilfull, ech one in that measure as is requisit and befitting the owne nature: for of whom have we learned, finding our felves ill at case, to goe into the rivers for to feeke for crabbes and craissishes? who hath taught the tortoifes, when they have caten a viper, to feeke out the herbe Organ for to feed upon? who hath shewed unto the goats of Candie, when they be shot into the bodie with arrowes, to finde out the herbe Dictamnus, for to feed on it, and thereby to cause the arrow head to come forth and fall from them? For if you fay (as the trueth is) that nature is the schoole-mistresse, teaching them all this, you referre and reduce the wifedome and intelligence of dumbe beafts unto the fagest and most perfect cause or principle that is; which if you thinke you may not call reason, nor prudence, ye ought then to seeke out some other name for it, that is better and 50 more honourable : and to fay a trueth, by effects thee theweth her puiffance to be greater and more admirable, as being neither ignorant nor ill taught, but having learned rather of it felf, not by imbecilitie and feebleneffe of nature, but contrariwife, through the force and perfection of naturall vertue, letting go, and nothing at all esteeming that beggerly prudence which is gotten from other by way of apprentisfage. Neverthelesse, all those things which men either for delicacie or in mirth and pastime, do present unto them for to learne and to exercise their conceit and wit withall, howfoever they be against the natural inclination of their bodies: yet such is their capacitie and the excellencie of their spirit, that they will reach thereto and compasse the fame thorowly. If ay nothing how whelps follow and trace beafts by the foot, or how colts prachife to fet their feet forward in their pace by measures: but how crowes and ravens will talke and practic, how dogs will leape and dance upon wheeles as they turne round about: also horses and oxen we see in the theaters, how they being taught to couch and lie downe, to daunce, to stand upright on their hinder feet, so woonderfully, that men themselves have much adoo to performe the like dangerous gestures, and yet this they doe after they have once learned it from others, yea, and remember the feat thereof, onely for a proofe, if there were no. thing elfe, that docible they be and apt to learne whatfoever a man would have them, fince that all this ferveth for nothing else in the whole world. Now if you bee hard of beliefe, and will not be perswaded that we learne the arts, I will say more than so; namely, that we can teach the same for the old rowen partridges teach their yoong ones how to runne awaie from before the fowler, and to escape by lying upon their backs, and holding up with their feete a clod of earth to hide themselves under it; and see we not daily upon the tops of our houses, how the old storks standing by their little ones, traine and teach them how to slie; semblablie the nightingales instruct their yoong birds in song, insomuch as those which be taken unfledge out of the nest, and are nourished by mans hand, never afterwards sing so well, because they be had away before their time from schoole, and want their master of musick. For mine owne part after that I was entred into this bodie, I marvelled much at those reasons and discourses of sophisters. who mainteined and perswaded me before time, that all living creatures besides man were without reason and understanding.

You are indeed Gryllus now much changed, and you can flew unto us by found demonstrations, that a sheepe is reasonable, and an affe hath wir, can you not?

Yes iwis, good ulysses, for even by these very arguments, a man may principally collect and gather, that the nature of beasts is not altogether void of the use of reason and intelligence: Like as therefore among trees, there is not one more or lesse destitute of soule, (I meanethat which is sensitive) than another, but they be all indifferently & equally void thereof, and not one of them is one jot endued therewith; even so in sensible beasts, there would not be one sound more flow and unapt to learne things of wit and understanding than another, if they were not 30 all partakers of reason and intelligence, although some have the same in more or lesse measure than others; and say there be some very blockith and exceeding dull of conceit, consider withall, how the wily sleights and crastic conceits of others may be put in balance against the same, namely, when you shall compare the fox, the woolfe, or the bees with the sheepe and the asset it is all one as if you should set Polyphemus to your selfe; or that Homer of Corinth to your grandstather Autoseus: And yet I thinke verily, that there is not so great difference and distance between beast and beast, as there is ods in the matter of wisedome, discourse of reason, and use of memorie between man and man.

But take heed of one thing Gryllus, that it be not a strange and absurd position, sounding of 40 no probabilitie at all, to attribute any use of reason unto those who have no sense or knowledge at all of God.

GRYLLUS.

VVhat ulysses, shall we not say that you being so wise and excellent as you are, were descended from the race of Sisyphus, &c.

The Summarie.

Loquence was highly esteemed in times past among Greeks and Romans, and therefore their children were trained and framed betimes in the schooles to discourse well, in good tearmes, and proper phrases, yea, and with pregnant and sound reasons of divers matters; to the end that when they were come to more yeeres, they might make proofe I of their sufficiencie in courts and publike assemblies of cities, in private consultations and familiar conferences, as it appeareth very plainly by the histories of all ages: Now after that young children had learned of their schoole-masters the rules and precept snamed Progymnalimata, or the first exercises, they were brought into the auditorie of some great prosessor in Rhetoricke; where there were proposed unto them certaine themes, gathered out of poets, historians, or philosophers, upon which they exercised their stile to write pro & contra, in the defence or consutation of this or that opinion, according to the measure of their spirit and capacitie, more or lesse: Those who were more forward, and farther proceeded than the rele, cond by heart that which they had penned, and pronounced 30 the same afterward in the presence of those that came to heare them: Some of them who were growen to a greater measure of knowledge, and as it were in the highest forme of such exercises, were woont to stand foorth and answer to all questions propounded, disputing and discoursing in the praise or dispraise of one and the same thing, as Gorgias, Carneades, and an infinit number of others, are able tomake good and verifie. This maner of exercise, named Declamations, was practised in Plutarchs time, as may be collected out of divers places of his works: and as these two treatises immediatly sollowing do sufficiently declare, the which are maimed and imperfect at the very beginning, in the mids and toward the end, especially the second: for it may be easily seene that they are stagments of certaine declamations which he wrote for his owne exercife when he was a young man. Now albeit they be fo corrupt and defective in maner all thorowout, yet the remnant which is left unto us, doth sufficiently 40 discover the honest occupation and emploiment of learned men in those daies, and the carefull industrie that they had to examine & discusse all things thorowly, to the end that by a diligent conference thereof, the trueth might the better appeare and be knowen. And if other whiles they mainteined certeine paradoxes and strange opinions, it was not upon any crosse and livigious spirit to defend obstinately all that came into their fantasticall braine, but for to augment and encrease in themselves an earnest defire to apprehend and understand things better: And how foever our author seemeth to be of minde for to defend the opinion of Pythagoras, as touching the transmigration of soules, and the prohibition to eate flesh; yet by other treatises written with more deliberate, mature and staid judgement, he giveth us to understand, that he is of a contrarte opinion; but his principall scope that he skootes hat seemeth to be a cutting off and abridging of the great excesse and superfluitie in purveying, buying, and 50 spending of viands, which in his time began to grow out of all measure; a disorder and inormitie which afterwards encreased much more. For to gaine and compasse this point, hee would seeme to perswade men to the opinion of Pythagoras, which mightly cutteth the wings of all riot and wastfull dissolution. Moreover, this ought not so be taken fo, as if it favoured and seconded the errour of certeine fautasticall persons, who have condemned the use of Gods good creatures : for in the schoole of Christ wee are taught good lessons, which refute sufficiently the dreames of the Pythagoreans, and resolve assuredly the good conscience of all those that make use of all exeasures (meet for the sustentation of this life) soberly and with thank serving, as knowing them to be good, and their use cleane and pure unto those whom the first of regeneration hath sanctified, for to make them partakers of that realme which is not feut up and inclosed in meats and drinks. As touching this present tract for the maintenance of Pythagoras his paradox, he alledgeth five reasons : to wit, That the eating of flesh, is a testimonic and figne of inhumanitie; That we ought to forbeare it, considering we are not driven upon necessitie to feed there upon; That it is an unnaturall thing; That it hurseth soule and body: and for a conclusion That men will never come themselves and converse modestly together, if they learne not first to be pitifull and kinde even to the very dumbe beafts.

WHETHER IT BE LAW. full to eat flesh or no.

The former Oration or Treatise.

Ut you demand of mee, for what cause Pythagoras absteined from eating fleth? And I againe do marvell, what affection, what maner of courage, or what motive and reason had that man, who sistanproched with his mouth unto a flaine creature, who durft withhis 20 lips once touch the flesh of a beast either killed or dead; or howhe could finde in his heart to be ferved at his table with dead bodies, and as a man may fay, very idols, to make his food and nourish. ment of those parts and members which a little before did blea, low, bellow, walke and fee. How could his eies endure to beholde fuch murder and flaughter, whiles the poore beafts were either flicked or had the throats cut, were flaied and difmembred? how could his no seabide the smell and fent that came from them? how came it that his tafte was not cleane marred and overthrowen with horrour, when he came to handle those uncouth fores and ulcers; or receive the bloud and humours, issuing out of the deadly wounds.

The skinnes now flated, upon the ground did spraule, The flesh on shits did bellow still and low: Roaft, fod and raw, did crie aswell as craule, And yeeld a voice of living oxe or cow.

But this, you will fay, is a loud lie, and a meere poeticall fiction; howbeit, this was certeinly a itrange and monstrous supper, that any man should hunger after those beasts, and defire to eat them whiles they still kept a lowing; to prescribe also, and teach men how they should feed of those creatures which live and criestill; to ordeine likewise, how they ought to be dressed, boiled, roafted, and ferved up to the boord. But he who first invented these monstruosities, ought to be inquired after, and not hee who 40 last gave over and rejected the same. Or a man may well say, that those who at the first began to eat flesh, had all just causes so to do, in regard of their want and necessitie: for surely, it was not by reason of disordinate and enormious appetite which they used a long time, nor upon plentie and abundance of necessarie things, that they grew to this insolencie, to seeke after strange pleasures, & those contrarie to nature. But verily, if they could recover their senses and speech againe, they might well fay now, Oh how happie and well beloved of the gods are you, who live in these daies! in what a world and age are you borne! what assure of all forts of good things do you enjoy! what harvests, what store of fruits yeeldeth the earth unto you! how commodious are the vintages! and what riches do the fields bring unto you! what a number of trees and plants do furnish you with delights and pleasures, which you may gather and receive, when you so thinke good ! you may live (if you lift) in all maner of delicacie, without once fouling your hands for the matter; whereas our hap was to be borne in the hardest time and most terrible age of the world, when as we could not chuse but incur (by reason of the new creation of all things) a great want and streight indigence of many necessaries: the face of the heaven and skie was still covered with the aire; the starres were dusked with troubled and instable humors, together with fire and tempestuous windes: the sunne was not yet setled and established, having a constant and certeine race to holde his course in.

From East to West, to make both even and morne Dinstinct, nor by returne from Tropiques twaine; The seasons chang'd from those that were beforne, Bedight with leaves, with flowers, with fruits and graine.

The earth fuffered wrong by the inordinate ftreames and inundations of rivers, which had neither certeine chanels nor banks: much of it lay waste and deformed, with loughs, marishes, and deepe bogges; much also remained favage, being over-spred with wild woods and fruitlesse sorefls: it brought forth no fruits ripe and pleasant; neither were there any tooles and instruments belonging to any arte; nor so much as any invention of a witty head. Hunger never gave us case no ortime of repose; neither was there any expectation or waiting for the yearely scalons of seednesse, for there was no sowing at all. No marvell therefore, if we did eat the shesh of beasts and living creatures even contrary to nature, confidering that then the very mosse and barke of trees ferved for food; & well was he who could find any greene graffe or quicke coich, or fo much as the root of the herbe * Phleos : but when soever men could meet with a cornes and mast to taste * 42 as not theroot of meneroe Thirds I but with most interference and in their run stores, which and feed upon, they would dance and hop for joy about an oake or beech tree; and in their run stores, which and feed upon, they would dance and hop for joy about an oake or beach tree; and in their run stores in the banks, flicall fongs call the earth their bountifull mother, and their kinde nourse: and such a day as & who would that onely, they accounted festivall: all their life besides was full of vexation, forrow and hea-say, the root vinesse. But now, what rage, what furie and madnesse inciteth you to commit such murders photos as Theand carnage ? feeing you have fuch flore and plentie of all things necessarie for your life ? ophraftus reand carnage receing you have been note and pietrie of all times because not futteine and portreth, is an 20 why belie youthe earth, and most unthankfully dishonour her, as it shee could not futteine and herbe grownourish you? why doe you violate the divine power of Ceres the inventresse of facred lawes, and ing plentconfframe fweet and gracious Bacchus, as if the fetwo deities gave you not fufficient whereupon you for the lake might live? what! are you not abashed to mingle at your tables pleasant frutes with bloudie Pastia, and murder? You call lions and libards favage beatls; meane while your felves are stained with therefore well bloudshed, giving no place to them in crueltie, for where as they doe worie and kill other enough knows ento Platarch. beafts, it is for verie necessitie and need of food; but you doe it for daintie fare, for when wee Indee it to be have flaine either lions or wolves in defence of our felves, we eat them not but let them lie: But Red-mace or they be the innocent, the harmeleffe, the gentle and tame creatures, which have neither teeth tobite, nor pricke to fting withall, which we take and kill, although nature feemeth to have 30 created them, onely for beautie and delight: [Much like as if a man feeing Nilus overflowing I fee not his banks, and filling all the countrey about with running water, which is generative and frute-is included full, would not praise with admiration the propertie of that river, causing to spring and grow so within these many faire and goodly fruits, and the fame fo necessaries for mans life; but if he chance to espie marks [] a crocodill swimming, or an aspick creeping and gliding downe, or some venemous slie, hurt-thisplace, or full and noisome bealts all, blameth the said river upon that occasion, and saith that they be cau-matter in fes sufficient, that of necessitie he must complaine of the thing: Or verily, when one seeing this hand: Huppose therefore land and champian countrey overspred with good and beautifull frutes, charged also and re-insintered plenished with eares of corne, should perceive casting his eie over those pleasant corne fields, here without here & there are not a real challenger in the state of the state here & there an eare of darnel, choke-crvil, or fome fuch unhappie weed among, should there-taken out of 40 upon forbeare to reape and carie in the faid corne, and forgoe the benefit of a plentifull harvest, forme other & find fault therewith: Semblably flandeth the case when one seeth the plea of an oratour in anie booke. cause or action, who with a full and forcible streame of eloquence, endevoureth to save his client out of the danger of death, or otherwise to proove and verifie the charges and imputations of certaine crimes; this oration (I fay) or eloquent speech of his, running not simplie and nakedly, but carrying with it many and fundrie affections of all forts, which he imprinteth in the minds and hearts of the hearers or judges, which being many also, and those divers and different, he is to turne, to bend and change, or otherwife, to dulce, appeale and staie; if he I say should anon passe over and not consider the principall issue, and maine point of the cause, and busic himselfe in gathering out some by speeches besides the purpose, or haply some phrases impro-50 per and impertinent, which the oration of some advocate with the flowing course thereof, hath caried downe with it, lighting thereupon, and falling with the rest of his speech.] But we are nothing mooved either with the faire and beautifull colour, or the sweet and tunable voice, or the quicknesse and subtilitie of spirit, or the near and cleane life, or the vivacitie of wit and understanding, of these poore seelly creatures; and for a little peece of slesh we take away their life, we bereave them of the funne and of light, cutting fhort that race of life which nature had limited and prefixed for them; and more than fo, those lamentable and trembling voices which they utter for feare, we suppose to be inarticulate or unfignificant founds, and nothing leffe than piti-

full praiers, supplications, pleas & justifications of these poore innocent creatures, who in their language, everie one of them crie in this manner : If thou be forced upon necessitie, I beseech thee not to fave my life: but if difordinate lust moove thee thereto, spare me: in case thou hast a mind simply to cat on my flesh, kill me; but if it be for that thou wouldest feed more delicate. ly, hold thy hand and let me live. O monstrous cruekie! It is an horrible fight to see the table of rich men onely, stand served and furnished with viands, set out by cooks and victuallers than dreffe the flesh of dead bodies; but most horrible it is to see the same taken up, for that the reliques and broken meats remaining, befarre more than that which is eaten: To what purpose then were those filly beasts slaine? Now there be others, who making spare of the viands served to the table, will in no hand that they should be cut or fliced; sparing them when as they be nothing els but bare flesh; whereas they spared them not whiles they were living beasts: But forafmuch as we have heard that the fame men hold and fay: That nature hath directed them to the eating of flesh; it is plaine and evident, that this cannot accord with mans nature: And first and formost this appeareth by the very fabrick and composition of his bodie; for it resembleth none of those creatures whom nature hath made for to feed on flesh, considering they have neither hooked bil, no hauke-pointed tallans, they have no sharpe and rough teeth, nor stomack fo ftrong, or fo hot breath and spirit, as to be able to concoct and digest the heavy masse of raw fleth: And if there were naught elfe to be alledged, nature her-felfe by the broadnesse and united equallity of our teeth, by our fmall mouth, our foft toong, the imbecillitie of naturall hear. and spirits serving for concoction, sheweth sufficiently that the approoveth not of mans usage 20 to eat flesh, but dissavoreth and disclaimeth the same: And if you obstinately maintaine and defend, that nature hath made you for to eat fuch viands; then, that which you minde to eat first kill your felfe, even your owne felfe (I fay) without using any blade, knife, bat, club, axe, or hatchet: And even as beares, lions, and woolves, flay a beatt according as they meane to eat it; even fo kill thou a beefe, by the bit of thy teeth; flay me a fwine with the helpe of thy mouth and lawes; teare in peeces a lambe or an hare with thy nailes; and when thou hast so done, eat it up while it is alive, like as beafts doe; but if thou staiest untill they be dead ere thou eate them, and art abashed to chase with thy teeth the life that presently is in the slesh which thou eatest; why doeft thou against nature eat that which had life? and yet, when it is deprived of life, and fully dead, there is no man hath the heart to eat the fame as it is; but they cause it to be boiled, & to be 30 rofted; they alter it with fire, and many drogues and spices, changing, disguising, and quenching (as it were) the horror of the murder, with a thousand devices of seasoning; to the end that the fenfe of talking being beguiled and deceived by a number of fweet fauces and pleafant conditure, might admit and receive that which it abhorreth, and is contrary unto it. Certes it was a pretie conceit which was reported by a Laconian, who having bought in his Inne or hostelie, a little fish, gave it, as it should seeme, to the Inkeeper for to be dressed; but when hee called unto him for vineger, cheefe, and oyle to doe it withall: If (quoth the Laconian) I had that which thou demandest of me, I would never have bought this fish. But we contratiwife, for to please our delicate tooth, are so delighted in flaughter and carnage, that flesh we call our viand; and yet then we have need of other viands for the very dreffing of flesh it selfe, mix-40 ing and adding thereto, oile, wine, honie, the prickle or fauce garum and vineger, embalming (as it were) and burying a dead corps with Syriake spices and Arabicke sauces. And verily, when our flesh meats after this maner be mortified, made tender, and in some fort purified, our naturall heat hath much adoe to concoct the fame, and being not able in deed to digeft them perfitly, it ingendereth in us dangerous heavinesse and crudities apt to breed diseases. Diogenes upon a time was forash, that he durst eat a polype or pour cuttle fish all raw, because he would have taken away the use and helpe of fire in dreffing such meats: and there being certeine priests and many other men standing about him, when he covered his head with his cloake, and put the flesh of the said poulpe to his mouth, he said unto them all; For your sake it is that I hazard my felfe thus as I doe, and adventure this jeopardie. Now by Jupiter, this was a proper pe- 50 rill in deed, and a doutie danger, was it not? for this Philosopher heere exposed not himselfe to any perillous hazard, as Pelopidas did, for recovery of the Thebans libertie; nor as Armodius and Aristogiton, for the freedome of Athens: who thus wrestled with a raw poulpe fish in his stomacke, and all to make the life of man more beastlike and savage. Well then, plaine it is that the eating of flesh is not onely unnaturall in regard of the bodie, but also by repletion, fulnesse and fatietie, it maketh the foule fat and groffe: for the drinking of wine and feeding upon flesh meats to the full, howfoever it may feeme to cause the bodie to be more able and strong, yet furely the minde it doth enfeeble and weaken. And left I should be thought a profession entitle to those who practise the exercise of the bodie named Athletica, I will use the domestical examples of mine owne countrey: for the inhabitants of Atties do tearme us of Baotis, fat-backs, grosse and lenselsse, and blockish fots, principally for our ranke and large feeding; like as one said:

Oftrueth these men, in judgement mine, Be nothing els but franked swine.

And as Menander wrote in one place:
With fat their cheeks be puft and swolne:
See, see sheir chaps how they be bolue.

Asalso Findarus:

They plie their jawes, they feed amaine, That even their cheeks do shine againe.

But according to Heraelinus, the drie foule feemeth to be the wifeft: for know thus much moreover; that emptie, tunnes, pipes, or barrels, refound when they be knocked upons where as if they be full, they answer not againe to the knocks or stroaks given them: brasse pannes or coppers which be thin & slender; render founds, and ring all about untill such time as one come and with his hand seeme to flop and dull the stroke that otherwise went round about: The eie filled with superstuous humiditie, becommeth dim and darke, neither hath it the full strength and power to performe his office. When we behold the sume through a moist aire, and a number of thick mists, and grosse undigested vapors, we see him not in his owne nature pure, cleere, and bright; but as it were in the bottome of a cloud, all duskish, and casting footh thicke wandring and dispersed beames: And even so through a bodic troubled with vapors, full fedde overcharged with nutriments, of unkind and strange viands, it cannot chuse but all the light and shining brightnesse of the soule which is naturall, should become dusked and troubled, having no radiant settled splendour, able to pierce throughly to the ends and externities of subtile and fine objects, hardly to be discerned, but the same is wandering, unsteadie and dispersed. But setting all these matters asset in the surfers as the sur

But fetting all these matters aside, is it not, thinke you, a right commendable thing to be acquainted and accustomed to humanitie? for who would ever finde in his heart to abuse & wrong 30 a man, who is affectionate, gentle, and milde, to the very beafts which are of a strange kind from us, and have no communication of reason with us? Three daies agoe, I alledged and cited in my disputation a testimonie of Xenocrates to this purpose; and namely: How the Athenians condemned him to pay a round fine, who had flaied a quick ramme: And in very truth, he that tormenteth and putteth to paine one that is living, is not in my conceit woorfe than he that taketh the life away and killeth him: Howbeit, as farre as I can fee, more fenfe and feeling we have of fuch things as be unufuall and against custome, than unnaturall and contrarie unto kinde: But those reasons which I then delivered, smell haply of some groffenesse, and were too triviall; for I feare and am loth to touch and fet abroch in these my discourses, that great and high principle, that deepe and mysticall cause of this our position: That we ought not to cat flesh; for that 40 I say the hidden secret and original thereof is so incredible to base and timorous persons, as Plato faith, and to fuch as favour of nothing but of earthly and mortall matters; and heerein I fare much like unto the pilot and master of the ship, who in a tempest is afraid to put his ship to sea; or unto a poet, who dareth not set up his fabrick or engin in the theater, all while the stage or pageant is turned and caried round about: And yet peradventure it were not amiffe in this place to refound and pronounce aloud those verses of Empedacles, * * * For under covert tearmes he doth allegorize and give us to understand; that the soules heere, are tied and sastened to mortall bodies, by way of punishment, for that they have beene murderers, have eaten flesh, devoured one another, and beene fed by mutuall flaughter and carnage: And yet this feemeth to be an opinion more ancient than Empedocles: for those fictions of Poets as tou-50 ching the diffnembring of Bacchus, and the outragious attempts of the Tyrans against him, and how they tasted of slesh murdred, as also of their punishment, and how they were smitten with lightning, they be meere fables: the hidden mythologie whereof, tendeth to that renovation of birth or refurrection: for furely that brutish and reasonlesse part of our soule which is violent, disordered, and not divine, but divelish and dæmoniack, the auncient philosophers called Titans; and this is that which

wing then eaby the example of Lycurgus, that we ought to cut off the first occasions of all superfuities, he conferreth the opinions of Pythagoras and Empedocles, with those of other philosophers, and therewith setteth downe his owne concest and advice. Afterwards when he had in one word touched, from whence, and whereupon men become so bold and hardie to eat flesh; he declareth a fresh and proporth, that this manner of feeding doth woonderfully prejudice both bodie and foule. And in conclusion, he confuteth the Stoicks, opposite enemies to the doctrine of Pythagoras; leaving thurefut otion unperfect, were it that himselfe never finished it, or that the malice and iniquitie of the time hash deprived us thereof: Like as many other fragments missing in these works.

OF EATING FLESH.

The second Declamation.

Eason would, that we should be fresh disposed, and readie in will, in mind and thought, to heare the discourse against this mustie and unfavorie cultome of cating flesh: For hard it is, as Cate was woont to fay, to preach unto the belly that hath no eares; and besides wee have all drunke of the cup of custome, resembling that of Circe

Compounded is of dolors griefes and paines, Of forrowes, woes, and of deceitfull traines? Neither is it an easie matter for them to cast up againe the hooke of the appetite to eat flesh, who have swallowed it downe into their entrals, and are transported and full of the love of pleasures and delights: But well and happie it were for us, if, as the manner is of the Aegyptians, fo foone as men are dead, to paunch them, and when their belly and bowels be taken foorth, to mangle, cut and flice the fame against the funne, and then to fling them away, as being the cause of all finnes that they have committed: fowe would first cut away from our selves all our gourmandise, gluttonie, and murdering of innocent creatures, that we might afterwards lead the rest of our life pure and holy; considering 50 that it is not the belly it selfe that by murder defileth us; but polluted it is by our intemperance. But fay, it is not in our power to effect thus much, or be it, that upon an inveterate cultome, we are as hamed in this point to be innocent and faultlesse; yet let us at leastwife commit sinne in measure, and transgresse with reason: Let us I say eat flesh, but so, as we be driven thereto for veric hunger, and not drawen to it by a licorous tooth, to fatisfie our necessitie, and not to feedour greedie and delicate humour: kill we a beaft, howbeit with fome griefe of heart, with fome commisferation and pitty; and not of a proud and infolent spirit, ne yet of a murderous mindes asmendoe now adaies, after many and divers forts: For some in killing of swine or porkets. thrust them in with red-hot spits; to the end that the bloud being shed and quenched as it were by the tineture of the fire iron, running through the body, might cause the flesh for sooth to bemore tender and delicate: ye shall have others leape upon the udders and paps of the poore fower ready to farrow, and trample upon their bellies and teats with their feet, that the bloud, the milke, and the congealed bag of the yoong pigges, knit within the dammes wombe, being all jumbled, confused and blended together, even amidde the painfull pangs of farrowing (O Jupiter Piacularis) they might make (I would not els) a most deintie dish of meat, and devoire the most corrupt and putrified part of the poore beast: many there are who have a device to flitch and fowe up the eies of cranes and fwannes, and when they have fo done, to mew them up in adarke place, and so feed them, cramming them with strange compositions and pastes made of dried figges; but wor you why? because their flesh should be more deintie and pleafant: whereby it appeareth evidently, that it is not for need of nourithment, nor for want and necessitie; but even for facietie, wantonnesse, sumptuous curiositie, and superstuous excesse, that of horrible injuffice and wickedneffe, they make their pleafure and delight; and like as the filthy lecherous person, who is unfatiable in the pleasure of women, after he hath affaied many, runneth on headlong still, roving and ranging every way, and yet his unbrideled and untamed lust is not yet satisfied, but hee falleth to perpetrate such horrible villanies as are not once to be named; even so intemperance in meats, when it hath passed once the bounds of nature, and li-20 mits of necessitic, proceedeth to outrage and crueltie, fearthing all meanes how to varie and change the difordinate appetite; for the organs and inffruments of our fenfes, by a fellow-feeling and contagion of maladies, are affected one by another, yea, and runne into diforder and finne together, through intemperance, when they reft not contented with the measure affigued them by nature: Thus the hearing being out of frame and ficke, or not guided by reafon, marrethmuficke; the feeling when it is degenerate into an efferminate delicacie, feeketh filthily after wanton ticklings, touchings, and frictious handling of women: the fame vice of intemperance hath taught the eiefight not to be contented with beholding morisks, pyrthick, or warlike dances, nor other law dable and decent geftures, ne yet to fee and view faire pictures and goodly flatues, but to effceme the death and murder of men, their mortall wounds, bloudie fights, 30 and deadly combats, to be the best fights and spectacles that can be devised. And hereupon it is, that upon fuch excessive fare & superfluity at the table, there ensue ordinarily wanton loves; upon lecherie and filthy venerie, there followeth beaftly talke; these bandie ballads and stinking tales, be accompanied commonly with hideous fights, & monitrous thewes: laftly, these hornblespectacles have attending upon them, crueltie and inhumane impaffibilitie, cuen in the cases of verie mankind. Heereupon it was that Lyeurgus the divine law-giver, in those three ordinances of his which he called Rhetra, commanded that the dores, roufes & finials of houses, should be made with the saw & the ax onely, & no other instrument besides thereto emploied; which he did not, I affure you, for any hatred at all that he conceived against augers, wimbles, twibils, or other tooles for joyners or carvers worke; but he knew well inough, that a man would 40 neverbring among such simple frames a gilded bedstead, nor venture to carrie into an house soplainly built, filver tables, hangings, carpets and coverings of rich tapestrie died with purple, or any precious stones; and he wist full well, that with such an house, with such bedsteads, tables and cups, a frugall supper and a simple dinner would agree and sort best. For to say a truth, upon the beginning and foundation of a difordinate diet, and superfluous kind of life; all maner of delcacie and cottly curiofitie ufeth to follow

What supper then, is not to be counted sumptious, for which there is evermore killed some living creature or other: for doe we thinke little of the dispense of a soule? and suppose we, that 50 the loffe of life is not costly? I do not now say, that it was peradventure the soule of a mother, a father, some friend, or a sonne, as Empedocles gave it out; but surely a soule endued with sense, with feeing, hearing, apprehension, understanding, witte and discretion, such as nature hath given to each living creature, fufficient to feeke and get that which is good for it, and likewife to avoid and shun whatsoever is hurtfull and contrary unto it. Consider now a little, whether those philosophers that teach and will us to eat our children, our friends, our fathers and wives when they are dead, doe make us more gentle and fuller of humanitie, than Pythagoras and Empedocles, who accustome and acquaint us to be kind and just, even to other creatures. Well, you mock and laugh at him that maketh confeience to eat of a mutton; and shall not we (fay they) laugh a good and make sport when we see one cutting and chopping pieces of his father or mother being dead, and fending away some thereof to his friends who are absent, and inviting fuch as be prefent and necre at hand, to come and make merrie with the rest, causing fuch joints and pieces of flesh to be served up to the table, without any spare at all ? But it may be, that we offend now, and commit some fault in handling these books, having not before. hand clenfed our hands, mundified our eies, purified our feet, and purged our cares; unlesse perhaps this be their clenfing and expiation, to devile & discourse of such things with sweet & pleafant words, which as Plato faith, wash away all falt & brackish hearing: but if a man should 10 fet these books & arguments in parallell opposition or comparison one with another; he would judge that fome of them were the Philosophie of the Scythians, Tartarians, Sagidians, and Me. lanchlamians, of whom when Herodotus writeth, he is taken for a liar; and as for the sentences and opinions of Pythagoras and Empedocles, they were the very lawes, ordinances, statutes. and judgements of the auncient Greeks, according to which they framed their lives, towit: That there were betweene us and brute beafts certeine common rights: who were they then, that afterwards otherwise ordeined?

Even they who first of iron and steele, mischievous swords didsorge: And of poore labouring ox at plough, began to cut the gorge. For even thus also began tyrants to commit murders; like as at the first in old time, they killed at Athens one notorious and most wicked sycophant, named Episedeius; so they did by a second, and likewise a third: now the Athenians being thus acquainted to see men put to death; faw afterwards Niceratus the founc of Nicias murdred; Theramenes also the great commander and captaine generall; yea and Polemarchus the philosopher. Semblably, men began at fiist to cat the flesh of some savage and hurtfull beast, then some sowles and fish were snared and caught with nets, and confequently, crueltie (being fleshed as it were, exercised and inured in thefe and fuch like flaughters) proceeded even to the poore labouring ox, to the filly theepe that doth clad and trimme our bodies, yea, and to the house-cocke; and thus men by little 20 and little augmenting their infatiable greedinesse, never stated untill they came to manflaughter, to murder, yea, and to bloudie battels. But if a man can not proove nor makedemonstration by found reasons, that soules in their resurrections and new nativities meet with common bodies; so as that which now is reasonable, becommeth afterwards reasonlesse, and likewife that which at this prefent is wild and favage, commeth to be by another birth and regeneration, tame and gentle againe; and that nature transmuteth and translateth all bodies, diflodging and replacing the foule of one in another,

Are not these reasons yet at least wise sufficient to reclaime and divert men from this unbride 40 led intemperance of murdring dumb beafts? namely, that it breedeth maladies, crudities, heavineffe and indigeftion in the bodie, that it marreth and corrupteth the foule, which naturally is given to the contemplation of high and heavenly things? to wit, when we have taken up a woont and custome, not to feast a friend or stranger who commeth to visit us, unlesse we shed bloud; and cannot celebrate a marriage dinner, or make merric with our neighbours and friends without committing murder? And albeit the faid proofe and argument of the transmigration of foules into fundrie bodies, be not fufficiently declared, fo as it may deferve to be credited and beleeved; yet furely the conceit and opinion thereof, ought to work fome fcruple and feare in our harts, and in fome fort hold us in & flay our hands. For like as when two armies encounter one another in a night battell; if one chaunce to light upon a man fallen upon the ground, 50 whose bodie is all covered and hidden with armour, and present his sword to cut his throat, or runne him through, and therewith heare another crying unto him, that he knoweth not certeinly, but thinketh and supposeth that the partie lying along is his brother, his sonne, his sather, or tent-fellow; whether were it better, that he giving eare and credit to this conjecture and fuspicion(falsethough it be) should space and forbeare an enemie for a friend, or rejecting that which had no fire and evident proofe, kill one of his friends in flead of an enemie? I suppose there is not one of you all but will fay, that the later of these were a most grosse and leud part, Behold moreover Merope in the tragedy when she lifteth up her ax for to strike her own sonne, taking him to be the murderer of her sonne, and saying withall:

what a stirre and trouble she maketh over all the theater? how she causeth the haire to stand upright upon the heads of the spectators, for feare lest the should prevent the old man who was about to take hold of her arme, and so wound the guilt lefte yoong man her sonne? But if peradabout to take venture in this case there should have stood another aged man fast by, crying unto her : Strike To hardly, for it is your enemie, and a third contrariwife, faying: Strike not in any wife, it is your owne fonne; whether had beene the greater and more grievous finne, to let goe the revengement of her enemie for doubt that he was her fonne, or to commit filicide and murder her fonne indeed, for the anger the bare unto her enemie? When as therefore there is neither hatred nor anger that driveth us to doe a murder; when neither revenge, nor feare of our owne fafetic and life mooveth us, but even for our pleafure we have a poore sheepelying under our hand with the throat turned upward, a philosopher of the one fide should say: Cut the throat, for it is a brute beast, and another admonish us on the other side, saying: Stay your hand and take heed what you doe; for what know you to the contrarie, whether in that theepe be the foule lodged of some kinsman of yours, or peradventure of some God? Is the danger (before God) all 20 one and the fame, whether I refuse to eat of the flesh, or believe not that I kill my child or some one of my kinsfolke?

Butfurely the Stoicks are not equally matched in this fight for the defence of eating flesh: For what is the reason that they so band themselves, and be so open mouthed in the maintenance of the belly and the kitchin? what is the cause that condemning pleasure as they doe, for an effeminate thing, and not to be held either good or indifferent, no nor fo much as familiar and agreeable to nature, they fland fo much in the patronage of those things that make to the pleafure and delight of feeding? And yet by all confequence, reason would, that confidering they chase and banish from the table, all sweet perfumes and odoriferous ointments, yea, and al patric worke, and banketting junkets, they should be rather offended at the sight of bloud and 36 flesh, But now, as if by their precise philosophicall rules, they would controlle our day books and journals of our ordinarie expences, they cut off all the cost bestowed upon our table in things needleffe and superfluous; meane while they finde no fault with that which savoureth of bloudfhed and crueltie in this superfluitie of table furniture: We doe not indeed, (fay they)because there is no communication of rights betweene beasts and us; but a man might answer themagaine verie well : No more is there betweene us and perfumes or other forraine and exoticall fauces, and yet you would have us to abfleine from them, rejecting and blaming on all fides, that which in any pleasure is neither profitable nor needfull. But let us I pray you confider upon this point a little neerer, to wit, whether there be any communitie in right and juffice, betweene us and unreafonable creatures or no? and let us doe it not fubtilly and artificially, as the captious manner is of these sophisters in their disputations;

but rather after a gentle and familiar fort, having an eie unto our owne passions and affections, let us reason and decide the matter with our felves.

Reat dispurations there have beene holden among the Philosophers and Sages of the world, as souching the sovereigne good of man, as it may appeere even at this day by the books that are extant among us 3 and yet neither one nor other, have hit the true marke whereat they shot, to wit: The right knowledge of God: Howbeit, some of them are a great deale farther out of the way than others 3 and namely the Epicurean.

whom our author doth perstringe in many places, as holding a doctrine cleane contrary unto theirs. according as his writings doe testifie. And for asmuch as Epicurus and his disciples placed and ettablilhed this fovereigne good, in pleasure of the bodie: this their opinion is heere examined and confuted at large : for in forme of a dialogue Plutarch rehearleth the communication or conference which he had with Aristodemus, Zeuxippus, and Theon, as they walked together immediately after one lecture of his upon this matter, who having shewed in generall tearmes the absurdities of this Epicurian doctrine, mainteineth in one word: That it is no life at all for to live according to the same. Then he explaneth and sheweth what the Epicureans meane by this word To live: and from thence proceedeth forward to refute their imagination, and what soever dependent thereupon, and that by sound 30 and weighty arguments, intermingling many pretie conceits and pleafant jests, together with certaine proper similitudes for the purpose: After he had prooved that they were deceived themselves, and seduced their disciples; he holderh moreover this point: That even they deprive themselves of the true good, which confisteth in the repose and contentment of the mind, rejecting (as they doe) all Histories, Mathematicall arts and liberall sciences, and among the rest, Poetrie and Musicke; shewing throughout all this discourse that such persons are deprived of common sense. Passing forward, he holdeth and mainteinesh that the foule taketh joyen a conteniment proper to it selfe: and afterwards in discoursing of the pleasure that active life doth bring; he refuteth more and more his adversarie, addressing to this purpose, a certeine conference and comparison betweene the pleasures of bodie and soule; whereby a man may fee the miserie of the one, and the excellencie of the other. I his point he enricheth with diversex-40 amples; the end whereof sheweth: That there is nothing at all to be counted great or profitable in the schoole of Epicurus, whose scholars never dur stapproove his opinion, especially in death: also: That vertuous men have without all comparison much more pleasure in this world, than the Epicureans, who in their afflictions know not how to receive any joy or comfort by remembrance of their pleafures past. And this is the very summe of the dialogue during the time that the above named persons did walke; who after they were set, began the disputation a fresh, and spake in the first place of Gods providence, condemning by divers reasons the atheisme of the Epicureans, who are altogether inexcusable, even in comparison of the common sort given to superstition: continuing and holding on this discourse, he depainteth very lively the nature of the Epicureans, and commeth to represent and set down the contentment that men of honor have in their religion; where also he holdeth thu point: That 50 God is not the author of evill; and that the Epicureans are sufficiently punished for their impletie, in depriving themselves of that pleasure which commesh unto us by meditation of the divine wisedome in the conduct and management of all things. Confequently he sheweth that this their prophane philosophie overthroweth and consoundeth all persons, as well intheir death, as during their life: Whereupon he proceedeth toweat of the immortality of the soule, and of the life to come; describing at large the milery of the Epicureans: and for a finall conclusion, he comprise th in fower or five lines the Summary of all their error, and so shutteth up and concludeth the whole disputation. THAT live pleasantly according to the docarine of Epicurus.

Olores one of the difciples, and familiar followers of Epicurus, wrote and published a booke, wherein he endevoured to proove and declate: That there was no life at all to speake of, according to the opinions and fentences of other Philosophers. Now as touching that which readily came into my minde for the answere of his challenge and the discourse against his reasons in the defence of other Philosophers, I have before time put downe in writing: but forasmuch as after the less one and disputation of this matter ended, there passed many speeches in our walke against that sect; I thought it good to collect and gither the same, yea, and to reduce them into a written treatife; if for nothing els, yet for this caule, to give them at leastwife to understand who are fo ready to note, cenfure and correct others, that a man ought to have heard and read 20 with great heed and diligence (and not fuperficially) the works and writings of those whom he takethupon him to reprove and refute, and not to sicke out one word here & another there, or to take hold of his words delivered by way of talke & conference, and not couched and fer down precifely in writing, thereby to repell and drive away the ignorant and fuch as have no knowledge of those things. For when as we walked forth, after the lecture (as our manekwas) out of the schoole into the common place of exercife, Zeuxippus mooving speech, began in this wife: Methinks (quoth he) that this diffcourse hath beene delivered much more mildly and gently, than becommeth frankneffe and libertie of speech betweening the schooles; which is the reason that Heraclides and his followers be departed from us, as discontented and displeased, yea, and much more bitterly nipping and checking us (without any coufe given on our part) than either 30 Epicurus or Metrodorus. Then Theon: Why faid you not (quoth he) that Colotes (in comparifon of them) is the most modest and fairest spoken man in the world ? For the most soule and reprochfull tearmes that can be devifed for to raile and flander withall, to wit, of facrileges, fourrilities, vanities of foeech, talkative, bubbling, glorious and vanting arrogancie, who remonging, murders, counterfeit hypocrites, confiners, curfed creatures, heavie headed, brainficke, tedious and making their braines ake who reade them: thefe(I fay) they have raked up together, and difcharged as it were haile-thot upon Aristotle, Socrates, Pythagoras, Protagoras, Theophrastes, Heracides, Hipparchies, and whom not of all the most renowned and principall Philosophers? in fuch fort, that how well and wifely foever they have carried themselves otherwise, yet in regard of their foule mouthes, flanderous speeches, and beaftly backbitings, they deferve to be seque-40 stred farre off, and put out of the range and number of wife men and Philosophers : for envie, emulation and jealousie ought not to enter into this divine dance and heavenly quire, being so weake and impotent, that they can not diffemble and hide their griefe and discontent. Heereat Aristodemus: Herachdes (quoth hee) who by profession is a Grammarian, in the behalfe of all the poeticall rabble (for fo it pleafeth the Epicureans to blason them) and for all the soolish and fabulous vanities of Homer, hath well requited Epicurus; or because Metrodorus in so many places of his writings hath reviled and abused that prince of poets: but as for them (ô Zeuxippus) let them goe as they are: and whereas it was objected in the beginning of the speech against those men: That there was no living at all after their precepts and rules, why doe not we our felves, alone by our felves, taking unto us Theon for our affociat (because this man here is wea-50 rie) go in hand to profecute the fame thorowly? Then Theon made him this answere:

This combat hath before us, beene Perform d by others, well I weene.

And therefore propounding to our felves (if it pleafe you) another marke and fcope to aime at, let us (for to be revenged of the injurie done unto other philosophers) proceed after this forme of process, and assay to proove and thew (if it be possible) that according to the doctrine even of these Epicureans, men cannot live in joy and pleasure. Say you so? (quoth I then, and laughed heartily withall) now surely, me thinks you are leapt upon their bellies, and be readie to trample them with both your feet: certes, you will enforce these men to fight for their verie owne flesh if you bereave them of pleasure, who doe nothing els but crie out and sing this

We are in deed no champions brave,

In fight with fifts no grace we have, neither are we eloquent oratours, wife magistrates or prudent governours and rulers of cities or

But for to feast andmake good cheere,

To eat and drinke, we have no peere. We love (I fay) to banquet alwaies and make merie, to give our felves contentment and all the 10 delightfull motions and pricks of the flesh, if haply any pleature and joy thereby may betranfmitted and fent into the foule: fo as you feeme to me not to deprive these men of joy and solace onely, but also of their very life, in case you doe not leave them a pleasant and jocundlife. How then? (quoth Theon) if you thinke fo well of this subject matter, why do not you set in hand to it at this present. For mine owne part (said he again) content I will be to heare you, and answer againe, if you request fo much; but begin you first to set us in the traine thereof, for I will yeeld unto you the superioritie and presidence of this disputation. Now when Theon seemed to pretend some small excuse; Aristodemus: O what a compendious, ready, faire & plaine way (quoth he) have you cut us of, for to come unto this point, in not permitting us first to make inquisition unto this Epicurean feet, and to put them to their triall as touching vertue and honellie! 20 for it is no easie matter, nay it is impossible to drive these men from a pleasant and voluptuous life, fo long as they suppose and set downe this: That the supreame end of all humane felicitie lieth in pleasure; wheras, if we could once have brought this about: That they lived not honest ly; presently and withall, they had bene put by their pleasant life; for they themselves confesse, and fay: That a man can not live in joy, unleffe he be honeft; for that the one may not fland without the other. As touching that point (quoth Theon) we will not flicke in the progressed our discourse, to handle it, but for the present, we will take that which they grant, and make our use of it; this therefore they holde: That the sovereigne good whereof we speake, confisher in the bellie and the parts thereabout, as also in those other passages and conduits of the bodie, thorow which, pleasure entreth into it; & no pain at all; and they are of opinion that all the fine 30 devices, fubtill and wittie inventions in the world were put in triall and practifed, for to please and content the bellie, or at least wife, for the good hope that the should enjoy contentment, according as the wife Philosopher Metrodorus hath faid and written. And verily, by this their first supposition, without going any farther, it is easie to be knowen and scene (my good friend) what a flender, poore, rotten and unfteadie foundation they have laied, to ground upon it their fovereigne good; confidering that even those pores & conduits above said (by which they bring in their pleasures) lie aswell open to admit grievous paines; or to say more truely, there be very few wates in the bodie of man, by which, pleasure entreth; whereas there is no part or member thereof, but receive th dolor and paine. For beit granted, that all pleasures have their feat in the naturall parts, about joints, finewes, feet and hands; why, even in these very places are bedded 40 and feated also the most cruell and grievous passions that be; to wit, of goutie fluxes and rhewmaticke ulcers, of gangrenes, tettars, wolves, cancerous fores, which corrode, eat, mortificand putrifiethe parts that they possesse. If you present unto the bodie the sweetest odours and the most pleasant savours that be, you shall finde but few places therein (and seeke thorowout) affected therewith mildly and gently to their contentment; whereas all the rest often times are grieved and offended thereby: nay there is no part at all of the body, but subject it is to feele and fuffer the finant dolors inflicted by fire, by fword, by fling, biting, fcourging and whipping; the ardour of heat, the rigor of colde entereth and pierceth into all parts, like also as doth the lever: but pleasures verily are much like unto pretie puffes and gentle gales of winde, blowing after 2 finding maner, fome upon one extremitie that beareth out of the bodie, and fome upon other, 50 as if it were upon the tocks lying forth in the fea, they passe away, blow over and vanish incontinently, their time and continuance is so short: much like unto those meteors or fire-lights in the night, which represent the shooting of starts as if they fell from heaven, or traversed the skie from one fide to the otherstoone are the pleasures on a light fire, and as soone againe gone out and quenched at one instant in our sless, but contrariwise, how long paines and dolors do endure, we cannot alledge a better teilimony than that of PhiloEteres in Aefchylus, who speaking of the paine of his ulcer, faith thus: That

That dragon fell, doth never leave his holde, By day or night, since fir st my foot he caught: The flinging mart goes to my beart full colde, By poisoned tooth which from his moush it raught.

Neither doth the anguish of paine lightly runne over and glide, after a tickling maner, upon other superficiall parts and externities of the bodie; but contrariwise, like as the graine or feed of the Sea-claver or Trefoile Medica, is writhen and full of points and angles, whereby it taketh hold of the earth and flicketh fast, and there (by reason of those points so rough and rugged) continueth a long time; even fo dolor and paine, having many crotchets and hooked fournes of roots, which it putteth foorth and spreadeth here and there, inserteth and interlaceth it selfe within the flesh, and there abideth, not onely for a night and a day, but also for certeine scasons of whole yeeres, yea, and fome revolutions of Olympiades, fo that hardly and with much adoc at the laft departeth, being thrust out by other paines, like as one naile is driven forth by another ftronger than it. For what man was ever knowen to have drunke or eaten fo long a time, as they endure thirst who are ficke of an ague, or abide hunger who are befreged? and where is that solace and pleasure in the companie and conversation of friends, that lasteth so long as tyrants capfe them to abide torture and punishment, who fall into their hands? and all this proceedeth from nought els but the inability and untowardnesse of the body, to leade a voluptuous life; for that in trueth, made it is more apt to abide paine and travell, than to joy in delights and pleafures; to endure laborious dolors, it hath ftrength and power fufficient; whereas to enjoy pleanures and delights, it sheweth presently how feeble and impotent it is, in that so soone it hath enough and is wearie thereof: by occasion whereof, when they see that wee are minded to discourie much as touching a voluptuous life, they interrupt and breake incontinently our purpose, confessing themselves; that bodily and stethly pleasure is very small and seeble, or (to say a trueth) transitorie, and such as passeth away in a moment; unlesse haply they are disposed to lie and speake otherwise than they thinke; like as Metrodorus did, when he faid: That often times wefpit against the pleasures of the bodie; and Epicurus, when he writeth: That a wise man being ficke and difeated, laugheth and rejoiceth in the middes of the greatest and most excessive paines of his corporall malady. How is it possible then, that they who so lightly and easily beare 30 the anguish of bodily paines, should make any account of pleasures? for admit that they give no place to paines, either in greatnesse or continuance of time, yet they have at leastwife some reference and correspondence unto them, in that Epicurus hath given this general limitation and common definition to them all; to wit, Indolence or a fubtraction of all that which might cause and move paine; as if nature extended joy to the easement onely of dolor, and suffered it notto proceed further in augmentation of pleafure; but when it came once to this point, namely, to feele no more paine, it admitted onely certeine needlefle varieties. But the way to come with an appetite and defire to this effate, being indeed the full measure of joy and pleasure, is exceeding briefe and short; whereupon these Epicureans perceiving well, that this place is verice leane and hard, do translate and remove their fovereigne good, which is the pleasure of the bo-40 die, as it were out of a barren foile, into a more fruitfull and fertill ground, and namely, to the foule, as if therein we should have alwaics orchards, gardens and meddowes covered over with pleasures and delights, whereas according to the saying of Telemachus in Homer:

In Ithaca there is no facious place,

Affour ding plaines as large to runne a race. And even fo in this poore fleshly body of ours, there is no fruition of pleasure united, plaine and smooth, but altogether rugged and rough, intermingled and delaied for the most part, with many agitations that be feverous and contrary to nature. Hereat Zeuxippus taking occasion to fpeake: Thinke you not then (quoth he) that these men doe very wel in this, that they begin with the body; wherein it feemeth that pleafure engendreth first, & afterwards end in the soule, as in 50 that which is more conftant & firme, repofing therein all absolute perfection? Yes I wis (quoth I) and my thinks I affure you that they doe paffing well, and according to the direction of nature, in case they still search after and find that which is more perfect, and accomplished like as those persons do, who give themselves to contemplation and politicke life; but if afterwards you heare them protest and crie with open mouth, that the soule joieth in no worldly thing, nor findeth content and repose, but onely in corporall pleasure, either present and actuall, or els in meere expectation thereof, and that therein alone confilteth their fovereigne good : thinke you not that they use the soule as a receptorie for the bodie, and in thus translating the pleasure of the body into it, they doe as those who powre and fill wine out of one veffell that leaketh and is naught, into another that is more compact and will hold better, for to preferve and keepe it longer, as supposing thereby, to make the thing farre better, and more honourable; and rerily time doth keepe well and mend the wine that is thus powred out of one veffell into another But of pleafure, the foule receiving the remembrance onely, as the odour and finell thereof, teteineth nothing elfe ; for that fo foone as pleafure hath wrought or boiled as it were one walme in the flesh, it is soone quenched and extinguished, and that remembrance remaining thereof paffeth foone away as a shadow, smoke, or furning vapour; much like as if a man should gather and heape together a number of fanfies and cogitations of whatfoever he had eat or drunke before time, and so make his repast and food thereof, for default of other wines and viands fresh to and present in place: yet see how much more modestly the Cyrenaick philosophers are affected, although they have drunke out of the same bottle with Epicurus; for they are of opinion; that the wanton sports of Venus should not be exercised openly, and in the day light, but would have the fame to be hidden and covered with the darkneffe of the night; for feare left our cogitation receiving cleerely by the cie-fight the reprefentations of this faid act, might eftfoones inflame and stirre up the lust and appetite thereto: whereas these men contrariwise doe hold, that heerin confifteth the perfection of a wife mans felicitie, for that he remembreth certeinly, and reteineth furely all the evident figures, geftures, and motions of pleafures paft. Now whether fuch precepts and rules as these, be unwoorthy the name of those who make profession of wiledome, namely thus to fuffer fuch feourings and filthy ordures of their pleafures to remain in the 20 foule, as it were in the finke and draught of the bodie, I purpose not to discourse at this time, But furely that unpossible it is for fuch matters to make a man happic, or to live a joious life, may heereby appeare most evidently: For the pleasure of remembring delights past, cannot be very great unto those, who had but a small fruition thereof when they were present; and unto those likewise, who find it expedient for them, to have the same presented in a measure, & some to retire & withdraw themselves from them, it cannot be profitable to think therupon long after, coffidering that even with those persons who of all other be most sensual & given to fleshly pleafures, the joy & contentment abideth not at al after they have once performed the action; only there remained with them a certeine shadow, and the illusion (as it were in a dreame) of the pleafure that is flowen away, continueth a while in their minde, for to mainteine and kindle still 30 the fire of their concupifcence: much like unto those who in their sleepe dreame that they are drinking, or enjoying their loves; and verily fuch imperfect pleafures and imaginarie joies doe nothing els but more egerly whet and provoke lascivious life: neither (I assure you) is theremembrance of those pleasures which these men have enjoied in times past, delectable; but only out of the small reliques remaining of their pleasure, which are but weake, slender and seeble, the fame remembrance doth renew and stirre up againe a furious appetite, which prickethand provoketh them evidently, and giveth them no rest. Againe, no likelihood there is, that even those who otherwise be sober, honest, and continently given, doe amuse themselves and busie their heads in calling to minde fuch matters, and to reade and count them out of a journall regitter or day-booke and Kalender, according as the ridiculous jeaft goes of one Carneades who 40 was wont to do fo, namely: How often have I lien with Hedia or with Leonium? In what and how many places have I drunke Thafian wine ? At how many fet feafts at three weeks or twentie daies end, have I bene merie and made great and fumptuous cheere? For this paffionate affection of the minde, and difordinate forwardnesse, thus to call to remembrance and represent delights past, doth argue and bewray most evidently an outragious appetite and beastly surious heat after pleasures either present, or expected and looked for: and therefore my concer is this: That even these men themselves perceiving what abfurdities doe follow hereupon, have had recourse to indolencie and the good state and disposition of the body; as if to live in joy and happinesse, were to thinke and imagine upon such a complexion, that either shall be or hath beene in some persons. For this firme habit and compact constitution of the flesh (say they) and the 50 affured hope that it will continue, bringeth an exceeding contentment, and a most found permanent joy unto as many as can discourse and thinke thereupon in their minds : For the better proofe hereof, confider first and formost their behaviour, and what they do, namely, how they remove, toffe and transport up and downe this pleasure, indolency, or firme disposition of the fleth, (call it what you will) transferring it out of the bodie into the foule, and againe from the foule to the bodie, for that they cannot holde and flay it, being apt to flide and run from them; whereupon they are forced to tie and fasten it to some chiefe head and principle; and thus they do ftay and fusteine the pleasure of the bodie with the joy of the minde, and reciprocally determine and accomplish the joy of the minde in the hope and expectation of bodily pleasure. But how is it possible, that the foundation being thus moveable and inconstant, the rest of the building upon it, should not likewise be unstedfast? or how can the hope be fast, and the joy affured, being founded upon a ground-worke exposed fo much unto wavering and to so many mutations as these be, which compasse and environ ordinarily the bodie, subject to a number of necesfaricinjuries, hurts and wounds from without, and having within the very bowels thereof, the fources and fprings of many evils and maladies, which the discourse of reason is not able to avertand turne away? For otherwise it could not be, that these men (prudent and wise as they to are) should have bene afflicted and tormented with the diseases of painfull strangurie or pissing drop-meale, the suppression and difficultie of urine, bloudy-flixes, dysenteries and dolourous wrings in the guts, phthificks, and confumptions of the lungs or dropfies; of which maladies Epicurus himselfe was plagued with some, Polyenus with others, Nicocles also and Azathobulus had their part and were much troubled therewith, which I speake not by way of reproch unto them; for I know very well, that Pherecides and Heraclitus, two fingular personages, were likewise incumbred with grievous maladies: but wee would gladly require and request of them (if they will acknowledge their owne passions and accidents which they endure, and not, upon a vaine bravery of words, to win a popular favour and applause of the people, incurre the crime of insolent arrogance, and be convict of leafing) either not to admit the firme and ftrong conflituti-20 on of the flesh, for the element and principle of all joy; or els not to be are us in hand and affirm, that those who be fallen into painfull anguish and dolourous disease, doe laugh, disport, and be wantonly merie: for well it may be, that the body and flesh may be many times in good plight and in a firme disposition; but that the hope should be assured and certeine that the same will so continue, never yet could enter into a man of stated minde and found judgement. But like as in thesea, according to the Poet Aeschylus,

For why? who knowes what will ensue? and future time is ever uncertaine. Impossible it is there30 fore, that a soule which placeth and reposeth her sovereigne good in the sound disposition of the bodie, and in the hope of continuance therein, should hold long without seare and trouble; for that the bodie is not onely subject to stormes and tempests without, as the sea is; but the greatest part of troublesome passions, and those which are most violent, sho breedeth in herselfs; and more reason there is for a man to hope for faire weather in Winter, than to promise him selfe a constitution of bodie exempt from paine and harme, to persever and remaine so, long:
for whatels hath given Poets occasion and induced them to call the life of man a day-flower, unstable, unconstant and uncerteine; or to compare it unto the leaves of trees, which put out in the Spring season, sade and fall againe in Autumne; but the imbecillitie and seeblenesse of the flesh, subject to infinit infirmities, casualties, hurts and dangers? The best plight whereof, and 40 highest point of persection, physicians themselves are wont to admonish us for to suspect, seare, diminish, and take downe. For according to the Aphorisme of Hippoerates: The good constitution of a body when it is at the height, is dangerous and slipperie: and as Euripides the poet faid verie well:

Whole body strong, whole fast and brawny slesh, Did shew erewhile acolour gate and fresh, Soone gone he was, and extinct sodainly, As starre that seemes to shoot and fall from sky.

Nay, that which more is; a common received opinion it is, that those persons who are most faire and in the flowre of their beautie, if they be eie-bitten, or looked willy upon by a witch50 ing or envious eie, sustaine much hurt and damage thereby; because the perfection and highest degree of vigour in the bodie, is most subject to a sudden alteration, by reason of very weakenesse and that there is small or no affurance at all that a man should leade his limited without paine and forrow, may evidently appeare by that which they themselves doe faie unto others; for they affirme: That whosoever commit wickednesse and transgresse the lawes, live all their daies in miserie and seare; for howsoever they may perhaps live undetected, yet impossible it is that they should promise themselves assured securitie, never to be discovered; insomuch as the doubt and seare of stuture punishment, will not give them leave to take joy, or assured by to use the benefit of present impunitie; in delivering these speeches to other, they perceivenor how they speake against themselves: For semblably well it may be, that oftentimes they may have their health, and carrie able bodies about them; but to be affored that they shall continue fo alwaies, or a long time, is a thing that cannot be performed; for needs they must evermore fland in doubt and diffrust of their bodie for the time to come; like as women great with child. are ever gruntling and groning against the time of their travell: otherwise, let them say, why they attend still a fure and confident hope of that which hetherto they never could attain unto. Moreover, it is not fufficient to worke affured confidence, for a man to forbeare finne and wrong-doing, or not at all to offend the lawes, confidering that to be afflicted juftly, and for defert, is not the thing to be feared, but fimply to endure paine, is fearefull and terrible. For if it to be a griefe and trouble to be touched and vexed with a mans owne finnes and trespasses; he cannot chuse but be molested and disquieted also with the enormities and transgressions of others: And verily if the outragious violence and crueltie of Lachares was not more offensive and troublefome to the Athenians; and likewife the tyrannie of Dionysius to the Syracusanes; yet I am fure at least wife it was full as much as to their owne selves; for whiles they vexed them, tormented they were and molested themselves, and they looked to suffer punishment one time or other for their wrongs and outrages, for that they offered the same before unto their citizens and subjects who fell into their hands. What should a man alledge to this purpose, the furious rage of the multitude, the horrible and bloudie crueltie of theeves and rovers, the mischievous pranks of proud and prefumptuous inheritors, plague and pestilence by contagion and comp. 20 tion of the aire, as also the fell outrage of the angry sea, in a ghust whereof Epicurus himselfe writeth, he had like to have beene swallowed up as he failed to the citie Lampsacus? It may suffice to relate in this place the nature onely of our body and fraile flesh, which hath within it selfe the matter of all maladies, cutting (as we fay merrily in the common proverb) out of the verie ox, leather thongs; that is to fay, taking paines and torments from it felfe, thereby to make life full of anguith, fearefull, and dangerous, as well to good persons as to bad; in case they have learned to rejoice, and to found the confidence and furety of their joy upon nothing elfebut the flesh and the hope thereof, according as Epicurus himselfe hath left written, as in many other of his books, fo in those especially which hecentituled, Of the fovereigne end of all good rhings. We may therefore directly conclude, that these mendoe hold for the foundation of a joy full & pleasant life, not a principle that is not onely unsteadie, tottering, and not to be trusted to upon, but also base, vile, and every way contemptible; if so be that to avoid evils, be their onely joy and the foveraigne felicitie that they feeke for; and in case they say: That they respect and regard naught elfe; and in one word: That nature herfelfe knoweth not where elfe to lodge and bestow the faid happinesse, but onely there, from whence is chased and driven away, that which might annoy and offend her; and thus hath Metrodorus written in his treatife against fophisters: fo that according to their doctrine, we are to make this definition of fovereigne good, even the avoidance of evill; for how can one lodge any joy, or place the faid good, but onely there, from whence paine and evil hath beene diflodged & remooved: To the fame effect writeth Epicurus alfosto wit: That the nature of a good thing is ingendred and arifeth from the eschuing & 40 shunning of cvill; as also that it proceedeth from the remembrance, cogitation, and joy which one conceiveth, in that fuch a thing happed unto him. For furely it is an ineftimable and incomparable pleafure (by his faying) to wit, the knowledge alone that one hath escaped some notable hurt or great danger: And this (quoth he) is certainly the nature and effence of the foveraigne good, if thou wilt directly apply thy selfe thereto, as it is meet, and then anon rest and flay therein, without wandering to and fro, heere and there, prating and babling I wot not what concerning the definition of the faid fovereigne good. O the great felicitie and goodly pleafure which there men enjoy, rejoicing as they doe in this, that they endure none evill, feeleno paine, nor fuffer forow! Have they not (thinke you) great cause to glorifie, & to say as they doe, calling themselves immortal, and gods fellowes? Have they not reason for these their grandeurs, and 50 exceeding fublimites of their bleffings, to cry out with open mouth, & as if they were possessed with the frantike furie of Bacchus priests, to breake foorth into lowd exclamation for joy, that furpassing all other men in wisedome and quicknesse of wit, they onely have found out the sovereigne, celestiall, and divine good, and that which hath no mixture at all of evill? So that now their beatitude and felicitie is nothing inferior to that of fwine and sheepe, in that they repose true happinesse in the good and sufficient estate of the slesh principally, and of the soule likewife in regard of the fleth; of hogges I fay and sheepe; for to speake of other beasts which are of a more civill, gentle, and gallant nature; the height and perfection of their good, thandeth not upon the avoiding of evil, confidering that when they are full, and have thored their crawes, fome fall to finging and crowing, others to fwimming; fome give themselves to flie, others to counterfeit all kinds of notes and founds, disporting for joy of heart and the pleasure that they take; they ale to plaie together, they make pastime, they hoppe, leape, skippe, and dannee one with another, the wing thereby, that after they have escaped some evill, nature inciteth and stirreth them to feeke forward, and looke after that which is good, or rather indeed that they reject and caft from them, all that which is dolorous and contrary to their nature, as if it flood in their way, and hindred them in the purfute of that which is better, more proper & natural unto them: To forthat which is necessarie is not straight waies simplie good; but surely the thing that in truth is desirable and woorthie to be chosen above the reth, is situate farther, and reacheth beyond the avoidance of evill; I meane that which is indeed pleasant, and familiar to nature, as Plato said; who forbad expresly to call or once to esteeme the deliverance of paine and forrow, either pleafure or joy, but to take them as it were for the rude Sciographic or first draught of a painter, or a mixture of that which is proper and strange, familiar and unnaturall, like as of blacke and white. But some there be, who mounting from the bottom to the mids, for want of knowledge, what is the lowest and the middest, take the middle for the top and the highest pitch, as Epicurus & Metrodorus have done, who defined the effential nature and substance of the soveraigne good, tobe the deliverance and riddance from evill, contenting themselves with the joy of flaves and 20 captives, who are enlarged and delivered out of prison, or eased of their irons, who take it to be a great pleafured one unto them in case they be gently washed, bathed, and annointed after their whipping-cheere, and when their flesh hath beene torne with scourges; meane-while they have no tafte at all or knowledge of pure, true, and liberal joyes indeed, fuch as be fincere, cleane and not blemished with any fearres or cicatrices, for those they never saw, nor came where they grew; for fay that the fourfe, feable, and mangineffe of the flesh, fay that the bleereducifie or gummy watering of theumatike cies, be troublefome infirmities, and fuch as nature cannot away withall, it followeth not heereupon that the fcraping and fcratching of the skinne, or the rubbing and clenfing of the cies should bee such woonderfull matters, as to bee counted felicities: neither if we admit, that the superstitious seare of the gods, and the grievous 30 anguith and trouble arifing from that which is reported of the divels in hell be evill; we are not to inferre by and by that to be exempt and delivered there fro, is happinesse, felicitie, and that which is to be fo greatly withed and defired : certes, the affigne a very straight roome and narrowplace for their joy, wherein to turne, to walke, too rome and tumble at case, so farre foorthonely, as not to be terrified or difinated with the apprehension of the paines and torments described in hell, the onely thing that they desire. Lo, how their opinion which so farre passeth the common fort of people, setteth downe for the finall end of their singular wisedome, athing, which it feemeth the very brute beafts hate even of the felves: for as touching that firme constitution and indolence of the body, it makes no matter, whether of it selfe or by nature, it be void of paine and ficknesse; no more in the tranquillitie and repose of the soule, skilleth it 40 much, whether by the owne industrie or benefit of nature, it be delivered from feare and terror: and yet verily a man may well fay, and with great reason, that the disposition is more firme and ftrong, which naturally admitteth nothing to trouble and tormeneit; than that which with judgement and by the light and guidance of learning doth avoid it: But fet the case, that the one were as effectuall and powerfull as the other; then verily it will appeare at least wife, that in this behalfe, they have no advantage and preeminence above brute beafts; to wit, in that they feele no anguish nor trouble of spirit, for those things which are reported either of the divels in hel, or the gods in heaven; nor feare at all paines and torments, expecting when they shall have an end. That this is true, Epicurus verily himselfe hath put downe in writing: If (quoth he) the fuspicions and imaginations of the meteores and impressions which both are and doe appeare 50 in the aire and skie above, did not trouble us; nor yet those of death and the pangs thereof; we should have no need at all to have recourse unto the natural causes of all those things, no more than those dumbe beasts who enterteine no evill suspicions or surmises of the gods, nor any opinions to torment them, as touching that which shall befall unto them after death: for they neither believe and know, nor fo much as once think of any harme at all in fuch things. Furthermore, if in the opinion that they holde of the gods, they had referved and left a place for divine providence, believing that thereby the world was governed, they might have beene thought wife men as they are, to have gone beyond brute beafts for the atteinting of a pleafant and joifull life, in regard of their good hopes; but feeing all their doctrine as touching the gods tendeth to this end, namely, to feare no god, and otherwise to be fearelesse and carelesse altogether, I am perswaded verily, that this is more firmely settled in those, having no sense and know, ledge at all of God, than in these who say they know God, but have not learned to acknowledge him for a punithing God, and one that can punish and doe harme: for those are not delivered from superstation; and why? they never fell into it, neither have they laied away that featefull conceit and opinion of the gods; and no marvell, for they never had any fuch: the same may be faid as touching hell and the infernall spirits; for neither the one nor the other have any hope to receive good from thence; marie, suspect, seare and doubt what shall betide them after death those must needs, lesse, who have no fore-conceit at all of death, than they in whom this persua. fion is imprinted beforehand, that death concerneth us not : and yet thus farre forth it toucheth them, in that they diffeourle, difforte, and confider thereupon; whereas brute beafts are altogether freed from the thought and care of fuch things as doe nothing perteine unto them: true it is, that they thunne ftroaks, wounds and flaughter; and thus much (I fay) of death they feare, which also even to these men is dreadfull and terrible. Thus you see what good things wildome (by their owne faying) hath furnished them withall : but let us now take a fight and survey of those which they exclude themselves fro and are deprived of. As touching those diffusions of the foule, when it dilateth and spreadeth it selfe over the slesh, and for the pleasure that the slesh feeleth, if the fame be finall or meane, there is no great matter therein, nor that which is of any 20 confequence to speake of; but if they passe mediocritic, then (besides that they be vame, deceitfull and uncerteine) they are found to be comberfome and odious, fuch as a man ought rather to tearme, not spiritual joies and delights of the soule, but rather sensual and groffe pleasures of the bodie, fawning, flattering and finding upon the foule, to draw and entice her to the participation of fuch vanities: as for fuch contentments of the minde which deferve indeed and are woorthy to be called joies and delights, they be purified cleane from the contrarie, they haveno mixture at all of troublefome motions, no fting that pricketh them, nor repentance that followeth them, but their pleafure is spirituall, proper and naturall to the soule; neither is the good therein borowed abroad, and brought in from without, nor abfurd and void of reason, but most agreeable and forting thereto, proceeding from that part of the mind which is given unto con-30 templation of the trueth, and defirous of knowledge, or at leaftwife from that, which applieth it felfe to doe and execute great and honourable things: now the delights and joies as well of the one as the other, hee that went about to number, and would straine and force himselfe to difcourfe how great and excellent they be, he were never able to make an end: but in briefe and fewwords, to helpe our memorie a little as touching this point: Histories minister an infinit number of goodly and notable examples, which yeeld unto us a fingular delight and recreation to passe the time away, never breeding in us a tedious satietie, but leaving alwaies the appetite that our foule hath to the trueth, infatiable and defirous still of more pleasure and contentment; in regard whereof, untrueths and very lies therein delivered, are not without their grace; for even in fables and thetions poeticall, although we give no credit unto them, there is some effe-40 ctuall force to delight and perswade: for thinke (I pray you) with your selfe, with what heat of delight and affection we reade the booke of Plato entituled Atlanticus, or the last books of Homers that? confideralfo with what griefe of heart wee miffe and want the refidue of the talebehinde, as if we were kept out of some beautifull temples, or faire theaters, shut fast against us? for furely the knowledge of tructh in all things, is followely and amiable, that it feemeth, our life and very being, dependeth most upon knowledge and learning; whereas the most unpleasant, odious and horrible things in death, be oblivion, ignorance and darkneffe; which is the reason (I affure you) that all men in a maner fight and watre against those who would be eave the dead of all fenfe, giving us thereby to understand, that they do measure the whole life, the being allo, and joy of man, by the fenfe onely and knowledge of his minde; in fuch fort, that even those ve- 50 ry things that are odious and offenfive otherwife, we heare otherwhiles with pleasure; and often times it falleth out, that though men be troubled with the thing they heare, fo as the water standeth in their cies, and they be readie to weepe and crie out for griefe, yet they defire those that relate the fame to fay on and speake all : as for example, Oedipus in Sophocles.

Relate the thing which is the worst of all.

OEDIPUS.

Woe is me likewise: to heare st I amprest, There is no helpe 3 say on, and tell the rest.

But peradventure this may be a current and streame of intemperat pleasure and delight, proceeding from a curiofitie of the minde and will, too forward to heare and know all things, yea, and to offer violence unto the judgement and discourse of reason: howbeit, when as a narration or historie conteining in it no hurtfull and offensive matter, besides the subject argument, which confifteth of brave adventures and worthy exploits, is penned and couched in a fweet fule, with to agrace and powerfull force of eloquence; fuch as is the historie of Herodotus as touching the Greeke affaires, or of Xenophon concerning the Perfian acts, as also that which Homer with an heavenly spirit hath endited and delivered in his verses, or Endoxus in his peregrinations and defeription of the world, or Aristotle in his treatise of the founding of cities and governments of State, or Arifloxense who hath left in writing, the lives of famous and renowmed persons; in fuch (I fay) there is not onely much delight and contentment, but also there ensueth thereupon no displeasure nor repentance. And what man ishe, who being hungry, would more willingly eat the good and delicate meats? or athirst, defire and chuse to drinke the daintie and pleasant wines of the Phocacians, rather than reade that fiction and discourse of the voiage and pilgrimage of tilyffes? and who would take more pleafure to lie with a most faire and beautifull woman, than to fit up all night, reading either that which Xenophon hath written of ladie Panthea, or Arifobulus of dame Timoclea, or Theopompus of faire Thisbe? These be the pleasures and joies indeed of the minde: but our Epicureans reject likewife, all those delights which proceed from the fine inventions of the Mathematicall sciences: and to say a trueth, a historic runneth plaine, even, fimple and uniforme; whereas the delectation that we have in Geometric, Aftronomie and Musicke, have besides (I wot not what) forcible bait of varietie so attractive, that it feemeth men are charmed and enchanted by them; fo forcibly they allure, and fo mightily they holde men with their delineations and descriptions, as if they were to many forceries, spels and incantations: fo that who foever hath once talted thereof, so he be practifed and exercised therein, he may go all about well enough, chanting these verses of Sophocles:

The furious love of Muses nine Hath heart and minde possessed in the Thus ravished, fast time hie To creef and cape of mountaine hie: Melodious songs, and sound with all

Of pleasant harpe, me forth doth call. Certes, Thampras exercised his poeticall head about nothing els; no more verily did Eudoxus, Aristarchus and Archimides. For seeing that studious and industrious painters tooke so great pleafure in the excellency of their works, that Nicias when he was painting Homer's Necyta (that is to fay, the calling foorth and raising the ghosts of folke departed) being so affectionate to it, 40 forgathimfelfe and asked his fervitours eftfoones about him, whether he had dined or no: and when Ptolomeus king of Aegypt fent unto him threefcore talents for the faid picture after it was finished, he refused the same, and would never fell, or part with his handy-worke. What pleafure reaped (thinke you) and how great delight tooke Enclides in Geometrie and Aftrologie, when he wrote the propositions of Perspective; and Philip when he composed the demonstrations of the divers formes and shapes appearing in the Moone? Archimedes also, when by the angle called Gonia, he found out, that the Diameter of the Sun is just so bigge a part of the greatest circle, as the angle is of four eright lines; Apollonius likewife and Aristarchus, who were the inventours of the like propositions; the contemplation and knowledge whereof, even at this day, bringeth exceeding pleasure and woonderfull generositie & magnanimity unto those who 50 can intend to study upon them. And verily those base and abject pleasures of the kitchin and brothell-house, we ought not so much as to compare with these, and thereby to contaminate and difgrace the facred Muses and their mountaine Helicon,

Where shepheard none durst tend his stocke, On hill above or vale below: Nor edged toole was knowen to shocke Or cut one tree that there did grow.

But these pleasures are indeed the intemperate & undefiled pastures of the gentle bees; whereas those other resemble properly, the itching lusts of swine and goats, which over and besides the bodie, fill with their filthie ordure the sensual part of the soule, subject to all passions and perturbations. True it is, that lust and desire to enjoy pleasures, is a passion adventurous and hardie enough to enterprise many and fundrie matters; yet was there never any man found so annorous, who for joy that he had embraced his paramour, facrificed a beete; nor ever was there knowen so notorious a glutton, who wished in his heart and desired, so he might first fill his belie with delicate viands and princely banketting dishes, to die presently: and yet Endonus made this praier, that he might stand nere unto the lunne, for to learne the forme, the magnitude and the beauty of that planet, upon condition to be burnt presently, as Phieron was, with the beames thereof. Pythagorus for the proofe of one proposition or figure which he had invented, sacrifi-10 ced an ox, as Apollodorus hath recorded in this Dysticon:

No fooner had Pythagoras this noble figure found, But folemaly he facrifie d an ox, evenin that flound.

Whether it were that flope line in Geometrie, called Hypotimufa, which answering directly to the right angle of a triangle, is as much in effect as the other two that comprehend and make the faid angle; or rather that linearie demonstration or proposition, whereby he measured the plotin a parabolicke fection of a Cone or round pyramidall figure. As for Archimedes, he was fo intentive and buffe in drawing his Geometricall figures, that his fervants were faine by force to pull him away to be washed and anointed; and even then he would with the strigill or bath. combe (which ferved to currie and rub his skin) draw figures even upon his very bellie: and one 20 day above the reft, having found out whiles he was a bathing, the way to know, how much golde the gold-fmith had robbed in the fashion of that crowne which king Hiero had put forth to ma. king, he ran foorth fuddenly out of the baine, as if he had beene frantike, or infpired with fome fanaticall spirit, crying out; Heureca, Heureca, that is to say, I have found it, I have found it, iterating the fame many times all the way as he went. But we never heard of any glutton fo given to gourmandife & belly cheere, who went up and downe crying Bebroca, that is to fay, I have eaten, I have caten; nor of a wanton & amorous person, who having enjoied his love, would set up this note, Ephilesa, that is to say, I have kist, I have kist. Notwithstanding there have beene & areat this day, a thousand millions, even an infinit number of lascivious & loose persons: But contrariwife, we detelt and abhorre those, who upon an affection, braverie and pride, make rehearfull to what feafts they have beene at, as persons who highly account of so base and unwoorthy pleafures, which men ought indeed to have in contempt. Whereas in reading the works of Eudoxus, Archimides, and Hipparchus, we are ravished and transported as it were with some heavenly and divine delight; belowing that faying of Plato to be true, who writeth: That the Mathematicall arts, howfoever they be contemned, by those that be ignorant, and for default of knowledge and understanding neglected; yet for the grace and delight that they yeeld be more and more in request, even in despight of those blind and blockish persons: All which pleasures so great and fo many in number, running alwaies as a river; thefe men heere doe turne and derive another way, for to empeach and hinder those who approch unto them, and give eare unto their doctrine, that they should not once taste thereof, but command them to set up and spred 40 all their maine failes, and flie away as fast as they can. Yea, and that which more is, all those of this feet, both men and women, pray and request Pythocles (for Epicurus sake) not to make any account of those arts which we name liberall: And in praising our Apelles, among other lingular qualities, that they attribute unto him, they fet downe this for one: That from his first beginning he had forborne the studie of the Mathematicks, and by that meanes kept himselfe unspotted and undefiled: As for hiltories (to fay nothing, how of all other sciences they have neither heard nor feene any) I will cite onely the words of Metradorm writing of Poets: Tulh(quoth he) be not abashed nor thinke it a shame to confesse that thou knowest not, of whether side Hector was, of the Greeks part or of the Trojans neither thinke it a great matter if thoube ignorant what were the first verses of Homers Poeme, and regard thou as little those in the mids.

Now for a finite his vertex will well inough, that the pleafures of the body (like unto the aniverfaire Etefian minds) doe blow over and paffe away, yea and after the flower of mans age is once gone, decay fenfibly, and cease altogether; therefore he moovet ha question: Whether a wise man, being now farre stept in yeeres, and not able any more to keepe company with a woman, taketh pleasure still in wanton touching, seeling or handling of faire and beautiful perfons: Whether verify he is farre from the minde and opinion of sophocles; who rejoiced and thanked God, thathee had escaped from this voluptuous and steffly love, as from the yoke, chaine, or clogge of fome violent and furious mafter. Yet rather ought these sensual and voluptuous persons, seeing that manie delights and pleasures corporall, doe sade and decaie in old age,

And that with aged folk in this, Dame Venus much offended is.

(as faith Euripides) to make provision then most all, of other spiritual pleasures, and to be stored before hand, as it were against some long siege, with such drie victuals as are not subject to purrefaction and corruption: Then I fay should they hold their solomne feasts of Venus, & goodly morrow-minds, to passe the time away by reading some pleasant histories, delectable poemes, or pretie speculations of mustick or geometric: And verily they would not so much as thinke any more of those blind feelings and bootlesse handlings (as I may tearme them) which indeed are no more but the pricks and provocations of dead wantonnesse, if they had learned no more but as Aristotle, Heraclides, and Dicaarchus did, to write of Homer and Euripides: But they being never carefull and provident to purvey fuch victuals, and feeing all the reft of their life otherwise to be unpleasant, and as drie as a kex, (as themselves are woont to say of vertue) yet willing to enjoy still their pleasures continually, but finding their bodies to fay may, and not able to performe the fame to their contentment, they bewray their corruption in committing foule and dishonest acts out of season, enforcing themselves (even by their owne confessions) to awaken, flirre up, and renew the memorie of their former pleafures in times past, and for want 20 offresh and new delights, making a shift to serve their turne with the old & stale, as if they had beenelong kept in falt-pickle, or compatt, untill their goodnesse and life were gone; desirous they are to stirre, kindle, and quicken others that lie extinct in their sless, as it were raked up in dead and cold after long before, cleane against the course of nature; and all for default that they were not provided before of fome fweet thing laid up in their foule, proper unto her, and delightsome according to her worthinesse: As for other spirituall pleasures wee have spoken of them already, as they came into our minde: but as touching musick, which bringing with it so many cotentments, & fo great delights, men yet reject & flie fro, no man I trow would willingly passe it over in filence, considering the absurd and importment speeches that Epicurus giveth out:for in his questions he maintaineth. That a wife man is a great lover of shews & spectacles, 30 delighting above all others to heare and fee the pastimes, sports, & sights, exhibited in theatres during the feaft of Bacches; yet wil not he admit any mufical problemes, any disputation or witty discourses of Criticks in points of humanitie & learning, so much as at the very table, in dinner and supper time; but giveth counsell unto kings and princes that be lovers & favorers of literature, to abide rather the reading & hearing of military narrations & stratagemes at their feasts & banquets, yea, and fcurrill talke of buffons, pleafants, and iefters, than any queftions propounded or discussed, as touching musicke or poetrie: for thus much hath he delivered in his booke entituled: Of Royaltie: as if hee had written the fame to Sardanapalus or Naratus, who was in timespalt a great potentate and lord of Babylon. Certes, neither Hiero nor Attalus, ne yet Archelaus, would ever have bene perswaded to remove and displace from their tables such as Erus-40 pides, Simonides, Melanippides, Crates or Diodorus, forto fet in their roomes Cardax, Ariances and Callias, knowen jesters and notorious ribauds; or some parasitical Thrasonides and Thrasyleons, who could skill of nothing els but how to make folke laugh, in counterfaiting lamentable yellings, groanes, howlings, and all to move applause and clapping of hands. If king Ptolomeus the first of that name, who also first erected a librarie, and founded a colledge of learned men, had light upon these goodly rules and royall precepts of his putting downe, would not he have exclamed and faid unto the Samians:

O Muses faire, bladies deere, What envie, and what spight is heere!

For, befeeming it is not any Athenian thus maliciously to be bent unto the Muses, and be at 50 warre with them: but according to Pindarus;

Whom Jupicer doth not vouch lafe His love and favour for to have. Amaz'd they stand and guake for feare, When they the voice of Muses beare.

What say you, Epicurus? you goe early in the morning by breake of day unto the Theater, to heater musicians playing upon the harpe and lute, or founding snawmes and hautboies: if then it fortune at the table, in time of a banquet, that Theophrass will counsel to Symphonics and Ddd 2.

musicall accords? or Aristoxenes, of changes and alteration of tunes? or Aristophanes of Ho.

mers works, will you stop your eares with both hands because you would not heare, for that you fo abhorre and detest them? Surely, there was more civillity yet and honestie (by report) in that barbarous king of Septhia, Ateas, who when that excellent minstrell Ismenias, being his cap.

great oath, that he tooke more pleasure to heare his horseneigh. Doe not these men (thinke you) confessed and grant (when they be well charged) that they have given dessance to vertue and honestie, proclaming mortall and irreconcilable warre, without all hope of truce, patle, composition and peace? for surely, setting pleasure onely aside, what other thing is there in the world (be it never so pure, holy and venerable) that they embrace and love? Had it not beene nore reason, for the leading of a joystill life, to be offended with sweet persumes, and to reject odoriferous oiles and ointments, as bettles, jeires and vultures doe, than to abhorre, detest and shun the talke and discourses of Humanitians, Criticks, Grammarians and Musicians? sor,

fo greatly delighted Epicurus and Metrodorus, as the discourses, the rules and precepts of quites 20 and carols, the questions and propositions concerning flutes and hautboies, touching proportions, confonances & harmonical accords would affect Aristotle, Theophrastus, Hieronymus and Dicearchus? as for example, what is the reason, that of two pipes or flutes (otherwise even and equall) that which hath the straighter and narrower mouth, yeeldeth the bigger and more base found? also, what might be the cause, that the same pipe when it is lifted and set upward, becommeth loud in all the tones that it maketh; but holde it downward once, it foundeth as low? fo doth one pipe also when it is set close unto another, give a base found; but contrariwise, if it be disjoined and put afunder, it foundeth higher and more shrill. As also, how it comments to passe that if a man fow chaffe or cast dust thicke upon the stage or scaffold in a Theater, the people there affembled be deafe and cannot heare the plaiers or minftrels? Semblably, when king Ale-10 xander the Great was minded to have made in the citie of Pella the forepart of the stage in the Theater, all of braffe; what mooved his workman or Architect not to permit him so to doe, for feare it would drowne and dull the voice of the plaiers? Finally, why among fundry kindsof Musicke, that which is called Chromaticall, delighteth, enlargeth and joieth the heart, whereas the Harmonicall contracteth and draweth it in, making it fad and dumpish? Moreover, the maners and natures of men which Poets represent in their writings, their wittie fictions, the difference and varietie of their stile, the solution of darke doubts and quaint questions, which (besides a delightfome grace and beautifull elegance) carie with them a familiar and perswasive power, whereoutech one may reape profit; infomuch as they are able (as Xenophon faith) to make a man forget even love it felfe, so effectuall is this pleasure and delight. Howbeit, the Epicurcans 40 here have no feeling and experience; nay, which is woorle, they defire to have none, as they fay themselves; but imploying the whole contemplative part of the soule, in thinking upon nothing els but the bodie, and plucking it downward together with sensual and carnall lusts, as fishers nets with little rols and plummets of lead, they differ nothing at all from horsekeepers or shepherds and other herdmen, who lay before their beasts, hay, straw, or some kinde of grasle and herbs, as the proper fodder & forage for the cattell which they have in charge: for do they not even so intend to feed the soule fat (as men franke up swine) with bodily pleasures; in that they would have her to be glad for the hope shee hath that the body shall shortly enjoy some pleasure, or els in the remembrance of those which it hath enjoied in times past? as for any proper delight or particular pleasure of her owne, they suffer her to receive none from herselfe, nor 50 fo much as to feeke thereafter.

And verily, can there be any thing more abfurd & befide all apparance and shew of reason, than (whereas there be two parts whereof man is compounded, to wit, soule and body, of which the soule is more woorth, and placed in the higher degree) to say and affirme, that there is in the bodie some good thing, proper, peculiar, familiar, and naturall unto it, and none in the soule; but that she fits still tending the bodie, and looking onely to it? that she smileth upon the passions and affections thereof, joying and taking contentment with it onely; having of here felfe originally no motion, no election, no choife, no defire nor pleasure at all ? Now furely they should either by putting off their maske and discovering themselves, have gone roundly to worke, making man flesh, and nothing else but flesh; as some there be who flatly denie, that there is any spirituall substance in him; or else leaving in us two different natures, they ought to have let either of them alone by it felfe, with their feverall good and evill; that I fav which is familiar or contrarie unto it: like as among the five fenfes, everie one is destined & appropriat to one object fensible, although all of them by accrtaine woonderfull sympathy be affected one to the other. Now the proper fenfative organ or instrument of the foule is, the understanding; and to fay that the fame hath no peculiar subject to worke upon, no proper spectacle to no behold, no familiar motion, no naturall and inbred passion or affection, in the fruition whereof it should take pleasure and delight, is the greatest absurdation of all others : And verily this is the faying of these men; unlesse haply some there be, who ere they be aware, charge upon them fome flanderous and false imputations. Heereat began I to speake and say unto him: Not so fir, if we may be judges; but I pray you let be, all action of inquirie, and proceed hardly to finish and make an end of your difcourfe. And why (quoth he) should not Aristodemus succeed after me, if you haply refuse flatly, or be loth to speake? You say true indeed, (quoth Aristodemus) but that shall not be untill you be wearie of speech, as this man is; and for the present, since you are yet fresh and in heart, I befeech you my good friend, spare not your selfe, but use your facultie, left you be thought for very floth and idleneffe to draw back and goe out of the lifts, 20 Certes (quoth Theon then) it is but a finall matter, and the fame very easie which is behind; for there remaineth no more but to sheward recount how many joics and pleasures there be in active life, and that part of the foule which is given to action? First and formost, even they themselves in some place graunt and confesse; that it is a greater pleasure to doe good, and to benefit others, than to receive a benefit from another; as for good turnes, a man I confesse may doe them in bare words and fayings; but furely the most and greatest are performed by acts and deeds, and thus much doth the verie word of benefit or weldoing import; and even they themselves testifie no lesse: For but a while since, wee heard this man report, what words and speeches Epicurus delivered; what letters he wrot and sent unto his friends, in extolling, praifing, and magnifying Metrodorus; how bravely and valiantly he went downe from the citie of Athens to the port Pyreaum, for to aid and fuccour Mythris the Syrian, albeit Metrodorus 30 did no fervice at all in that fally: What manner of pleasures then, and how great ought wee to effective those which Plate enjoied, when Dien a scholar of his & one of his bringing up, rose up to put downe the tyrant Diony sur, & to deliver the state of Sicily from servitude? what contentment might Aristotle find, when he caused the citie of his nativitie which was ruinate and rafed to the ground to be reedified, and his countrimen & fellow-citizens to be called home who were banished? what delights and joies were those of Theophrastus and Phidias, who deposed and overthrew those tyrants who usurped the lordly dominion of their countrey? and for private perfons in particular, how many they relieved, not in fending unto them a strike or a bushell of come and meale, as Epicurus fent unto fome; but in working and effecting, that those who were 40 exiled out of their native countrey, driven from their owne houses, and turned out of all their goods, might returne home againe and reenter upon all; that fuch as had beene prifoners and lien in irons, might be delivered and fet at large; as many also as were put from their wives and children, might recover and enjoy them againe: What need I make rehearfall unto you, who know all this well enough? But furely the impudence and abfurditie of this man, I cannot (though I would) passe over with silence, who debasing and casting under soorthe acts of Themistocles and Militades as he did, wrot of himselfe to certaine of his friends in this fort: Right nobly, valiantly, and magnificently, have you shewed your endevour and care of us, in provision of corne to furnish us withall; and againe you have declared by notorious fignes, which mount up into heaven, the fingular love and good will which you beare unto me. And if a man ob-30 serve the manner of this stile and writing, he shall find, that if he take out of the misteries of this great philosopher, that which concerneth a little corne, all the words besides are so curiously couched and penned, as if the epiftle had beene written purpofedly as a thankefgiving for the fafety of all Greece, or at leastwife, for delivering, setting free, and preserving the whole citie and people of Athens.

What should I bussemy head to shew unto you, that for the delights of the bodie, nature had need to be at great cost and expences; neither doth the chiefe pleasure which they seeke after, consist in course bisket-bread; in pease pottage; or lentile broth; but the appetites of these voluptuous persons, call for exquisit and daintie viands, for sweete and delicate wines, such as those be of Thasos, for sweet odours, pleasant persumes, and precious oinrments, for curious junkets and banketting diffies, for tarts, cake-bread, marchpanes, and other pastrie works, well wrought, beaten and tempered with the sweet liquor gathered by the yellow winged Bee: over and besides all this, their mind stands also to faire and beautiful yoone damosels, they must have some pretie Leontium, some fine Boichon, some sweet Hedid, or daintie A icedion, whom they keepe and nourish of purpose within their gardens of pleasure. to be ready at hand. As for the delights and joics of the mind, there is no man but will confelle and fay: That founded they ought to be upon the greatnesse of some noble actions, and the beautie of worthy and memorable works, if we would have them to be not vaine, base and chil. 10 dish; but contrariwise, reputed grave, generous, magnificent and manlike; whereas to vaunt and glory of being let loofe to a diffolute course of life and the fruition of pleasures and delights. after the maner of failers and mariners when they celebrate the feaft of Venus; to boast also and please himselse in this: That being desperally sicke of that kinde of dropsie which the Physici. ans call Afeites, he forbare not to feast his friends still, and keepe good companie, neither spated to adde and gather more moisture and waterish humours still unto his dropsic: and remembring the last words that his brother Neocles spake upon his death-bed, melted and consumed with a speciall joy and pleasure of his owne, tempered with teares; there is no man (I trow) of found judgement and in his right wits, who would tearme these souths follies, either sound joies or perfect delights; but furely, if there be any Sardonian laughter (as they call it) belonging also 20 to the foule, it is feated (in my conceit) even in fuch joics and mirths mingled with teares as these, which do violence unto nature: but if any man shall say, that these be solaces, let him compare them with others, and see how farre these excell and go beyond them which are expressed by these verses:

By lage advice I have effected this. That Spartacs martiall fame eclipsed is. This man, o friend and stranger both, was while he lived heere, The great and glorious starre of Rome, his native citie decre. Likewise:

I wot not what I (bould you call, An heavenly God and man mortall.

And when I fet before mine cies the noble and worthy acts of Thrashulus and Pelopidas; orbehold the victories either of Ariflides in that journey of Platea, or of Militades at the battell of Marathon, I am even ravished and transported besides my selfe, and forced to say with Herodotus, and deliver this sentence: That in this active life, there is more sweetnesse and delectation, than glorie and honour : and that this is fo, Epaminondas will beare me witnesse, who (by report) gave out this speech, that the greatest contentment which ever he had during his life, was this: That 40 his father and mother were both alive to fee that noble Trophee of his, for the victorie that he wan at Leuctres, being generall of the Thebans against the Lacedæmonians. Compare we now with this mother of Epaninondas, Epicurus his mother, who tooke fo great joy to fee her sonne keeping close in a daintie garden and orchard of pleasure, where he and his familiar friend Polyenus gat children in common, upon a trull and courtifan of Cyzicum: for, that both mother and fister of Metrodorus were exceeding glad of his marriage, may appeare by his letters missive written unto his brother, which are extant in his books; and yet they goe up and downe everie where crying with open mouth: That they have lived in joy, doing nought els but extolland magnific their delicate life, faring much like unto flaves when they folenmize the feast of Saturne, supping and making good cheere together, or celebrate the Bacchanales, running about 50 the fields; so as a man may hardly abide to heare the utas and yelling noise they make, when upon the infolent joy of their hearts, they breake out into many fooleries, and utter they care not unto whom, as vaine and fond speeches, in this maner:

Why fat' A thou fill, thou wretched lout, Come let us drinke and quaffe about : The meats upon the boord set are, Be meric man, and make no spare :

No sooner are these words let flie, But all at once they hour and crie; The pots then walke, one filles out wine, Another brings a garland fine Of flowers full fresh, bis head to crowne, And decks the cup, whiles wine goes downe: And then the minstrell, Phoebus knight, With faire greene branch of Laurell dight, Sets out his rude and rust tethrote, And sings a filthie tunelesse note: With that one thrusts the pipe him fro, And founds his wench and bedfello.

Do not (thinke you) the letters of Metrodorus resemble these vanities, which he wrote unto his brother in these tearmes? There is no need at all, Timocrates, neither ought a man to expose 32 himselfe into danger for the safetic of Greece, or to straine and busic his head to winne a coronet ,, among them, in testimonic of his wisedome; but he isto eat, and drinke wine merily, so as the ,, bodiemay enjoy all pleasure, and susteine no harme. And againe in another place of the same ,, letters he hath these words : Oh how joifull was I, and glad at heart ! ôh what contentment of ,, fpirit found I, when I had learned once of Epicurus, to make much of my bellie, and to gratifie it ,, 20 as I ought! For to fay atrueth to you, ô Timocrates, that art a Naturalist: The sovereigne good 3,

Infumme, these men doe limit, set out and circumscribe the greatnesse of humane pleasure within the compasse of the bellie, as it were within center and circumference; but furely imposfible it is, that they should ever have their part of any great, roial and magnificall joy, such as indeed causeth magnanimitie and hautinesse of courage, bringeth glorious honour abroad, or tranquillitie of spirit at home, who have made choise of a close and private life within doores, never shewing themselves in the world, nor medling with the publicke affaires of common weale; a life (I say) sequestred from all offices of humanitie, farre removed from any instinct of honour, or defire to gratific others, thereby to deferve thanks, or winne favour : for the foule (I 30 may tell you) is no base and small thing, it is not vile and illiberall, extending her desires onely to that which is good to bee eaten, as doe these poulps or pourcuttle fifnes which stretch their cleies as farre as to their meat and no farther; for fuch appetites as these, are most quickly cutoff with fatietie, and filled in a moment; but when the motions and defires of the minde tending to vertue and honestie, to honour also and contentment of conscience, upon vertuous deeds and well doing, are once growen to their vigor and perfection, they have not for their limit, the length and tearme onely of mans life: but furely, the defire of honor, and the affection to profit the focietic of men, comprehending all atternitie, striveth still to goe forward in such actions and beneficiall deeds as yeeld infinit pleasures that cannot be expressed; which joies, great personages and men of woorth can not shake off and avoid though they would: for flic 40 they from them what they can, yet they environ them about on every fide, they are readie to meet them wherfoever they goe, when as by their beneficence and good deeds they have once refreshed and cheered many other: for of such persons may well this verse be verified:

To towne when that he comes, or there doth walk: Men him behold as God, and so doe talk.

For when a man hath so affected and disposed others, that they are glad and leape for joy to see him, that they have a longing defire to touch, salute, & speak unto him; who seeth not (though otherwise he were blinde) that he findeth great joies in himselse, and enjoieth most sweet contentment: this is the cause that such men are never wearie of well dooing, nor thinke it a trouble to be emploied to the good of others; for we shall evermore heare from their mouths these 50 and fuch like speeches:

Thy father thee begat and brought to light, That thou one day might it profu many a wight. Againe,

Let us not cease, but shew aminde, Of doing good to all mankind.

Whatneed I to speake heere of those that bee excellent men, and good in the highest degree? for if to any one of those who are not extremely wicked, at the very point and instant of dead;

he in whose hands lieth his life, be he a god or someking, should graunt one howres respit, and permit him to employ himselfe at his owne choise, either to execute some memorable act. or elfe to take his pleafure for the while, fo that immediately after that howre pall, he should goe to his death: How many thinke you would chuse rather during this small time, to lie with that courtifane and famous strumpet Law, or drink liberally of good Ariusian wine, than to kill the tyrant Archias, for to deliver the citic of Thebes, from tyrannicall fervitude? for mine owne part verily, I suppose, that there is not one: for this I observe in those sword-sencers, who fight at sharpe a combat to the uttrance, such I meane as are not altogether brutish and savage, but of the Greekish nation, when they are to enter in place for to performe their devoir, not with standing there be presented unto them many deintie dishes, and costly cates, chuse rather at this 10 very time to recommend unto their friends, their wives and children, to manumife and enfranchife their flaves, than to ferve their bellies and content their fenfuall appetites: But admit that these bodily pleasures be great matters, and highly to be accounted of, the same are common also even to those that leade an active life, and manage affaires of State: For as the Poetsaith:

Wine muscadell they drinke, and likewise eat Fine manchet bread, made of the whitest wheat.

They banket also, and feast with their friends, yea and much more merily (in my conceit, after they be returned from bloudie battels or other great exploits and important fervices; like as Alexander & Agesilaus, Phocion also and Epaminondas were woont to do) than these who areannointed against the fire, or carried easily in their litters: and yet such as they, mocke and scome 20 those, who indeed have the fruition of other greater and more deintie pleasures: for what should a man speake of Epaminondas, who being invited to a supper unto his friends house, when he saw that the provision was greater and more sumptuous than his state might well beare, would not stay and suppe with him, but faid thus unto his friend: I thought you would have facrificed unthe gods, and not have beene a wastefull and prodigall spender: and no marvell; forking Alexander the Great refused to entertaine the exquisit cooks of Ada Queene of Caria; saying: Thathe had better about him of his owne to dreffe his meat, to wit, for his dinner or breakfalt, early rifing and travelling before day-light; and for his supper, a light and hungry dinner. As for Philoxenus who wrot unto him concerning two most faire and beautiful boies, to this effect, whether he should buy them for to fend unto him or no? he had like to have lost the place of go- 30 vernment under him, for his labour: and yet to fay a trueth, who might have better done it than Alexander ? But like as of two paines & griefs (as Hippocrates faith) the leffe is dulled and dimmed (as it were) by the greater; even so, the pleasures proceeding from vertuous and honourable actions, do darken and extinguish (by reason of the minds joies, and in regard of their exceeding greatnesse) those delights which arise from the bodie. And if it be so as these Epicureans fay, that the remembrance of former pleasures and good things, be materiall and make much for a joifull life; which of us all will beleeve Epicurus himselfe, that dying (as hedid) in most grievous paines and dolorous maladies, he eased his torments or asswaged his anguish by calling to minde those delights which beforetime he had enjoied ? For furely, it were an easier matter to beholde the refemblance of ones face in the bottome of a troubled water, or amid the 40 waves during a tempest, than to conceive and apprehend the smiling and laughing remembrance of a pleasure past, in so great a disquietnesse and bitter vexation of the body; whereas the memorie of vertuous and praise-worthy actions, a man can not (would he never so faine) chase and drive out of his minde. For how is it possible, that Alexander the Great, should ever forget the battell at Arbela ? or Pelopidas, the defaiture of the tyrant Leoniades? or Themistocles, the noble field fought before Salamis? for as touching the victorie at Marathon, the memorial thereof the Athenians doe folemnize with feafts even to this day; like as the Thebans celebrate the remembrance of the famous fight at Leuttres: and weeverily (as you know well enough) make feasts for the victorie of Daiphantus before the citie Hyampolis; and not onely we, keepe yeerely holiday then, but also the whole country of Phoeis (upon that anniversarie day) is full of 50 facrifices and due honours; neither is there one of us that taketh fo great contenument of all that hee eateth or drinketh at fuch a festivall time, as he doth in regard of the remembrance of those noble acts which those brave men performed : we may well gesse and consider therefore, what joy, what mirth, what gladnesse and solace of heart accompanied them all their life time after, who executed these noble seats of armes, considering that after five hundred yeeres and above, the memorie of them is fresh, and the same attended with so great cheere and rejoicing. And yet Epicar so hunselfedoth acknowledge, that of glorie there doe arise certeine joies and pleasures; for how could he doe leffe, seeing that himselfe is so desirous thereof, that he is even mad withall, and fareth after a furious maner to atteine thereto; infomuch, as not onely he difawoweth his owne mafters and teachers, contesteth against * Democrates (whose opinions and *Or rather doctrines he stealeth word for word) upon certeine fyllables and nice points, mainteining that Domacolon there never was any wife man nor learned clearke, fetting himfelfe and his disciples aside: but alfo, which more is, he hath bene fo impudent, as to fay and write; that Colotes adored him as a god, touching his knees full devoudy, when he heard him discourse of naturall causes; and that his brother Neocles affirmed and gave out even from his infancie; that Epicurus had never his slike or fellow, for wildome and knowledge; as also, that his mother was happie and bleffed for bearing in her womb fuch a number of Atomes, that is to fay, indivisible small bodies, who concutting all together, framed and formed fo skilfull a personage. Is not this all one with that which Callier at teles formetime faid of Conon : That he committed adulterie with the fea; even fo a man may fay that Epicurus (fecretly by ftealth and fhamefully) made love unto Glory, and went about to folicit, yea, force her by violence, not being able to win and enjoy her openly; whereupon he became paffionate and love-ficke: for like as a mans bodie in time of famine, for that it bath no food and nourishment otherwise, is conftreined even against nature, to feed upon the ownefubstance; even so ambition and thirst after glorie, doth the like hurt unto the soules of ambitious persons: for being readie to die for thirst of glorie, and seeing they can not have it otherwise, enforced they are to praise themselves. But they that be thus passionatly affected 20 with defire of praife and honour, confesse nor they manifestly, that they reject, forgo and negleft great pleafures and delights; when through their feeble, lazie and base minds, they flie from publicke offices of State, forbeare the management of affaires, and regard not the favours of kings and following of great persons; from whence Democritus faith; there accrue unto man many ornaments to grace and commend this life? For Epicurus shall never be able to make the worldbeleeve, that (esteeming so much as he did and making so great account of Neocles his brothers testimonie or the adoration of colotes) he would not have bene ready to have leapt our of his skin, and gone befides himfelfe for joy, if he had beene received by the Greeks at the folemnitie of the Olympian games, with joious acclamations and clapping of hands: nay, hee would no doubt have shewed that gladnesse and contentment of heart with open mouth; hee 30 would have bene aloft and flowen abroad, as the Poet Sophocles faith:

Like to the Downe, which being light and loft From thiftle olde, the winde doth mount aloft.

And if it be a gracious and acceptable thing, for a man to brute that he hath a good name; it followeth confequently, that grievous it is to be in an ill name: and what is more infamous and odious, than to be friendlesse, to want emploiment, to be infected with Atheisme and impietie, to live loofely and abandoned to lufts and pleasures; finally, to be neglected and contemned? and verily (fetting themselves aside) there is no man living, but he thinkethal these qualities and attributes to agree fitly unto this feet of theirs. True(will fome man fay)but they have the greater wrong. Well, the question now, is not, what is the trueth, but what is the common opinion 40 that the world hath of them: and to this purpose I meane not to cite the publicke decrees and acts of Citres, nor to alledge the defamatorie books written against them; for that were too odious: but if the oracles, if divination, if the præfeience and providence of the gods, if the naturall love and affectionate kindneffe of parents to their children, if the managing of politike affaires, if the conduct of armies, if magiffracie and rule in common-wealth, be matters honourable and glorious, then it must needs be, that they who affirme: That no travell ought to be made for the fafetie of Greece, but that we are to eat and drinke, so as the bellie may be pleased, and receive no harme and discontentment, should be infamous, and reputed for wicked persons; and such as are to taken, must needs be odious and in great difgrace, if to be they hold, honour, good name and reputation, to be things pleafant and delectable.

When Theon had made an end of this speech, thought good it was to give over walking; and when (as our custome and manner was) we were set downe upon the seats, we rested a pretie while in filence, ruminating(as it were) and pondering that which had beene delivered, but long this was not; for Zeuxippus thinking upon that which had beene faid: And who (quoth he) shall goethrough with that which remaineth behind, confidering that me thinks we are not as yet come to a full point and finall conclusion? for feeing that crewhile he hath made mention by the way of Divination, and likewife put us in minde of Divine providence two maine points, I may tell you whereupon these men doe greatly stand, and which by their saying yeeld them not * To wit, in Jenying hot the one and the other. the least pleasure, contentment, repose of spirit, and assurance in this life; * therefore I hold in necessarie that somewhat were said as touching the same. Then Aristodemus taking the matter in hand: As for the pleasure (quoth he) which they pretend in this case, me thinks (by all in maner that hath beene spoken) that if their reasons should goe for currant, and bring that about which they purpose & intend, well may they free and deliver their spirit of (I wot not what) seare of the gods, and a certaine superstition; butfurely they imprint no joy, nor minister any comfort and contentment to their minds at all, in any regard of the gods: for to be troubled with no dread of the gods, nor comforted by any hope from them, worketh this effect, and maketh them fo affected towards the gods, as we are to the fithes of the Hyrcan fea, expecting neither goods neffe nor harme from them. But if we must adde fomewhat more to that which hath beene said to alreadie; thus much I take it wee may be bold to fet downe, as received and granted by them: First and formost, that they impugne them mightily, who condemne and take away all heavineffe, forrow, weeping, fighes, and lamentations for the death of friends: and they affirme, that this indolence tending to a kinde of impaffibilitie, proceedeth from another evill, greater and woorse than it, to wit, cruell inhumanitie, or else an outragious and surious desire of vaingloric and oftentation; and therefore they hold it better to fuffer a little forrow, and to grieve moderately, so a man runne not all to teares and marre his eies with weeping, nor shewallmaner of passions as some doe by their deeds and writings, because they would be thought affectionate and heartie lovers of their friends, and withall of a gentle and tender nature: For thus much hath Epicarus delivered in many of his books, and namely in his letters where he maketh 20 mention of the death of Hegefanax, writing unto Dofaheus the father, and Pyrfos the brother of the man departed: For long it is not fince by fortune those letters of his came to my hands, which I perufed, and in imitating their maner of arguing, I fay: That Atheifme and impietie is no leffe finne, than the crueltie or vaine and arrogant oftentation abovefaid; unto which impictiethey would induce us with their perswasions, who take from God both favor and also anger: For, better it were, that to the opinion and beliefe which we have of the gods, therewere adjoined and engraffed an affection mixed and compaffed of reverence and feare, than in flying therefro, to leave unto our felves neither hope nor pleasure, no affurance in prospenie, neyet recourse unto the goodnesse of the gods in time of adversitie: True it is, that we ought to ridde away from the opinion that we have of the gods, all superstition, if it be possible, as well 30 as from our cies all gummic and glutinous matter, offending the fight; but if this may not be, we are not therefore to cut away quite, or to put out the cies cleane of that faith and beliefe, which men for the most part have of the gods; and this is not a severe, seareful and austere conceit as these imagine, who traduce and slander divine providence, to make it odious and terrible, as folke doe by little children, whom they use to scarre with the fantasticall illusion, Empula, as if it were some infernall furie, or tragicall vengeance seizing upon them: but some sew men there be, who in that fort doe feare God, as that it is better and more expedient for them fo to doe, than otherwise not to stand in awe of him: for in dreading him as a gracious and propitious lord unto the good, and an enemie unto the wicked, by this one kinde of feare which maketh them that they have no need at all of many others, they are delivered from those baits 40 which many times allure and entice men to evill; and thus keeping vice short, and not giving it head, but holding it necre unto them, and within their reach, that it cannot escape and get from them, they be leffe tormented than those who be so hardie as to emploie the same, and dare put it in practife, but soone after, fall into fearefull fits, and repent themselves : But as touching the disposition toward God in the common fort of men, who are ignorant, unlettered, and of a groffe conceit for the most part; howbeit not very wicked, nor starke naught: true it is, that as together with the reverence and honour that they beare to the gods, there is intermingled certaine trembling feare, which properly is called superstition; so likewise there is an infinit deale more of good hope and true joy, which caufeth them to praie unto the gods continually for their owne good estate, and for happie successe in their affaires, and they receive all prospe-50 ritie as sent unto them from heaven above; which appeareth evidently by most notable and significant arguments: for furely no exercises recreat us more, than those of religion and devotion in the temples of the gods; no times and feafons are more joious, than folemne feafs in their honour, no actions, no fights, more delight and joy our hearts, than those which we doe and see our felves, either finging and dauncing folernnly in the presence of the gods, or being affiliant at their facrifices, or the ceremonious mysteries of divine service; for at such times our soule is nothing fadde, cast downe, or melancholike, as if the had to deale with some terrible tyrants, or bloudie butchers; where good reafon were, that she should bee heavie and dejected; but looke where she thinketh and is perswaded most that God is present, in that place especially, the castest behinde her all anguishes, agonies, forrowes, seares and anxieties; there I say she give the hersels to all manner of joy, even to drinke wine most liberally, to play, disport, laugh and be merie: As the poet said in love and wanton matters:

To So verily in these solutions pompes, processions and factifices, not onely the aged husband and the old wife, the poore man that liveth in low and private estate, but also the houshold hines and tervants, and the mercenarie day-labourers, who get their living by the fiveat of their browes, doe altogether leape for mirth and joy of heart: Kings and princes keepe great cheere in their roiall courts, and make certeine roiall and publike feafts for all commers; but those which they hold in the facred temples, at facrifices and folemnities of the gods, 20 performed with fragrant perfumes and odoriforous incense; where it feemeth that men approchneerest unto the majestic of the gods, & thinke they even touch them, and be conversant with them in all honour and reverence: fuch feafts (I fay) yeeld a more rare joy and fingular delectation, than any other; whereof he hath no part at all who denieth the providence of God: for it is not the abundance and plentie of wine there drunke, nor the store of roast & sodden meat there eaten, which yeeldeth joy and contentment at such solemne seasts; but the affored hope and full perswasion that God is there present, propitious, favourable and gracious; and that he accepteth in good part the honour and service done unto him. For some feaths and facrifices there be, where there is no mulicke at all of flutes and hauthoics, ne yet any chaplets and garlands of flowers used at all; but a facrifice, where no god is present, like as a temple without a fa-30 cred feast or holy banquet, is * profane, unfestivall, impious, irreligious, and without divine in - * 25 cred fpiration and devotion; and to fpeake better, wholly difpleafant and odious to himfelfe that offerethit; for that he counterfeiteth by hypocrifie, praices and adorations, onely in a fliew and otherwise than he meaneth, for feare of the muluitude, and pronounceth words cleane contrary unto the opinions which he holdeth in Philosophie: when he facrificeth, he standeth by the priest as he would by a cooke or butcher, who cutteth the throat of a sheepe; and after he hath sacrificed, he goes his way home, faying thus to himfelie. I have facrificed a sheepe as menordinatily do unto the gods, who have no care and regard of me. For foit is that Epicurus teacheth his scholars, to fer a good countenance of the matter, and neither to envie nor incurre the hatred of the common fort, when they are disposed to be merie, but seeming others in practise, and 40 themselves inwardly in being displeased with things done : for according as Euenus faith:

What things are done perforce by us, Displeasant be and odious.

Hereupon it is, that they themselves do say and holde: That superstitious persons are present at sacrifices and religious ceremonies, not for any joy or pleasure they take there, but upon a scare that they have: and verily, herein no difference is betweene them and superstitious solke, in case it be so, that they doe the same things for scare of the world, which the other do for scare of the gods; nay rather they be in a worse condition than those, in that they have not so much hope of good as they, but onely stand alwaies in dread and be troubled in mind, lest they should be detected and discovered, for abusing and deceiving the world by their counterseit hypocrisie; in regard of which seare, they have themselves written books and treatises of the gods and of dettie, so composed, that they be full of ambiguities; and nothing is therein foundly or cleerely delial vered, they do so maske, difguise and cover themselves; and all to cloake and hide the opinions which in deed they hold, doubting the surie of the people. Thus much concerning two forts of men, to wit, the wicked and the simple or common multitude: now therefore let us consider of a thirdkinde, such as be of the best marke, men of worth and honour, most devout and religious in deed; namely, what sincere and pure pleasures they have, by reason of the perswasion that they hold of God; beleeving sitmly, that he is the ruler and director of all good persons, the au-thour and father from whom proceed all things good and honest; and that it is not lawfull to fay or beleeve, that he doth evill, no more than to be perswaded that he suffereth evill: for good he is by nature; and looke whatfoever is good, conceiveth no envie to any, is fearefull of none. neither is it moved with anger or hatred of ought: for like as heat can not coole a thing, but alwaies naturally, maketh it hot; fo that which is good can not hurt or doill. Now, anger and fayour be farre remote one from the other; fo is choler and bitter gall much different from mildnesse and benevolence; as also malice and frowardnesse are opposite unto bountie, meeknesse, and humanitie; for that the one fort arifeth from vertue and puissance; the other from weake. neffe and vice. Now are we not to thinke that the divine power is given to be wrathfull and graneffe and vice. cious alike; but to beleeve rather, that the proper nature of God is alwaies to be helpfull and beneficiall; whereas to be angry and to doc harme, is not so naturall; but that mightie Jupiter in heaven, he descendeth from thence first downe to the earth, to dispose and ordeine all things: after him, other gods, of whom the one is furnamed, The Giver, another, Mild and Bounteous a third, Protectour or Defender: as for Apollo, as Pindarus faith:

Now as Diegenes was wont to fay, all things are Gods, and likewife among friends, all things are common, and good men are Gods friends; even fo, impossible it is, that either he who is de 20 vout and a lover of God, should not be withall happie; or that a vertuous, temperate, and just man should not likewise be devout and religious. Thinke ye then, that these who denie the government of Godsprovidence, need other punishment, or be not punished sufficiently for their implette, in that they cut themselves from so great joy and pleasure as we finde in our selves, we (I fay) who are thus well given and religiously affected toward God ? The greatest joy that Epicurus floodupon and bare himselse so boldly, were Metrodorus, Polyanus, Aristobulus and such; and those he was alwaies emploied about, either in curing and tending them when they were ficke, or in bewailing them after they were dead : whereas Lyeurgus was honoured even by the prophetesse Pythia in these tearmes:

As for Socrates, who had a familiar spirit about him, whom he imagined to speake and reason friendly with him, even of kindneffe and good will: and Pindarus likewife, who heard god Pan chant one of those canticles which himselfe had composed, thinke wee that they tooke small pleasure and contenument of heart thereby? Or what may we judge of Phormio, when he lodged in his house, Caster and Pollux; or of Sophoeles, for enterteining of Aefeulapius, as both himselfe was perswaded, and as others believed, for the manifest apparitions presented unto them? It were not amisse and beside the purpose, to rehearse in this place, what a faith and beleefe in the gods, Heromogenes had, and that in those very words and tearmes which he setteth downe him-selfe. The gods (quoth he) who know all things, and likewise can doe all, are so friendly unto 40 me, that for the care they have of my person and my affaires, are never ignorant day or night, either of that action which I purpose to doe, or of that way which I entend to goe : and sor that they forfee the iffue and event of what soever I enterprise and undertake; they advertise me thereof before hand, by prefage of offes, voices, dreames, auguries and bird flights, which they fend as meffengers to me of purpose. Moreover, meet it is, that we should have this opinion of the gods, that whatfoever proceedeth from them is good; but when we are perswaded that the goods which we receive from them, be fent unto us, upon special lavor and grace, this is a woonderfull contentment to the minde, this worketh much confidence, breedeth a marvellous courage, and inward joy, which feemeth as it were to fmile upon good men: whereas, they who are otherwise minded and disposed, hinder themselves of that which is most sweet 50 in prosperitie, and leave no refuge or retiring place in time of adversitie; for when any mistortune lighteth upon them, no other haven or retrait have they than the diffolution or separation ofbody and foule; nothing I say but the depriving of all sense: as if in a storme or tempest at fea, a man should come and say for the better comfort and assurance of the passengers, that neither the ship had a pilot, nor the luckie fire-lights (Castor and Pollux) appeared to all ay the furging waves, or ftill the boifterous and violent winds, and yet for all that, there was no harme toward, because forsooth the shippe should soone finke and bee swallowed up of the sea; or that the would quickly turne fide, or runne upon fome rock for to be fplit and broken in pieces: for these be the proper reasons which Epicarus useth in grievous maladies and extreme perils: Hopeft thou for any good at Gods hand with all thy religion? thou art much deceived: for the effence and nature of God being happie & immortall; is neither given to anger, nor yet inclined to pitie: Dost thou imagine a better state or condition after thy death, than thou hast in thy life? furely thou dotest, and art mightily beguiled; for that which is once dissolved, loseth presently all maner of sense; & if it be senselesse, what is that to us? it toucheth not us, whether it be good or ill. But heare you (my good friend:) How is it that you exhort me to eat, to drink, and make good cheere? Marie because the tempest is so bigge, that of necessitie shipwracke nulf foone enfue, and the extreme perill at hand will quickly bring thee to thy death: and yet the poore paffenger (after that the shippe is broken all to pieces, or that hee is flung or fallen out of it) bearethhimselfe upon some little hope, that he shall (by one good fortune or other) reach unto the shore and swimme to land; whereas by these mens philosophic, there is no

evalion for the foule: To any place without the sea With frothing fome all hoare and grey.

For that immediatly the is diffolved, peritheth and dieth before the bodie; infomuch as the feeleth excessive joy, by having learned and received this most wife and divine doctrine: That the end of all her adversities and miseries, is to perish for ever, to corrupt and come to nothing. But it were (quoth he, casting his cie upon me) a great follie to speake any more of this matter, (confidering that long fince we have heard you discourse in ample manner) against those who hold; that the reasons and arguments of Epicurus make us better disposed and ready to die, than all that Plato hath written in his treatife concerning the foule. What of that? (quoth Zenxippus) shall this present discourse be left unperfect and unfinished because of it? and feare we to alledge the oracle of the gods, when we dispute against the Epicureans? No (quoth I againe) in any wife, for according to the fentence of Empedoeles:

A good tale twife a man may tell, And beare it told as oft full well.

And therefore we must intreat Theon againe; for I suppose he was present at the faid disputati-20 on, and being (as he is) a yoong man, he need not feare that yoong men will charge him for oblivion, or default of memorie. Then Theon feeming as if he had beene forced and overcome by conftreint : Well (quoth he) fince there is no other remedie, I will not do as you Aristademus did; you were afraid to repeat that which this man had delivered; but I will not flicke to make use of that which you have said: for in mine opinion you have done very well, in dividing men into three forts; the first, of those, who are leud and wicked; the second of them that bee fimple, ignorant, and the common people; the third, of fuch as be wife, honeft, and of good worth. As for those who be wicked & naughtic persons (in searing the pains and punishments proposed in general unto all)they will be afraid to commit any more sinne, and by this meanes not breaking out, but restraining themselves, they shal live in more joy, & with lesse trouble and 40 disquietnesse. For Epicurus thinketh, that there is no other meanes to divert men from evill doing, than, feare of punishment; & therefore he thinketh it good pollicie, to imprint in them the frights occasioned by superstition, to masker them with the terrors of heaven & earth, together with fearfull earthquakes, deepe chinks, and openings of the ground, and generally all forts of feares and suspicions; that being terrified thereby, they might live in better order, and carie themselves more modestly; for more expedient it is for them, not to commit any hainous sact for feare of torments which they were to fuffer after their death, than to transgresse & break the lawes, and thereby, live all their life time in danger, and exceeding perplexitie and distrust: As touching the meane people and ignorant multitude (to fay nothing of the feare of that which fuch men beleeve to be in hell) the hope of eternitie, whereof the poets make fo great promifes, 50 and the defire to live alwaies (which of all other defires is the most auncient and greatest) surpasseth in pleasure and sweet contentment, all childish feare of hell; insomuch as forgoing and losing their children, their wives and friends, yet they with rather they should still bee somewhere, and continue (though they indured otherwife all maner of paines and calamities) than wholy to bee taken out of the univerfall world, and brought to nothing: yea, and willing they are, and take pleasure to heare this spoken of one that is dead: How he is departed out of this world into another, or gone to God; with other fuch like manner of speeches, importing, that 602 death is no more but onely a change or alteration, but not a totall and entire abolition of the foule. And thus they use to speake:

Thenshall I call even there to mind, The sweet acquaint ance of my friend. Also:

What shall I say from you to Hector bold? Or husband yours, right deere, who liv'd so old?

And herof proceeded and prevailed this errour: that men supposed they are well eased of their forrow, and better appaied when they have interred with the dead, the armes, weapons, instructions and garments which they were wont to use ordinarily in their life time; like as Minos 10 buried together with Glaucus:

His Candios pipes, made of the long-shanke bones

Of dapple doe or hinde, that lived once.

And if they be perfivaded, that the dead either defire or demand any thing, glad they are and willing to fend or bestow the same upon them. And thus did Periander, who burnt in the sunerall five together with his wise, her apparell, habilitiments, and jewels, for that he thought she called for them, and complained that she lay a cold. And such as these are not greatly affraid of any judge Aeaeus, of Ascalaphus, or of the river Acheron; considering that they attribute unto them daunces, the attricall plaies, and all kinde of musicke, as if they tooke delight and pleasure there in and yet there is not one of them all, but is readie to quake for seare, to see that face of death, 20 fo terrible, so unpleasant, so glum and grizly, deprived of all sense, and growen to oblivion and ignorance of all things; they tremble for very horrour, when they heare any of these words: He is dead, he is perished, he is gone, and no more to be seene: grievously displeased and offended they be, when these and such like speeches are given out:

Within the earth as deepe as trees do stand, His hap shall be to rot and turne to sand: No feasts he shall frequent nor hearethe lute And harpe, ne yet the sound of pleasant slute. Againc:

When once the ghost of man from corps is sled, And pass'd the ranks of teeth set thicke in head; All meanes to catch and setch her are but vaine,

No hope there is of her returne againe.
But they kill them frome dead, who fay thus unto them:

We mortall men have bene once borne for all, No feeond birth we are for to expect, We muft not looke for life that is eternall,

Such thoughts, as dreames, we ought for to reject.

For, casting and considering with themselves, that this present life is a small matter, or rather indeed a thing of nought, in comparison of eternities they regard it not, nor make any account to 40 enjoy the benefit thereof; whereupon they neglect all vertue and the honourable exploits of action, as being utterly discouraged and discontented in themselves, for the shortnesse of either in the of uncerteine and without atturance; and in one word, because they take themselves unsit and unworthy to performe any great thing. For, to say that a dead man is deprived of all sense, because (having bene before compounded) that composition is now broken and dissolved; to give out also, that a thing once dissolved, hath no Being at all; and in that regard toucheth us not; howsever they seeme to be goodly reasons, yet they rid us not from the seare of death, but contrativise, they doe more confirme and enforce the same; for this is it in deed which nature abhoriteth, when it shall be faid, according to the Poet Homers words:

But as for you, both all and some,

Soone may you earth and water become.

meaning thereby, the refolution of the foule into a thing that hath neither intelligence nor any fense at all; which Epicurus holding to be a diffipation thereof into (I wot not what) emptinesse, or voidnesse & simal indivisible bodies, which he termeth Atoms, by that meanes cutteth off (so much the rather) all hope of immortalitie: for which (I dare well say) that all folke living, men and women both, would willingly be bitten quite thorow and gnawen by the hel-dog Cerberus, or cary water away in veffels full of holes in the bottome, like as the Danaides did, fo they might onely have a Being, and not perish utterly for ever, and be reduced to nothing. And yet verily, there be not many men who feare these matters, taking them to be poeticall sictions and tales devised for pleasure, or rather bug-beates that mothers and nouries use to fright their children with; and even they also who stand in seare of them, are provided of certeine ceremonies and expiratoric purgations, to helpe themselves withall: by which (if they be once cleansed and pursified) they are of opinion, that they shall goe into another world to places of pleasure, where there is nothing but playing and dauncing continually among those who have the aire elected, the winde milde and pure, the light gracious, and their voice intelligible: whereas the privation of life troubleth both yoong and old: for we all (even every one of us) are sicke for love, and exceeding desirous

To fee the beautie of funnes light,
Which on the earth dorh skine fo bright, as Euripides saith: neither willing are we, but much displeased to heare this:

And as he spake, thus great immortall eie

Ana as ne pake, that great immortal cie
Which giveth light thorowout the fabricke wide
Of this round world, made hafte and faft did hie
With chariot (wift, cleane out of fight to ride.

Thus together with the perswasion and opinion of immortallity, they bereave the common 20 people of the greatest and sweetest hopes they have. What thinks wee then of those men who are of the better fort, and fuch as have lived justly and devoutly in this life? Surely, they looke for no evill at all in another world, but hope and expect there the greatest and most heavenly bleffings that be: for first and formost, champions or runners in a race, are never crowned so long as they be in combat or in their course, but after the combat ended and the victory atchieved; even so, when these persons are personaded that the proofe of the victoric in this world is due unto them after the course of this life, wonderfull it is, and it can not be spoken, how great contentment they finde in their hearts for the privitie and conscience of their vertue, and for those hopes which affure them, that they one day shall see those (who now abuse their good gifts infolently, who commit outrage by the meanes of their might, riches and authoritie, and who feorne and foolifhly mocke fuch as are better than themfelves) paie for their deferts, and suffer woorthily for their pride and infolencie. And for as mever any of them who are enamored of learning, could fatisfic (to the full) his defire as touching the knowledge of the truth, and the contemplation of the univerfall nature of this world; for that indeed they fee as itwere through a darke cloud and a thick mist; to wit, by the organes and instruments of this body, and have no other use of reason, but as it is charged with the humors of the flesh, weake alfo and troubled, yea, and woonderfully hindered; therefore having an eie and regard alwaies upward, & endevoring to flie forth of the bodie (as a bird that taketh her flight and mounteth up aloft, that the may get into another lightfome place of greater capacitie) they labour to make their foulelight, and to discharge her of all grosse passions and earthly affections, such as be 40 base and transitorie, and that by the meanes of their studie in philosophic, which they use for an exercise and meditation of death. And verily for my part, I esteeme death a good thing, so perfect and confirmate in regard of the foule which then shall live a life indeed, found and certaine, that I suppose the life heere is not a subsistent and assured thing of it selfe, but resembleth rather the vaine illusions of some dreames. And if it be so (as Epicurus faith:) That the remembrance and renewing acquaintance of a friend departed out of this life is every way a pleafant thing; aman may even now confider and know sufficiently, of what joie these Epicureans deprive themselves, who imagine otherwhiles in their dreames; that they receive and enterteine, yea and follow after to embrace, the very shadowes, visions, apparitions, and ghosts of their triends who are dead, and yet they have neither understanding nor sense at all; and meane 50 while they disappoint themselves of the expectation to converse one day indeed with their decre father and tender mother, and to fee their beloved and honest wives; and are destitute of all fuch hope of fo amiable company and fweet focietie, as they have, who are of the fame opinion, that Pythagor as, Plato, and Homer were, as touching the nature of the foule. Certes I am verily perswaded, that Homer (covertly and as it were by the way) shewed, what maner of affection theirs is in this point, when he casteth and projecteth amidde the presse of those that were fighting, the image of Aeneas, as if he were dead indeed; but presently after, hee exhibiteth him marching alive, fafe and found:

And when his friends faw him fo vigorous And whole of limbs, andwith heart generous, To battel prest, whom earst they tooke for dead, They least for joy, and banished all dread.

leaving therefore the forefaid image and shew of him, they raunged all about him. Let us likewife (feeing that reason prooveth & sheweth unto us; that a man may in very truth converse with those that are departed; that lovers and friends may touch, handle, and keepe companie one with another, having their perfect fenses) be of good cheere and shunne those, who can not beleeve so much, nor reject and cast behind, all such fantasticall images and outward barks and rinds onely, in which they do all their life time nothing elfe but grieve and lament in vaine. Moreover, they that thinke the end of this life to be the beginning of another that is better; if they lived pleafantly in this world, better contented they are to die, for that they looke for to enjoy a better eflate in another; and if things went not to their mind heere, yet are they not much discontented, in regard of the hopes which they have of the future delights and pleasures behind: and these worke in them such incredible joies and expectances, that they put out and abolith all defects and offences whatfoever; thefe drowne (I fay) and overcome all discontentments otherwise of the minde, which by that meanes beareth gently, and endureth with patience what accidents foever befal in the way, or rather in a fhort diverticle or turning of the way: whereas contrariwife (to those who believe, that our life heere is ended and diffolved in a certaine deprivation of all fense) death (because it bringeth no alteration of miseries) is dolorous as 20 well to them of the one fortune as the other; but much more unto those who are happie in this present life, than unto such as are miserable; for that as it cutteth these short of all hope of better estate; so from those it taketh away a certeintie of good, which was their present joyfull life: And like as many medicinable and purgative drougs (which are neither good nor pleasant to the stomacke, howbeit in some respect necessarie, howsoever they ease and cure the sicke) doe greathurt, and offend the bodies of fuch as be in health; even so the doctrine of Epicurus unto those who are infortunate and live miserably in this world, promiseth an issue out of their miferies, and the fame nothing happie, to wit; a finall end, and totall diffolution of their foule: And as for those who are prudent, wise, and live in abundance of al good things, it impeacheth and hindreth altogether their alacritic & contentment of spirit, in bringing and turning them 30 from an happie life to no life at all, from a bleffed estate to no estate or being whatsoever. For first & formost this is certaine: That the very apprehension of the losse of goods, afflicteth and vexetha man as much, as either an affured expectance, or a present enjoying and fruition thereof rejoiceth his heart: yet would they beare us in hand, that the cogitation of this finall diffolution and perdition into nothing, leaveth unto men a most affured and pleasant good, to wit, the refutation or putting by of a certaine fearefull doubt and suspicion of infinit and endlesse miferies: and this fay they, doth the doctrine of Epicurus effect, in abolithing the feare of death, and teaching that the foule is utterly diffolved. Now if this be a fingular and most sweet conrent (as they Tay it is) to be delivered from the feare and expectation of calamities and miseries without end, how can it otherwise be but irksome and grievous, to be deprived of the hope of 40 joies sempiternall, and to lose that supreame and sovereigne selicitie? Thus you see it is good neither for the one nor the other, but this, Not-being, is naturally an enemie, and quite contrarie unto all that have Being: And as for those whom the miserie of death seemeth to deliver from the miseries of life, a poore and cold comfort they have (God wor) of that insensibility, as if they had an evasion and escaped thereby; and on the other side, those who lived in all prosperitie, and afterwards came of a sudden to change that state into nothing: me thinks I see very plainly, that these tarrie for a searcfull and terrible end of their race, which thus shall cause their felicitie to cease; for nature abhorreth not privation of sense, as the beginning of another estate and being, but is afraid of it because it is the privation of those good things which are present. For to say: That the thing which costeth us the losse of all that we have, toucheth us 50 not, is a very abfurd speech, confidering, that this very cogitation and apprehension thereof concerneth us much already: for this intensibilitie doth not afflict and trouble those who have no more Being, but fuch as yet are, namely, when they come to cast their account, what detriment and losse they receive by being no more, and that by death they shall be reduced to nothing: for it is not the three-headed-helhound Cerberus, nor the river of teares and weeping. Coeytus, which cause the seare of death to be infinit and interminable; but it is that menacing intimation of Nullity or Not being, & of the impossibility to returne againe into a state of Being, after men once are gone and departed out of this life; for there is no fecond nativitie nor regeneration, but that Not-being must of necessitie remaine for ever, according to the doctrine of Epicarus: for if there be no end at all of Non-effence, but the same continue infinit and immutable, there will be found likewise an eternall and endlesse miserie in that privation of all good things, by a certeine insensibilitie, which never shall have end. In which point Herodotus seemethyet to have dealt more wisely, when he saith: That God having given a taste of sweet eternitie, seemeth envious in that behalfe, especially to those who are reputed happie in this world; unto whom that pleafure was nothing els but a bait to procure dolor, namely, when they have a tafte of those things which they must forgoe: for what joy, what contentment and fruition of pleafure is there fo great, but this conceit and imagination of the foule (falling continually as it it were into a vast sea of this infinition) is not able to quell and chase away, especially in those who repose all goodnesse and beatitude in pleasure ? And if it be true as Epicurus faith: That to die in paine, is a thing incident to most men; then surely there is no meane at all to mitigate or allay the feare of death, feeing it haleth us even by griefe and anguish to the losse of a fovereigne good and yet his fecturies would feeme to urge and enforce this point mainly, to wit, in making men beleeve that it is a good thing to escape and avoid evill; and yet for footh, that they should not thinke it evill, to be deprived of good. They confesse plainly, that in death there is no joy nor hope at all, but what pleasure and sweetnesse soever we had, is thereby and then cut off; whereas contrariwife, even in that time, those who believe their soules to be immortall and 20 incorruptible, looke to have and enjoy the greatest and most divine bleffings; and for certeine great revolutions of yeeres, to converse in all happinesse and felicity, sometime upon the earth, otherwhiles in heaven, untill in that generall resolution of the universall world they come to burne together with Sun and Moone, in a spirituall and intellectuall fire.

This spacious place of so many and so great joies, Epicurus cutteth off and abolisheth cleane, in that he anulleth all hopes that we ought to have in the aide and savour of the gods; whereby both in contemplative life he existinguisheth the love of knowledge and learning; and also in the active, the desire of valourous acts of winning honour and glory; restraining, driving and thrusting nature into a narrow roome, of a joy which is very strait, short and unpure, to wit, from the soules delight to a sless hyperbeasure; as if she were not capable of a greater good, than the a-

THOV LIVEST.

The Summarie.

His precept was first given by Noocles the brother of Epicurus, as saith Suidas: and as if it had bene some golden sentence it wem currant or amarily in the mouthes of all the Epicureans, who advised a man that would live happily, not to intermedale in any publike assaires of State: but Plutarch considering well how ill this Emprese sounded, being taken in that sense and construction which they give unto it, and sore seeing the abfurd and dangerous confequences enfuing upon such an opinion, doth now confute the same by seven arguments or sound reasons, to wit: That therein such soolish Philosophers discover mightily their excessive ambition: That it is a thing dishonest and perillous for a man to retire himselfe apare from others; for that if a man be vicious, be ought to seeke abroad for remedie of humaladie: if a lover of goodnesse and versue, he is likewise to make other men love the same. life being defamed with all ordure and wickednesse, it were great reason in deed, that such men should remaine hidden and buried in perpetuall darknesse. After this, he sheweth that the good proceeding from the life of vertuous men, is a sufficient encouragement for every one to be emploied in assisting for that there is nothing more miserable than an idle life, and that which is unprofitable to our neighbors: That life, birth, generation, mans soule, yea, and man himselfe wholly as he is, teach us by their definitions and properties: That we are not fet in this world, for to be directed by such a precept as this and in conclusion: That the estate of our soules, after they be separate from the bodie, condemneth and overthroweth this doctrine of the Epicureans, and prooveth evidently, that they be extreame mise, rable, both during and after this life. All these premises well marked and considered, instruct and teach them that be of good valling in the world, and in higher place, to endevor and straine themselves to in their severall vocations, to site and life, so farressorthat they take heed with all, they be not over curious, pragmaticall, busic and stirring, nor sooready and forwards meddle in those matters which ought to be let alone as they be; for seve less whiles they weene to rasse and advance themselves, they fall backe, and become lower than they would.

WHETHER THIS COMMON

Mot, be well faid: Live hidden: or, So live, as no man may know thou liveft.

Oe how even himfelfe, who was the authout of this fentence, would not be unknowne, but that all the world (hould understand, that he it was who faid it; for expresly he uttered this very speech, to the end that it might not remain, unknowen that he had some more understanding than others, defirous to winne a glorie undeserved and not due unto him, by diverting others from glory, and exhorting them to obscurity of life. I like the man well verily, for this is just according to the old verse:

I have him who of wisdome beares the name, And to himselfe cannot performe the same.

We reade that Philoxenus the fonne of Eryxis, and Gnatho the Sicilian, (two notorious gluttons given to bellie-cheere, and to love their tooth) when they were at a feaft, used to snite their notes into the very diffies and platters with meat before them; thereby to drive those in their messe, and who were set at the table, from eating with them, and by that meanes to engorge themselves, and fill their bellies alone with the best viands served up: Semblably, they who are excessively and out of all measure ambitious, before others as their concurrents and corrivals, blame and dispraise glorie and honour, to the end that they alone without any competitours might enjoy the fame: And heerein they doe like unto mariners fitting at the oare in a bote or gally; for howfoever their eie is toward the poupe, yet they labour to 40 fet the prow forward, in that the flowing of the water by reciprocation, caused by the stroke of the oares, comming forcibly backe upon the poupe, might helpe to drive forward the veffell; even fo, they that deliver fuch rules and precepts, whiles they make femblant to flie from glory, purfue it as fast as they can; for otherwise if it were not so: what need had he (who so ever he was) to give out such a speech? what meant he else to write it, and when he had written it, to publish the fame unto posteritie? If I say he meant to be unknowne to men living in his time, who desired to be knowne unto those that came after him? But let us come to the thing it selfe : How can it chuse but be simply naught? Live so hidden (quoth he) that no man may perceive that ever you lived; as if he had faid. Take heed you be not knowne for a digger up of sepulchres, & a defacer of the tombs & monuments of the dead: But contrariwife, a foule & dishonest thing it is to 50 live in fuch fort, as that you should be willing that we al, know not the maner thereof. Yet would I for my part fay cleane contrary: Hide not thy life, how ever thou do, and if thou hast lived badly, make thy felfe knowne; bewifer, repent & amend: if thou be endued with vertue, hide it not, neither be thou an unprofitable member; if vicious, continue not obstinate there, but yeeld to correction, & admit the cure of thy vice; or rather at (leaftwife fir) make a diffinction, & define who it is, to whom you give this precept? If he be ignorant, unlearned, wicked, or foolish, then it is as much as if you faid thus: Hide thy feaver; cloke & cover thy phrefie; let not the phylician take notice of thee; goe and put thy felfe into fome darke corner, where no performay have a fight of thee, or of thy maladies and passions; go thy way aside with all thy naughtinesse, sieke as thou art of an incurable and mortall disease; cover thy spight and envic; hide thy superstinon; suppresse and conceale (as it were) the disorderly beatings of thine arteries; take heed & be afraid how you let your pulse be felt, or bewray your selfe to those who have the meanes, & are able to admonify, correct, and heale you. But long ago, & in the old world, our ancestors were wont to take in hand and cure openly in publike place, those that were diseased in body: in those daies, everie one (who had met with any good medicine, or knowne a remedie, whereof he had theproofe, either in himfelfe being ficke, or in another cured thereby) would reveale and comto municate the same unto another that stood in need thereof: and thus they say: The skil of Phyfick arifing first, and growing by experience, became in time, anoble and excellent science. And even fo, requifit it is and necessarie, to discover and lay open unto all men, lives that be diseased, and the infirmities of the soule, to touch and handle them, and by considering the inclinations of every man, to fay thus unto one: Subject thou art to anger, take heed thereof; unto another: Thou art given to jealousie and emulation, beware of it, doe thus and thus; to a third : Art thou amorous and full of love? I have beene fo my felfe otherwhiles, but I repent me thereof. But now a daies it is cleane contrarie; in denying, in cloaking, covering, and hiding, men thrust and drive their vices inwardly, and more deepely still into their secret bowels. Now if they be men of woorth and vertuous, whom thou counfellest to hide themselves, that 20 the world may take no knowledge of them, it is all one as to fay unto Epaminondus: Take no charge of the conduct of an army: or to Lyeurgus: Amuse not your head about making lawes: and to Thrasibulus: Kill no tyrants: to Pythagoras: Keepe no schoole, nor teach in any wife: to Socrates: See you dispute not, nor hold any discourses of philosophic: and to your selfe Epicurus first of all: Write not to your friends in Asia; enroll and gather no soldiors out of Argypt; have no commerce nor negotiate with them; do not protect and defend as it were with a guard from villanie and violence, the yoong gentlemen of Lampfacum; fend not your books abroad to all men and women alike, thereby to thew your learning; finally, ordeine nothing about your sepulture. To what tended your publicke tables ? what meant those affemblies that you made of your familiar friends and faire young boics; to what purpose were there so many thou-20 lands of verses written and composed so painfully by you in the honour of Metrodorus, Ariflobulus, & Charedemus, to the end that after death they should not be forgotten? Was all this because you would ratifie and establish vertue by oblivion; arts by doing nothing, philosophy by filence; and felicitie by forgetfulneffer Will you needs bereave mans life of knowledge, as if youwould take away light from a feast, to the end that me might not know that you & your followers do all for pleafure, & upon pleafure? then good reason you have to give counsell, & saie unto your felfe: Live unknowne. Certes, if I had a minde to leade my life with Hedia the harlot, or to keepe ordinarily about me, the strumpet Leontium; to detest all honestie; to repose all my delight and joy in the tickling pleasures of the slesh, and in wanton lusts: these ends verilie would require to be hidden in darkneffe, and covered with the shadow of the night; these be the 40 things that would be forgotten, and not once knowne: But if a man in the science of naturall philosophie, delight in hymnes and canticles to praise God, his justice and providence; or in morallknowledge, to fet out and commend the law, humane focietic, and the politike government of common-weale; and therein regard honour and honeftie, not profit and commodity; what reason have you to advise him for to live obscurely? Is it because he should teach none by good precept? is it for that no man should have a zealous love to vertue, or affect honestie by his example? If Themistocles had never beneknowne to the Athenians, Greece had not given Xerxes the foile and repulse; likewise if Camillus had beene unknowne to the Romanes, peradventure by this time Rome had been eno city at all; had not Dion knowne Plato, Sicilie thould not have been edelivered from tyrannie. But this is my conceit; that like as light effecteth thus 50 much, that we not onely know one another, but also are profitable one unto another; even so in my judgement, to be knowne abroad, bringeth not onely honor and glorie, but also meanes of emploiment in vertue: Thus Epaminondas unknowne unto the Thebanes, untill he was fortie yeeres old, stood them in no stead at all; but after that they tooke knowledge of him once, and had committed unto him the leading of their armie, he faved the citic of Thebes, which had like to have been loft, and delivered Greece, being in danger of fervitude; shewing in renowne and glorie (no leffe than in some cleere light) vertue producing her effects in due time : For according to the poet Sophoeles . By use it shineth

Not well said: Live hidden.

Like iron or braffe, that is both faire and bright So long as men doe handle it aright. In time alfo, an boufe goes to decay, And falleth downe if dweller be away.

whereas the very maners & natural conditions of a man be matted & corrupted, gathering as it were a mosse, & growing to age in doing nothing, through ignorance & obscurity. And verily a mute silence, a sedentaric life, retired a part in idlenesse, causeth not onely the bodie, but the mind also of man to languish & grow feeble: & like as dornant, or close & standing waters, for that they be covered, overshadowed, & not running, grow to putrific; even so, they that never stirre, nor be emploied, what good parts soever they have in them, if they put them not foorth, so nor exercise their natural and inbred faculties, corrupt quickly, and become old. See you not how when the night commeth on & approcheth neere, our bodies become more heavie, lumpish, and unsitt for any worke, our spirits more dull and lazie to all actions, and the discourse of our reason and understanding more drowsse and contracted within it selfe? like unto fire that is ready to goe out; and how the same by reason of an idlenesse and unwillingnesse commiting upon it, is somewhat troubled and disquieted with divers santastical imaginations; which observation advertiseth us daily after a secret and filent manner, how short the life of man is:

But when the funne with light some beames Dispatched hath these cloudy dreames,

after he is once rifen (and by mingling together the actions and cogitations of men with his 20 light; awakeneth and raifeth them up (as Democritus faith) in the morning, they make hafte jointly one with another upon a forren desire, as if they were compounded and knit with a certaine mutuall bond, some one way, and some another, rising to their serverall works and businesse. Certes, I am of advice, that even our life, our very nativity, yea & the participation of mankind is given us of God to this end: That we should know him; for unknowne he is and hidden in this great fabricke and univerfall frame of the world, all the while that hee goeth too and fro therein by small parcels and piece-meale: but when hee is gathered in himselfe, and growen to his greatnesse; then thineth hee and appeareth abroad, where before he lay covered; then is he manifest and apparent, where before he was obscure and unknowen; for knowledge is not the way to his effence, as fome would have it; but contrariwife, his effence is the way to knowledge; for that knowledge maketh not each thing, but onely fleweth it when it is done; like as 30 the corruption of any thing that is, may not be thought a transporting to that which is not, but rather a bringing of that which is diffolved to this paffe, that it appeareth no more: Which is the reason that according to the auncient lawes and traditions of our countrey, they that take the funne to be Apollo, give him the names of Delius and Pythius; and him that is the lord of the other world beneath, whether he be a god or a divell, they call Ades; for that when we are dead and dissolved, we goe to a certeine * obscuritie, where nothing is to be seene:

> Even to the prince of darknesse and of night The lord of idle dreames deceiving sight.

And I suppose that our auncestors in old time called man Phos, of light, for that there is in 40 every one of us, a vehement defire and love to know and be known one of another, by reason of the confanguinitie betweene us. And some philosophers there be, who thinke verily, that even the foule in her fubstance is a very light, whereunto they are ledde as welby other fignes & arguments, as by this, that there is nothing in the world that the foule hateth fo much as ignorance, rejecting all that is obscure and unlightsome; troubled also when she is entred into dark places, for that they fill her full of feare and fuspicion: but contrariwise, the light is so sweet and delectable unto her, that the taketh no joy and delight in any thing; otherwise lovely and defireable by nature, without light or in darkneffe; for that is it which caufeth all pleafures, sports, pastimes, & recreations to be more jocund, amiable, & to mans nature agreeable; like as a common fauce that seasoneth and commendeth al viands wherewith it is mingled: whereas he that 50 hath cast himselfe into ignorance, and is enwrapped within the clouds of mistie blindnesse, making his life a representation of death, and burying it as it were in darknesse, seemeth that he is weatie even of being, and thinketh life a very trouble unto him: and yet they are of opinion that the nature of glorie and effence, is the place affigned for the foules of godly, religious, and vertuous folke:

> To whom the funne shin's alwaies bright When heere with sust is darke night:

Not well said: Live hidden.

The medowes there, both faire and wide, With rofes red are beautified:
The fields all round about them dight With verdure, yeeld a pleafant fight:
All sapiffed with flowers full gay,
Of fruitfull trees, that bloffome ay:
Amid this place the rivers cleere
Runne foft and still, some there, some beere.

Wherein they paffethe time away, in calling to remembraunce and recounting that which is 10 paff, in difcourfing alfo of things prefent, accompanying one another, and converfing together. Now there is a third way, of those who have lived ill, and be wicked persons, the which sendeth their soules headlong into a darke gulfe and bottomlesse pit:

Where, from the dorman rivers bleak Of shadie night, thick mists doereak, As blacke as picch continually And those all round about doe slie.

enfolding, whelming, and covering those in ignorance and forgetfulnesse, who are tormented there and punished: for they be not greedy geters or vultures, that evermore eat and gnaw the liver of wicked persons said in the earth; and why? the same already is either burned or rotted:

20 neither be there certeine heavie sardels, or weightic burdens that pressed downe and overcharge the bodies of such as be punished:

For such thin ghosts and fibres small, Have neither slesh nor bone at all.

Ne yet are the reliques of their bodies who be departed, such as be capable of punishment, for that belongeth properly to a bodie that is solid and able to resist; but the onely way and true manner of chastising and punishing those, who have lived badly in this world, is infamie, ignorance, an entire abolition, and totall reducement to nothing, which bringeth them from the river Lethe, that is to say, Oblivion, into another mournfull river, where there is no mirth, no joy, nor cheerefulnesse, & from thence plungeth them into a vast sea, which hath neither shore 30 not bottom, even idlenesse and unaptuesse to all good, which can doe nought else but draw after it a generall forgetfulnesse and buriall (as it were) in all ignorance and infamous obscuritie.

RVLES AND PRECEPTS OF HEALTH IN MANER OF A DIALOGUE.

The Summarie.

He conjunction of the foule with the bodie being so straight, as every man knowes it is, I can not see how it is possible that the one should commit any disorder or excesse, but the other must needs be grieved therewith immediatly: And if there be anything that ought to be deplored and lamented, it is the losse of time, especially and above all, when the same is occasioned by our own intemperance; for that at such a time when as we should attend upon our dutie, we become and continue unprofitable, hurting many times both our selves and many others. Now for that the study of good literature requireth a soule well composed and governed in a sound, healthfull, and vigorous bodie; it is not without good cause, that Plutarch interminglesh among philosophicall discourses certeine rules & precepts as touching health. For in truth a vaine endevor & enterprise this were, and hardly could a man have his mind disposed to good things, in oise the bodie be ill assessment and missourced: But searing less it would be thought, that he who made profession of philosophic onely, proceeded farther than in reason hee ought, and brake the limits and bounds of sciences, in medling with physick heere : Before that he entreth into the Dialogue, when be had touched the occasion of this conference and talke; he shewerh: that the studie of physick is agree. able to philosophie : which done, herepresenteth certeine questions proposed by athird person, which fervein stead of a preface to those precepts and lessons, by him fet downe afterwards; not following heerein any exact or exquisit method, but making choise of that which he thought to be most meet for the time, and luting best to those persons, for whose sake this Dialogue was written. He speaketh first therefore of the use of meats, especially such as are sweet and pleasing to the tooth: also what aman is to take heed of in this behalfe: Then he treateth of the pleasures of the bodie, declaring what measure therein we ought to keepe, and discovering by a certaine similitude, the permitious indiscretion of those 10 who love to keepe good cheere and mainteine dainty fare. Consequently heereupon, he forbiddeth us to use bodily pleasures unlesse we be in good and perfect health; condemneth fulnesse and overmuch repletion, which is the cause of most diseases that are incident tomans body, and this he carichethand amplifieth by another proper similitude. He is desirous also that maladies were foreseene and prevented, letting downe a speciall remedie therefore, and prooving, that the body cannot enjoy any delight what forver, either in eating or drinking, in case it be not healthy. From this he proceedeth to make mention of diet, and of the prognostikes of diseases breeding and soward. Icm, how, and wherewith the maladies of our friends ought to ferve and stead us; adding thus much moreover; that for the better maintenance and preservation of health, a man is not to feed to satietie; that he ought to trawell and not spare himselfer, also that he is to save his naturall seed: upon this he discourseth of the ex- 20 ercife and nounfhment of students and scholars, desciphring particularly what soever in this point is most woorth the noting and observation, and so cleereth this question, namely; Whether it be hollome for the body to dispute either at the table, or presently upon meat: After all this, he treateth of walking. of fleepe, of vomiting, of purgations of the belly, of diets over exquisit and precise; condemning expresly idlenesse, as a thing contrary to the good disposition of the body. Furthermore, he seweth when a manough: to be at quiet and rest; as also the time that he may give himselfe to pleasure: but above all be requireth of every man; that he learne to know his owne nature and inclination, as also the meats and drinks that be agreeable unto his stomack: exhorting in the end all students to spare their bodies, to looke unto them, and make much of them, that they may have the better meanes to proceed and goe forward in the knowledge of good letters, whereby they might another day be profitable members of ze the common-wealth, and doe more good to the focietie of men.

RULES AND PRECEPTS OF health in maner of a dialogue.

The personages speaking in this dialogue: Moschion and Zeuxippus.

Moschion,

Nd did you then indeed (my friend Zexippus) turne away Glaucus the physician yesterday, who was desirous to conferre with us in philosophie?

ZEUXIPPUS.

No iwis, (good Moschion) neither did I put him away; desirous was he to doc as you fay: But this was it that I avoided and feared, namely: To give him any advantage or occasion to fastenupon 50 me, and take hold on me, knowing him as I doe to be litigious and quarrelfome: for in physick, if I may use the words of Homer:

He may well stand for many a one,

Although he be but one alone. As for philosophie, he is not wel affected thereto, but alwaies provided of some shrewd & bitter tearmes against her in all his disputations, and as then especially; for I observed how he came directly against us, crying out upon us a farre off with a loud voice, & charging us; that we had to enterprise a great matter, and the same not very civill & honest, and in that we had broken the bounds, and pluckt up (as a man would fay) the very limit-marks of fciences, laying alleonion, and making a confusion of them, in disputing as we did of holfome diet, and of the maner how tolive in good health. For the confines and frontiers (quoth he) of Physicians and Philotophers, are (as we use to fay in the vulgar proverbe, as touching Mysians and Phrygians) fare different, and remooved a funder: Moreover, he had readily in his mouth certaine speeches and fentences of ours, which we delivered by way of pastime onely, and yet for all that, were not impertinent or unprofitable, and those he would feeme to controule, reproove, and scome.

Мовсніом.

But I for my part (ô Zeuxippus) could be very well content, yea, and most desirous to heare, even those speeches that he mocked, as others beside, which yee had concerning this matter, if to be it might stand with your pleasure to rehearse the same.

ZEU.XIPPUS.

I thinke no leffe (ô Moschion) for that you are enclined naturally to philosophie, and thinke not well of that philosopher who is not well affected to physicke, but are displeased and offended with him; in case (I say) he suppose it more meet and beseeming for him to be seene studying Geometrie, Logicke, or Musicke, than willing to enquire and learne

What rule at home in house, what worke there is,

How things doe stand, what goes well, what amis? 30 When I say, athome, I meane in his owne body; and yet a man shall see ordinarily, what a number more there be of spectators at Theaters, where there is some publick dole or free distribution of money to those that are affembled to see the games and pastimes, as the manner is at Athens, than otherwise. Now of all the liberall sciences, Physicke is one, which as it giveth place to none whatfoever, in beautie, in outward fliew, and in pleafure or delight; fo it alloweth agreat reward and falarie unto those that love it, even as much as their life and health comes to; and therefore we are not to accuse and charge Philosophers, who discourse and dispute of matters concerning like regiment of health, for paffing beyond their bounds and confines: but rather we ought to blame them, if they thinke that they thould plucke up altogether, and take away those land-marks, to labor (asit were) in some common field betweene them and Physici-30 ans, in the fludy & contemplation of things good and honeft, aiming & feeking in al their difputations and discourses, after that which is both pleasant to know & necessarie to understand.

Moschion. But let us I pray you (ô Zeuxippu) leave Glaucus to himfelfe, who for the gravity which he carieth, would be accounted a man in all points accomplished without anie need at all of Philofophies helpe; and recount unto me (if you please) all those speeches which you had, especially atfirst, those I meane which you said were not spoken in earnest, and yet were scorned and reprooved by Glaucus.

Zeuxippus. I will, and that right willingly. This friend of ours therefore delivered thus much; how 40 he heard one fay: That to have ones hands alwaies warme, and never fuffer them to be cold, was no small meanes to the preservation of health: but contrariwife, to have ordinarily the extreme parts of the body cold, drove heat inwardly into the center of the body, and brought us to a certeine familiaritie and acquaintance with a feaver; as also, to turne and drive with out foorth together with heat the matter thereof, and to distribute the same equally throughout the whole bodie, was an holfome thing; as we fee by experience, that if we occupie our hands, and doe fomeworke with them, the verie motion exciteth and flirreth up, yea, and maintaineth naturall heat: but if we have no fuch bufineffe or imployment for them, but hold them fill and idle, yet for all that we are not to admit or enterteine cold in those extreme parts of the bodie: This (I fay) was one of the points that Glances laughed at. The fecond (as I take it) was touch-50 ing the means that yee use to give unto sicke persons: For that hee counselled men (in time of health) to tafte the same by little and little; so as they might bee acquainted therewith, to the end that they should not abhorre and lothe them (as little children use to doe) nor hate such a kind of diet; but make the same in some fortafter a gentle manner, familiar unto their appetite; that (when foever it hapned they were ficke) fuch viands might not go against their stomacks, as if they were Phylicke drougues or medicines, out of the apothecaries shoppe: also, that we should not be offended and discontent, otherwhiles to feed upon one single dish and no more, and the same without any sauce to draw it on, or fine dressing and handling by cooks crast, to commendit. For which cause he would not have men thinke it strange, to come now and then to the table, without being at the baine or hot-house before; nor to drinke sheere water, when wine is upon the bourd, nor to forbeare to drinke our drinke hot in summer time, although there be fnow fet before us to coole it. Provided alwaies, that this abstinence proceed not from any ambitious oftentation and vain-glory, or because we would vaunt and make our boast thereof afterward; but that we doe it apart by our felves, making no words thereof, and accustome by little and little our appetite to obey reason willingly, and to be ruled by that which is good and profitable, by weaning our mindes(long before) from that ferupulous curiofitie, daintie niceneffe, and waiward complaints, about these matters in time of sicknesse; when common-Iv we are ready to whine and lament, for that wee miffe those our former pleasures, and great to delights, which we were woont to enjoy, and see our selves brought to a more base kinde of diet, and a straighter rule of life. For a good faying it was: Chuse the best life simply that is; use and custome will make it pleasing and agreeable unto thee: the which by good proofe and experience hath beene found profitable in all things, but principally in the regard and care of our bodies (as touching diet,) which in time of best health ought to be ordered so by use and cuflome, that the fame may become kinde, familiar, and agreeable to our nature; and namely by calling to minde that which others are woont to doe and fay in their ficknesse, how they sume and chafe, how they fare and goe to worke when hot water is brought unto them for to drinke, or warme brothes to be supped, or drie-bread to be caten; how they call these, untoward, naugh. tie, and unfavorie victuals, yea and name those, cursed and odious persons, who would seeme 20 to force the fame upon them for to eat or drinke. Manie there have beene, who had their bane by baines, fuch as ailed not much at the first, and were not very ficke at the beginning; onely they had brought themselves to this passe, that they could neither cat nor drinke, unlesse they were first bathed, or had sweat in a stouph: among whom, Titus the emperour of Rome was one, as they were able to tellifie who had the cure of him when he lay ficke. It was faid more. ver: That alwaies viands most simple, and such as cost least, were hollomest for the bodie; also that above all things, men ought to beware of repletion, of drunkennesse and voluptuous life; especially, when there is some festivall day toward, wherein they use to make exceeding cheere; or when they purpose to invite their friends to a great dinner, or otherwise looke to be bidden themselves to some roiall feast of a king or lord generall, or else to a banket, where they shall be 30 put to quaffe and carrouse in their turne, which they may not refuse to do: against such times(I fay) they ought to prepare their bodies beforehand, as it were whiles the weather is calme and faire, and make it more fresh and lightsome, yea, and better able to abide the storme and tempest toward: for a very hard matter it is in such assemblies, and seasts of great lords or deere friends, for aman to flay himfelfe in a meane, and mainteine his accustomed sobrietie; but he shall be thought uncivill, unmanerly, infociable, too austere and odious to all the company. To the end therefore that we should not put fire to fire (as they say) lay gorge upon gorge, surfet upon surfet, and wine upon wine, good it were to imitate and follow in good earnest that which was formetime merily done by king Philip, and that was this: A certaine man invited him upon a time to a supper, into the countrey, thinking that hee would come with a small compa-40 ny about him; but feeing that he brought a great traine and retinue with him, and knowing wel that he had prepared no more then would ferve for a few guests; he was woonderfully troubled; Philip perceiving it, sent underhand to every one of his friends that came with him, this word: That they should keepe a roome in their stomacks for a deintie tart or cate that was comming: they beleeving this meffage in good fadnesse, made spare of other viands that stood before them, looking evermore when this deintie should be served up, in such fort, as that the meat provided was fufficient for the whole companie; even fo we ought before-hand to be prepared against the time that we are to be at such great feasts and meetings aforesaid, where we shall be put to it perforce, to drinke round in our turne, and to answer every ones chalenge, to referue(1 fay) a place in our bodies, both for meats and also for fine cates, and junketting dishes: yearand 50 beleeve me, if need be, for drunkennesse, and thither to bring an appetite fresh and readie for fuch things. But if peradventure fuch constraints and compulsions surprise us upon a sudden, when we are either full and heavie, or ill at ease, for that we have a little before over-eaten and drunk our felves; in case (I say) some great lords be come to us, or in place unexpected, or haply a friend or stranger take us at unawares, and unprovided, so that we be forced for shame to keepe others company, who are well enough disposed in body, and prepared for to drinke and make merry; then must we be especially well armed against soolish bashfulnesse, and to meet with fuch bad shamefastnesse is the cause of so many evils among men; and namely, by alledging and saying these verses of king Creen in a tragedie of Euripides:

Better it were for me, you to displease My friend, than at this time, for your content, To give my selfe to pleasure and mine ease, But after, with great sorrow to repent.

For to cast a mans selfe into a pleurisie or phrensie, for feare to be held and reputed rustical and uncivill, is the part of a rude clowne in deed, and of one who hath neither wit nor judgement, no vet any skill or speech to enterteine and keepe companie with men, unlesse they may be drunto ken and engorge themselves like gluttons for the very refusall it selfe of eating and drinking, if it be handled with dexteritie and a good grace, will be no leffe acceptable to the companie, than drinking square and carrowfing round. And if the man who maketh a feast, ablteine himfelfe, though he fit at the table (as the maner is at a factifice whereof he tafteth not) enterteining his guests with a cheerefull countenance and a friendly welcome, and whiles the cups and trenchers walke about him, be disposed to mirth and cast out some pretie jests of himselie, he shall no leffe content and please his guests, than he that will seeme to be drunken for companie, and cram his bellie with them, till it be readie to cracke. To this purpose he made mention of certeine ancient examples; and namely (among other) of Alexander the Great, who after he had drunke well and liberally, was abathed and athamed to denie the challenge of Medius, one 20 of his captaines, who had invited him to supper; and thereupon (falling againe to drinke wine afresh) died thereof. And of those who lived in our daies, he spake of one Riglis, a notable Pancratiaft or champion at all feats of activitie, whom Titus Cafar the emperour, fent for one day betimes in the morning to come and bathe with him, who came indeed, and after he had bathed and had drunke a great draught, was (by report) furprifed with an Apoplexic, whereupon he diedimmediatly. All these matters, our Physician Glaucymocked and reprooved, calling them discourses of schoolemasters to children their scholars: and as he was not very willing to heate more, so were not we greatly desirotis to relate and discourse farther unto him; for that he had no mind to confider ech thing accordingly that was delivered. Socrates verily, who was the first that debarred us from eating those meats which drew us on to eat more still when we were not 20 hungry nor had a stomacke thereto; and from drinking such drinks which caused us to drinke, although we were not drie and thirftie; forbad us not fimply to use meats and drinks, but taught us rather to use them onely when we had need of them, joining the pleasure of them with their necessitie; like as they do, who employ the publicke money of cities (which before was wont to bespent at Theaters, in exhibiting plaies and showes) about the charges of mainteining souldiers for the warres: for that which is fweet, so long as it is a part of our nourishment, we hold to be proper and familiar to nature; and we ought all the whiles that we be hungry, to use and enjoy neceffarie nourishment, as sweet and pleasant; but otherwise not to stirre and provoke other new and extraordinarie appetites apart, after that we are delivered from those that be common and ordinarie: for like as unto Socrates himselfe, dancing was no unpleasant exercise; even so 40 he who maketh his whole supper or meale of junkets and banketting dishes, catcheth lesse harme thereby: but when a man hath taken alreadic as much as is sufficient to content nature, and wherewith he is well fatisfied, he ought to beware as much as in any thing els, how he putteth forth his hands to any fuch dainties. And we are to flie and avoid in these things, follie and ambition, no lesse than friandise or gluttonie : for these two vices induce us likewise often times to cat fome thing when we are not hungrie, and to drinke also when we be not athirst; yea, and they fuggest and minister unto us certeine base and extravagant imaginations, to wit, that it were great simplicitie, and a very absurd thing, not to feed liberally of a rare, deere and gealon dith, if it may be had; as for example: That which is made of a fowespappes when the is newly farrowed, Italian mushroomes, Samian cakes, or snow out of Aegypt; for these toics and imagi-50 nations finelling formewhat of vain-glorie as the fent of meat comming out of a kitchin, manie times fet our teeth a watering and our stomacke on edge to use them, forcing the bodie (which otherwise would not seeke after them) to participate thereof, onely because they be much spoken of and hard to come by; to the end that we make our report and recount unto others, what wee have done, and be reputed by them right happic and fortunate; for that wee have enjoied things, so decre, so singular and so gcason. The like affection they cary to women also of great name and reputation: for it falleth out, that having their owne wives in bedde with them, and thosefaire and beautifull dames, such also as love them deerely, they lie still and stirre not; but if they meet with any courtifan, fuch as Phryne or Lais was, unto whom they have paied good filver out of their purfe, though otherwise their bodies be unable, dull and heavie in performing the worke of Venus, yet doing they will be, what they can, and fraine themselves upon a vaineglorious ambition, to provoke and stirre up their lascivious lust unto sleshly pleasure: whereupon Phryneherselfe, being now old and decaied, was woont to say: That she sold her lees and dregs the deerer, by reason of her reputation.

A great thing it is and wonderfull, that if we receive into our bodies as many pleafures as nature doth require or can well beare; or rather, if upon divers occasions and businesses, we result her appetites, and put her off unto another time, and that we be loth and hardly brought to yeeld unto her necessities, or (according as Plato faith) give place, after that she hath by fine force pricked and urged us thereto, we should not suffer for all that, any harme thereby, but goe away freely without any loffe or detriment: but on the other fide, if we abandon our felves to the defires that descend from the soule to the bodie, so farre foorth as they force us to minister unto the paffions thereof, and rife up together with them, impossible it is, but that they should leave behinde them exceeding great losses and damages, in stead of a few pleasures, and those feeble and fmall in appearance, which they have given unto us: and this above all things would be confidered, that we take heed how we provoke the body to pleasures, by the lusts of the minde; for the beginning thereof is against nature. For like as the tickling under the arme-holes, pro. cureth unto the foule a laughter, which is not proper, milde and gentle, but rather troublesome and refembling some spasme or convulsion; even so all the pleasures which the bodie receiveth 20 when it is pricked and provoked by the foule, be violent, forced, turbulent, furious and unnaturall. Whenfoever therefore any occasion shall present it selfe to enjoy such rare and notable delights, it were better for us to take a glorie in the abilinence, rather than in the fruition there. of, calling to minde that which Simonides was woont to fay: That he never repented any filence of his, but often times he beshrewed himselfe for his speech; and even so we never repent that we have refused any viands, or drunke water in flead of good Falerne wine. And therefore we ought not onely, not to force nature, but if other-whiles we be ferved with fuch cates and meats as the craveth, we are to divert our appetite from the fame, and to reduce it to the use of simple and ordinary things many times, even for custome and exercise:

If right and law may broken be, for any earthly thing, . The best pretense is for to win a crowne, and be a king.

So faid Ereceles the Thebane, though untruely: but we may better fay: If we must be ambitious and defirous of glorie in fuch things as thefe, it were most honest and commendable to use continence and temperance for the preservation of health. Howbeit, some there be, who upon an illiberall pinching and mechanicall sparing, can restraine and keepe downe their appetites when they be at home in their owne houses; but if it chance they be bidden foorth to others, they gorge and fill their bellies with these exquisit and costly viands; much like to those, who in time of warre and hostilitie, raise booties, and prey upon the lands of their enemies what they can; 40 and when they have so done, they goe from thence illat case, carrying away with them for the morrow (upon this their fulneffe and unfatiable repletion) crudity of fromacke and indigeffion. Crates therefore, the philosopher thinking; that civill warres and tyrannies arise and grow up in cities, as well by reason of superfluity and excesse in dainty fare, as upon any other cause whatfoever, was woont by way of mirth, to give admonition in these tearmes: Take heed you bring us not into a civill sedition, by augmenting the platter alwaies before the Lentil: that is to say, by dispending more than your revenues will beare. But in deed, every man ought to have this command and rule of himselse, as to say: Augment not evermore the platter before the Lentil, nor at any time passe beyond the Cresses and the Olive, even to fine tarts and delicate fishes, lest you bring your bodie into a domesticall diffention afterwards with it felfe; namely, to painfull 50 colickes, lasks, and fluxes of the bellie, by over-much fulneffe and exceffe of feeding: for fimple viands and ordinarie, conteine the appetite within the bounds and compaffe of nature; but the artificiall devices of cooks and cunning fellowes in pastry, with their curious cates of all forts, with their exquisit fances and pickles (as the comicall Poet faith) set out and extend alwaies the limits of pleature, encroching still beyond the bounds of utilitie and profit. And I wot not verily, how it comes about, that confidering we so much detest and abhorre those women, who give love-drinks, and can skill of charmes and forceries to be witch and enchant men with, we betake thus as wedo, unto mercenarie hirelings or flaves, our meats and viands, to be medicined (asitwere) and no better than poisoned for to enchant and bewitch us. And admir, that the faying of Arcefilate the Philosopher, against adulterers and other lascivious persons, may seeme fomewhat with the bittereft; namely: that it made no great matter, which way one went about that beaftly worke, whether before or behinde, for that the one was as bad as the other; yet impertinent it is not, nor befide the subject matter which we have in hand. For to fay a true th, what difference is there betweene eating of Ragwort, Rogker, and fuch hot herbs, for to furre up the luft of the flesh, and to provoke the talte and appetite to meat by smelles and sauces ? like as mangie and itching places have alwaies need of rubbing and feratching. But peradventure it no would be better, to referve unto another place, our difeourte against dishonest fleship pleasures, and to flew how honest and venerable a thing in it selfe, is continence: for our purpose at this present, is to debarre many great pleasures, otherwise in their owne nature honest; for I assure you, our difeases doe not put us by so many actions, so many hopes, voiages or patlimes, as they deprive us of our pleafures, yea, and marre them quite; and therefore they who love their delights and pleasures most, had least need of any men in the world, to neglect their health. For many there be, who for all they be ficke, have meanes to studie philosophy, and discourse thereof : neither doth their ficknesse greatly hinder them, but that they may be generals in the field

But of bodily pleasures and flethly delights, some there be which during a maladie will never nobreed; and fuch as are bred already, yeeld but a finall joy, and fhort contentment, which is proper and naturall unto them, and the fame not pure and fincere, but confused, depraved and corrupted with much ftrange ftuffe, yea and difguifed and blemished as it were, with some forme and tempest: for the act of Venus is not to any purpose performed upon gourmandise and a full belly, but rather when the bodie is calme, and the fleth in great tranquillity; for that the end of Venus is pleasure, like as of eating also and of drinking; and health unto pleasures, is as much as their faire weather and kinde feafon, which giveth them fecure and gentle breeding, much like as the calme time in winter affoords the fea-fowles called Aleyones, a fafe cooving, fitting and hatching of their egges. Producus is commended for this pretie speech: That fire was the belt fauce; and a man may most truely fay: That health is of all fauces must divine, heavenly and pleasant: for our viands how delicate soever they be, boiled, rosted, baked or stewed, 30 doeno pleasure at all unto us, so long as wee are diseased, drunken, full of surfet, or queasie stomacked, as they be who are fea-ficke; whereas a pure and cleane appetite caufeth all things to befiveer, pleafant, and agreeable unto found bodies, yea, and fuch as they, will be ready to fnatch at, as Homer faith. But like as Demades the oratour, feeing the Athenians without all reason, delitous of armes and warre, faid unto them: That they never treated and agreed of peace, but in their blacke robes, after the losse of kinsfolke and friends; even so wee never remember to keepe a spary and sober diet, but when we come to be cauterized, or to have cataplasmes and plasters about us: we are no sooner fallen to those extremities, but then we are ready to condemneour faults, calling to minde what errours we have committed in times past; for untill 40 then, we blame one while the aire, as most men doe; another while the region or countrey, as unfound and unholfome; we finde fault that we are out of our native foile, and are woonderfull loth to accuse our owne intemperance and disordinate appetites. And as king Lisymachus being conftreined and enforced within the country of the Getes for very thirst to yeeld himselfe prisoner, and all his armie captivate unto his enemies; after he had taken a draught of cold water, faid: Good God, what a great felicitie have I forgone and loft, for a momentarie and transitory pleafure! even fo we may make use thereof, and apply the same unto our selves when wee are licke, faying thus: How many delights have we marred quite? how many good actions have we fore-let? what honest pastimes have we lost? and all by our drinking of cold water, or bathing unicasonably, or else for that we have over drunke our selves for good fellowship; for the bite &50 fling of fuch thoughts as thefe, toucheth our remebrance to the quicke, in fuch fort as the fearre remaineth still behind, after that we are recovered, and maketh us in time of our health more flaied, circumspect, and sober in our diet: for a bodie that is exceeding found and healthy, never bringeth foorth vehement defires, and difordinate appetites, hardly to be tamed or with flood; but we ought to make head againft them, when they beginne to breake foorth and fling out for to enjoy the pleasures which they are affected unto; for such lusts, some complaine, pule, and crie for a little, as wanton children doe, and no sooner is the table taken awaie, but they be quiet and still; neither finde they fault and make complaint of any wrong or injurie Fff 3 offred unto them: but contrariwife, they be pure, jocund, and lightfome, not continuing heavic, nor readic to heave and cast, the next day to an end: like as by report, captaine Timotheres (having upon a time beene at a fober and frugall scholars supper, in the academie with Plato) faid: That they who supped with Plato were merry and well appaied the next day after. It is teported also, that king Alexander the Great when he turned backe those cooks which queene Addent unto him, faid: That he had about him all the yeere long better of his owne, namely. for his breakfast or dinner, rifing betimes, and marching before day light; and for his supper, cating liede at dinner. I am not ignorant that men otherwhiles are very apt to fall into an ague upon extreme travell, upon excellive heats also and colds; but like as the odors and fents of thowers be weak & feeble of themselves; whereas if they be mixed with some oile, they take force to and vigor; even to fulneffe and repletion is the ground, which giveth(as a man would fay)bodie and buttance unto the outward cautes, and occasions of maladies; and of a great quantity of suparalhous humours there is no danger, because all fuch indispositions and crudities are some orientical, diffipated, and diffolved, when fome fine or fubtill bloud, when fome pure fairly (1) to prescive the their motion: but where there is a great repletion indeed, and abundance of firsocialistics, (as it were a deepe and miric puddle all troubled and flirred) then there arise from stance many maligne accidents, fuch as be dangerous and hard to cure: and therefore we are test to doe like fome good mafters of fhips who never thinke their veffels beefully fraught and charged throughly; and when they have taken in all that ever they can, doe nothing elfe but worke at the pumpe, void the finke, and cast out the sea water which is gotten in; even so 20 when we have well filled and fluffed our bodies, fall to purge and cleanfe them with medicines analelitiers: but we ought rather to keepe the bodie alwaies neat, nimble, and light, to the end, that if it channed otherwise at any time to be pressed and held downe, it might be seene above for lightneffelike unto a piece of corke floting aloft upon the water: but principally we are to beware of the very precedent indispositions, which are forerunners of maladies: for all diseates walke not (as Hefedus faith) in filence and fay nothing when they come,

As whom wife Jupiter hath bereft

Of voice, and toong to them none left. But the most part of the have their vant-curreurs as it were, their messengers, & trumpets; namethe crudities of fromack, wearinesse and heavinesse over all the bodie. According to the Apho- 20 The of Hypecrates; laffitudes and laborious heavinesse of the bodie, comming of themselves with outany evident cause, prognosticate and fore-figniste diseases; for that as it should seeme, the parits that should passe unto the nerves and sinewes, are obstructed, stopped, and excluded, by the great repletion of humors: and albeit the bodie it felfe tendeth as it were to the contrarie, and pulleth us to our bedde and repose, yet some there be, who for very gluttony and disordinate luft, put themselves into baines & hot-houses, making haste from thence, to drinking fquare with good fellowes, as if they would make provision before-hand of victuals against fome long fiege of a citie, or feare that the feaver should surprise them falling, or before they had taken their full dinner:others formwhat more honest, yea & civill than they, are not this way Lankie, but being a finamed (fooles as they are) to confesse that they have eaten or drunke over-40 much, that they feele any heavineffe in head or cruditie in flomacke, loth also to be known for to keepe their chamber all the day long in their night gownes, whiles their companions goe to tennis and other bodily exercises abroad in publicke place, and call them foorth to beare them companie, rile up and make them ready to goe with them, cast off their clothes to their naked skunne, with others, and put themselves to doeall that men in perfect health are to performe. But the most part of these (induced and drawen on, by hope perswaded) are bold to arise, and to doe hardly after their wonted maner, affifted by a certaine hope, grounded upon a proverbe; as an advocate to defend gourmandife, and wanton life, which advifeth them that they should expell wine with wine; drive or digeft one furfeit with another. Howbeit, against all such hope, searc to oppose the warie and confiderat caution, that Cato speaketh of (which as that wise 50 with faith) doth diminish and lessen great things; and as for small matters it reduces them to nothing: also that it were better to endure want of meat, and to keepe the bodie emptie and in quiet, than fo to hazard it, by entring into a baine, or runne to an high ordinarie to dine and top: for if there be fome disposition to sicknesse, hurtfull it will be that we have not taken heed, nor conteined our felves, but been efecure: if none, dangerous it will not be that we have held in and restrained our selves, and by that restraint made our body so much more pure and cleare. Burthar childith foole who soever he be, that is a fraid to let his friends and those of his owne house know that he is amisse or ill at ease, for that he hath eaten overmuch, or surfeited with flrong drinke, as being afhamed to confesse this day his indigestion, shall be forced to morrow even against his will, to bewray either an inordinate catarth and fluxe, or an ague, or else some wrings and torments of the belly: thou takest it for a great shame to be known that thou didst want or were hungry; but farre greater shame it is to avow crudity and rawnesse, to bewray heavinesse, proceeding from full diet, and upon repletion of the bodie to be drawen neverthelesse into a baine, as if some rotten vessell or leaking shippe, that would not keepe out water, should be shot into the sea. Certes such persons as these, resemble some failers or sea-faring men, who in the tempessuous time of winter, be ashamed to be seene upon the shore doing nothing: but when they have once weighed anker, fpred faile, and launched into the deepe, and open fea, they are very illappaied, crying out pitcoully, and ready to cast up their gorge: even so, they that doubt some ficknesse, or finde a disposition of the bodie ready to fall into it, thinke it a great shame and discredit, to stand upon their guard, one day to keepe their beds and forbeare their ordinarie table and accustomed diet: but afterwards with more shame, they are saine to lie by it many daies together, whiles they be driven to take purgations, to applie many cataplafmes, to speake the physicians faire, and fawne upon them, when they would have leave of them to drinke wine or cold water; being so base minded, as to doe abfurdly, and to speake many words impertinently, feeling their hearts to faile, and be ready to faint, for the paine they endure alreadie, and the feare they are in to abide more. Howbeit, very good it were to teach and 20 admonith fuch persons (as otherwise cannot rule and conteine themselves, but either yeeld, or be transported and carried away by their lusts) that their pleasures take the most and best part of thebodie for their share. And like as the Lacedæmonians after that they had given vinegar and falt to the cooke, willed him to feeke for the relt in the beaft facrificed; even fo in a bodie which one would nourifh, the best fauces for the meat are these, which are presented unto it, when it is found in health and cleane. For that a dish of meat is sweet or deere, is a thing by it felfe, without the bodie of him who taketh it, and eateth thereof: but for the pleafantneffe or contentment thereof, we ought to have regard unto the body that receiveth it; also for to delight therein, it should be so disposed as nature doth require; for otherwise, if the body be troubled, ill affected, or overcharged with wine; the best devices and sauces in the world will lose 20 their grace, and all their goodnesse whatsoever: and therefore it would not be so much looked unto, whether the fifth be new taken, the bread made of pure and fine flowre, the bathe hot, or the harlot faire and beautifull; as confidered precifely, whether the man himfelfe have not a lothing flomacke, apt to heave and vomit, be not full of crudities, error, vanity, and trouble: elicit will come to paffe, that the shall incurre the same fault and absurditie that they doe, who after they are drunken, will needs goe in a maske, to plaie and daunce in an house, where they all mourne for the death of the mafter thereof lately deceafed: for in flead of making sport and mirth, this were enough to fet all the house upon weeping, and piteous wailing. For even fo, the sports of love or Venus, exquisit ulands, pleasant baines, and good wines, in a bodie ill disposed and not according to nature, doe no other good, but stirre, trouble sleame and 40 and choler in them, who have no fetled and compact constitution, and yet be not altogether corrput; as also they trouble the body, and put it out of tune more than any thing else, yeelding no joy that we may make any reckoning of, nor that contentment which wee hoped and expected. True it is, that an exquifit dict observed streightly and precisely according to rule, and miffing not one jot, canfeth not onely the bodie to be thinne, hollow, and in danger to fall into many difeates; but also dulleth all the vigor, and daunteth the cheerefulnesse of the verie mind, in fuch fort, as that the fulpecteth all things, and feareth continually to flay long as well in delights and pleasures, as in travels and paines; yea, and generally in every action enterprising nothing affiredly and with confidence: whereas we ought to deale by our body, as with the faile of aships (that is to fay) neither to draw it in & keepe it down too straight in time of calme & faire 50 meather, nor to spred and let it out over flacke and negligently, when there is presented some supicion of a tempest; but as occasion shall require, to spare it, and give some ease and remission, that afterwards it may be fresh and lightsome, as hath beene faid already, and not to slacke the time, and ftay untill we fenfibly feele, crudities, laskes, inflamations; or contrariwife, ftupidities and mortifications of members, by which fignes (being as it were meffengers, and uthers going before a feaver, which is hard at the dore) hardly wil fome be fo much moved, as to keepe in, and restraine themselves, (no not when the very accesse and fit is readie to surprise them) but rather long before to be provident, and to prevent a tempest:

So soone as from some rocke we finde The puffing gales of northern winde.

For abfurd it is, and to no purpose, to give such carefull heed unto the crying wide throates of crowes, or to the craing and cackling of hennes, or to fwine, when in a rage they toffe and fling strawabout them (as Democritus faith) thereby to gather prefages, & prognostications of wind raine, and stormes; and in the meane time not to observe the motions, troubles, and fiering indispositions of our bodie, nor prevent the same, ne yet to gather undoubted signes of a tempeft ready to rise and grow even out thereof. And therefore we ought, not onely to have an cie unto the bodie, for meat and drinke, and for bodily exercises, in observing whether we fall unto them more lazily and unwillingly than our manner was before time; or contrariwife whe. 10 ther our hunger and thirst be more than ordinary; but also wee are to suspect and feare, if our fleeps be not milde, and continued, but broken & interrupted : we must besides, regard our very dreames; namely, whether they be strange and unusuall: for if there be represented extraordi. narie fansies and imaginations, they testifie and shew a repletion of groffe, viscuous or slimy humours, and a great perturbation of the spirits within. Otherwhiles also it hapneth, that the motions of the foule it felfe, doe fore fignific unto us, that the body is in some neere danger of disease: for many times men are surprised with timorous fittes of melancholy, and heartlesse distrusts without any reason or evident cause, the which suddenly extinguish all their hopes: you shall have some upon every small occasion apt to fa linto cholerick passions of anger; they become eager and hastie, troubled, pensive and offended with a little thing, infomuch as they 20 will be ready to weepe and runne all to teares, yea and languish for griefe and sorrow: And all this commeth, when evill vapours, fowre and bitter fumes ingendred within, doe arise and fleeme up, and so (as Plato faith) be intermingled in the waies and passages of the soule. Those persons therefore who are subject to such things, ought to thinke and consider with themfelves; that if there be no spirituall cause thereof, it cannot chuse but some corporall matter had need either of evacuation, alteration, or suppression.

Expedient also it is and very profitable for us, when we visit our friends that be sicke, to enquire diligently the causes of their maladies, not upon a cavilling curiofity or vaine oftentation, (to dispute sophistically, and discourse thereof only, or to make a shew of our eloquence, in talking of the inflances, the infults, the intercidences, communities of difeases, and all to shew 30 what books we have read, & that we know the words & tearmes of physick;) but to make fearch and enquirie in good earnest, and not slightly or by the way, as touching these slight common and vulgar points, namely, whether the ficke partie be full or emptie? whether he overtravelled himselfe before, or no? and whether heslept well or ill? but principally, what diet he kept? and what order of life he followed, when he fell (for examples fake) into the ague: then (according as Plate was woont to fay unto himselfe, whensoever he returned from hearing and seeing the faults that other men committed:) Am not I also such an one ? so you must compose and frame your selfe to learne by the harmes and errours of neighbours about you, for to looke well unto your owne health, and by calling them to mind, to be fo wary & provident, that you fall not into the same inconveniences, and forced to keepe your bed, and there extol & commend health, 40 withing & defiring (when it is too late) for to enjoy fo pretious a treasure; but rather (seeing another to have caught a discase) to marke and consider well, yea, and to enterteine this deepe impression in your heart; how deere the said health ought to be unto us, how carefull we should be to preserve, and chary to spare the same. Moreover, it would not be amisse for a man, afterwards to compare his owne life with that of the foresaid patient: for if it fall out so, that (notwithstanding we have used over-liberall diet both in drinks and meats, or laboured extreamly, or otherwile committed errour in any excesse and disorder) our bodies minister unto nature no suspition, nor threaten any figne of ficknesse toward; yet ought we neverthelesse, to take heed and prevent the harme that may enfue; namely; if we have committed any diforder in the pleafures of Venus and love delights; or otherwise bene over-travelled, to repose our selves and take our qui-50 et rest; after drunkennesse or carrowsing wine round for good fellowship, to make amends and recompense with drinking as much colde water for a time; but especially, upon a surfeit taken with eating heavie and groffe meats, and namely, of flesh, or els feeding upon fundry and divers dishes, to fast or use a sparie diet, so as there be left no superfluitie in the bodie: for even these things, as of themselves alone (if there were no more) be enough to breed diseases; so unto other causes they adde matter and minister more strength. Full wisely therefore was it said by our ancients in old time, that for to mainteine our health, these three points were most expedient : To feed without satisfie: To labour with alacritie : and To preserve and make space of naturall feed. For furely lascivious intemperance in venerie of all things, most decate thand enseebleth the strength of that naturall heat, whereby our meat and food which we receive is concocted, and so consequently is the cause of many excrements and superfluities engendred, whereupon corrupt humours are engendered and gathered within the body.

To begin therefore to speake againe of every of these points; let us consider first the exercifes meet and agreeable to students or men of learning : for like as he who first faid: That he wrot nothing of Teeth to those that inhabited the sea coasts, taught them (in so saying) the use of them; even so a man may fay unto scholars and men of learning: That he writeth nothing unto to them as touching bodily exercises; for that the daily practise of the voice by speech and pronumiation, is an exercife woonderfull effectuall, not onely for health, but also for (trength, I meane not fuch as is procured to wreftlers and champions by art, which breedeth brawnic carnolitie, and caufeth the skin to be firme and fast without forth (like unto an house which to the outward thew is rough-cast or thick coated with lime or plaster;) but that which maketh a tough constitution and a vigorous firmitude and strength indeed, in the noblest parts within, and the principall inftruments of our life. Now, that the spirits augment & confirme the powers of our bodie, the anointers of mens bodies in the place of publicke exercise knowfull well, when they give order and command the wreftlers and fuch like, when their limmes are rubbed, to with-Hand fuch frictions in some fort, in holding their winde, observing precisely, and having an eie 20 to ech part of the body that is handled or rubbed. The voice therefore (being a motion of the fpirit (fortified, not superficially and by starts, but even in the proper fountaines and springs which are about the vitall bowels) encreaseth naturall heat) doth subtiliat the blood, cleanseth the veines, openeth all the arcteries, not fuffering any obstruction, oppilation or stopping by superfluous humours to grow upon us or remaine behinde (like unto dregs or grounds) in the bottome of those vessels which receive and concoct those viands whereof we are nourished; by reason whereof, they have need to use ordinarily this exercise, and make it familiar unto them, by speaking in publicke place and discoursing continually. But it haply they doubt that their bodies be but weake, and not able to support and endure so much travell, yet at least wife they are to reade with a loud voice; for looke what proportion there is betweene gestation or carriage of 30 the body, and the exercise thereof upon the very ground, the same is between estimple reading and discoursing or open disputation: for this reading doth gently stirre and mildly carrie the voice by the chariot (as it were) and litter of another mans speech; but disputation addeth therto a certeine heat and forcible vehemence; for that the minde and the bodie confpire and concurre together in that action: howbeit, in this exercise we must beware of over-loud vociferation. ons and clamours; for fuch violent strainings of the voice, and unequal extensions and intenfions of the winde, many times cause some rupture of veines, or inward spasmes and convulsions. Now when a student hath either read or discoursed in this maner, good it is for him before he walke abroad, to use some uncteous, warme and gentle frictions, to handle and rub the skinne and flesh after a fost and milde maner; yea, and as much as he can, to reach into the very 40 bowels within, that the spirits may be spread and distributed equally thorowout, even to the veric extremities of the bodie. In these rubbings and frictions, this gage & measure would be obferved; that he continue them to long and to often, as he findeth them to agree fenfibly with his bodie, and bring no offence with them. He that in this wife hath appealed & fettled the trouble or tenfion of the foirits in the center of the bodie, if haply there should remaine some superstuitie behinde, it would do him no great harme : for fay, that he should forbeare walking, for want of leafure or by occasion of sudden businesse, it is all one, and it maketh no matter; for why, nature hath had already that which is fufficient, and flandeth fatisfied therewith. And therefore a man is not to pretend colourably for to excuse his silence, or forbearance of reading either navigation, when he is accompanied with other paffengers at fea in one ship, or his abode and sojourning in an hostelrie or common inne, although all the companie there should mocke him for it: for as it was no shame nor dishonest thing, to eat before them all; no more unseemly is it to exercise himselse in their presence by reading. But rather more undecent it were, to be astraid or fland in awe of mariners, muliters or inne-keepers, when they laugh at you, not for playing at ball alone, or fighting with your own shadow, but for speaking before the in your speech, either teaching, or discourting, or els learning by roat and rehearfing some good thing for your exercife. Socrates was woont to fay: That for him who would moove and stirre his bodie by way of dancing, a littleroome (that would receive feven fettles or feats) was sufficient & big enough;

but him that mindeth to exercise his body either by singing or saying, every place wil serve, when ther he stand, lie or fit. Only this must we take heed of that we straine not our voice nor fet out an open throat, when we are privie to our felves that we have eaten or drunke liberally, ne yet prefently after the company of a woman, or any other wearisome travel whatsoevers as many of our orators & great masters of rhetoricke use to do; who enforce and give themselves to declaime and pronounce their orations too loud, even about the strength of their bodie; some for valueglory and ambition, because they would put forth themselves; others for reward and to get a fee, or els upon emulation to their concurrents. Thus did Niger, (afriend of ours) who professed rhetoricke in Galatia: this man having swallowed downe a fish bone which stucke stilling his throat (when another rhetorician travelling that way, chanced to make a publike oration; for that he was afhamed to be thought his inferior, and yet durft not deale with him in that facultie) would needs thew himselfe in open place, and declaime, whiles the faid bone remained still in his throat : but by this meanes there enfued a dangerous and painfull inflamation; and being no longer able to endure the dolorous anguish thereof, he suffered himselfe to be launced without forth, and to have a deepe incision and a wide orifice made, whereby the bone indeed was plucked out, but the wound was fo grievous, and oppressed besides with a descent and dessuxion of thewmaticke humours thither, that he died thereof. But haply, better to the purpose it were, to speake of this hereafter. Well, after exercise to go presently into the bath, & to wash in colde water, were the part of a lufty wild-braine and a giddy-headed youth, who will needs in a bravery thew what he can do, rather than holfome any way: for all the good that fuch cold baths bring, 20 is this, that they feeme to harden the body, and confirme it fo, as it is leffe subject to take offence by the qualities of the aire without; but firely they do more harme within, by a great deale; for that they enclose and shut up the porce of the body, causing the humors and sumosities which would evaporate and breathe foorth continually, to become thicke and groffe. Furthermore, needfull it is for them that love to bathe thus in colde water, to fall into the fubjection of that over-firaight and exquifit diet (which we would avoid) having evermore an cie upon this, notto breake the fame in any point whatfoever, for that the least fault and smallest errour in the world, is prefently fore chafficed and coffeth full deere: whereas contrariwife to enter into the baine, and wash in hote water, pardoneth us, and holdeth us excused for many things; for it doth not fo much diminish the strength and force of the bodie, as it bringeth profit another way for the 30 health thereof; framing and applying most gently and kindly the humors to concoction: and in case there be some which cannot well and perfitly be digested, (so they be not altogether cruide and raw, nor float aloft in the mouth of the flomacke) it caufeth them to diffolve and exhale without any fenfe of paine; yea, and withall, it doth mitigate and cause to vanish and passe away the fecret laffitudes of the mufculous members. And yet as good as banes be, if we perceive the bodie to be in the naturall flate and disposition, firme and strong enough, better it were to intermit and for-let the use of baths; and in stead thereof, I holde it holsomer to anoint and rub the bodie before a good fire, namely, if it have need to be chafed and fet in an heat; for by this meanes there is differred into it as much heat as is requifit, and no more; which cannot be against the sunne; for of his heat a man can not take more or lesse at his owne discretion, 40 but according as he affecteth or tempereth the aire, fo he affourdeth his use. And thus much may ferve for the exercise of students.

To come now unto their food and nouriture: if the reasons and instructions before delivered, by which we learne to restraine, represse and mitigate our appetites, have done any good, time it were to proceed forward to other advertisements; but in case they be so violent, so unruly and untained, as if they were newly broken out of prison, that it is an hard piece of worke to range them within the compaffe of reason; and if it be a difficult piece of worke to wrestle with the bellie, which (as Cato was wont to fay) hath no eares; we must worke another feat and device with it; namely, by observing the quality of the viands, to make the quantity more light and leffe offensive : and it they be such as be solid and nourish much; as for example, grosse slesh meats, 50 cheefe, drie figges, and hard egges, they must feed of them as little as they can; for to refuse and forbeate them altogether were very hard; but they may be more bold to eate heartily of those that be thinne and light, such as are the most part of worts, or pot-herbes, birdes, and fifnes, that be not fatte & oilcous: for in eating of fuch meats, a man may at once both gratific his appetite, and also never overcharge his bodie: but above all, take heed they must of crudities and furfeits, proceeding from liberall eating of flesh-meats; for besides that they lode the stomacke presently as they are taken, there remaine afterwards behind naughtie reliques: and therefore it were verie well, that they accustomed their bodies never to call for sleth, considering that the earth it felfe bringeth foorth other kinds of food, fufficiently not onely for the necessitic of nourithment, but also for pleasure and the contenument of the appetite; for some of them are ready to be eaten without any dreffing, or the helpe of mans hand, others be mingled and compounded after divers forts to make them more favoric and toothfome. But for afmuch as cultome (after a fort) is a fecond nature, or at least wife not contrarie to nature; we must not accultome our selves to feed on flesh, for to fulfill our appetites, after the maner of wolves, & lions, but use it onely as the foundation and ground of other viands; which being once laid, we are to make our principall nourifhment of other cates and diffies, which as they are more apto propriate to our bodies, and futable to nature, fo they doe incraffate and dull leffe the vigor and subtilitie of the spirit, and the discoursing reasonable part of the soule, which is kindled, mainteined, and fetto burne cleere, by a more delicate and light matter. As touching liquid things, they must use milke, not as an ordinarie drinke, but as a strong meatthat nourisheth exceeding much: but for wine, we are to fay to it, as Euripides did to Penus:

Welcome to me in measure and in meane, Too much is naught : yet doe not leave me cleane.

for of all drinks it is most profitable, of medicines most pleasant, and of daintic viands most harmeleffe; provided alwaies that it be well delaied and tempered with opportunity of the time, rather than with water. And verily water (not that onely wherewith wine is mingled, but also 20 which is drunke betweene whiles, apart by it felfe) caufeth the wine tempered therewith to doe theleffe harme: in regard whereof, a fludent ought to use himselfe to drinke twice or thuice every day a draught of theere water, for that it will enfeeble the headineffe of the wine, & make the ulual drinking of pure water, more familiar to the flomacke: and this I would have to be done, to this end, that if they be driven perforce to drinke faire water, they might not thinke it firange, nor be ready to refule it. For many there be, who oftentimes have recourse to wine, when iwis, they had more need to runne to the water; and namely, when they be over-heat with the funne: yea, and contrariwife, when they be stiffe frozen with cold, or have streined themfelves to speake much, or studied and sitten hard at their booke; and generally, after that they have travelled fore, till they be wearie, or have performed fome vehement exploit, or violent 30 exercise; then (Isay) they thinke, that they ought to drinke wine; as if nature herselfe required and called for some contentment and refreshing of the bodie, and some change and alteration after travels: but nature verily is not defirous to have any good done to her in this fort, if you call fuch pleasure a doing of good; but she demaundeth onely a reducement to a meane betweene labour and rest: and therefore such persons as these, are to be cut short and abridged of their victuals, and either to be debarred quite of all wine, or else enjoined to drinke it well delaied with water: for wine being of it felfe of a violent and stirring nature, augmenteth and maketh more unquiet the stormic perturbations arising within the body, it doth irritate and diftemper more and more the parts therein already offended and troubled; the which had much more need to be appeased and dulced; to which purpose water serveth passing well: for if we 40 otherwise being not a thirst, drinke hot water after we have laboured, or done some painfull exercife, in the exceeding heats of the fummer; we finde a notable cooling, refreshing, and casement in our inward bowels; the reason is; because the humiditie of water is kinde and milde, procuring no debate or disquietnesseat all; whereas the moisture of wine hath a vehement force, which never is at quiet and repose, but maketh a deepe impression, nothing agreeablenor fit to appeale the indispositions that are a breeding. Now if one doe seare the source and thatpe acrimonies, and the bitter taftes which (by the faying of some) hunger and want of food engender in our bodies, or as little children use to do, thinketh much not to fit at the table fortocat, a little before the fit of an ague, or when he suspecteth it comming: the drinking of water is as it were a confine and frontier betweene both, very fit to remedie the one and the 50 other: and many times we offer unto Bacchus himselfe certeine facrifices called Nephalia, for that there is no wine used therein; accustoming our selves wisely thereby not to be alwaies defirous for to drinke wine. Minos tooke away from facrifices, the flute, and the chaplets used to be worne on mensheads, in regard of griefe and forrow: and vetwe know full well, that the heavie and forrowfull minde, is neither by flutes nor flowers, paffionate; whereas there is nor the bodie of a man, (how firong and flour foever he be) but if it be flirred, troubled, and enflamed, will take more harme and offence by wine if it be taken or powred into it. It is recorded in the Chronicles; that the Lydians in time of a great dearth and famine, did eat but once in two daies, and spent the time betweene, at dice-play, and other such games and pastimes; and even to it were well befeeming a student and lover of the Muses and his booke, at such a time as he had need to make a late and thort supper, to have before him, the figure ferving for some Geometricall proposition, or some little booke, some harpe or lute; this will not suffer him to be ledde as prisoner to his owne belly, but by diverting and turning ordinarily his mind from the boord, to these honest pastimes and recreations; will chase away from the Muses the greedy appetite of eating and drinking, as if they were to many ravenous fowles and harpies: For a shame it were that a Scythian whileshee is drinking, should estsoones take his bow in hand readic bent, and twang the string, and by the found thereof, awaken and quicken his courage, which otherwise would become drowfie, loose, and dull by wine: and that a Grecian to thould be afhamed or afraid of a flout or mocke, in affaying gently to refraine and bridle an unreasonable, violent, and greedic appetite, by the meanes of bookes and writings: for much after the fame manner in a comedie of Menander, when there was a band, who for to tempt certeineyoong men fitting at fupper together, brought in amongst them certeine pretie young wenches, very faire, & richly arraid, every one of the faid yoong men (because they were afraid & unwilling to looke those beautifull damosels in the face) made no more adoe, but as he faith.

Moreover, men that are addicted to their fludie, and to learning, have many other proper and pleatant meanes to turne away their eies, and divert their minds, if otherwife they be not able to looke off; and to ftay or hold in, this violent and dogge-like greedy appetite, when the meat 20 flanderh before them upon the bourd. For as touching the speeches of some masters of wrestlers, or the words of certeine schoole-masters, who goe up and downe, saying: That to reason, argue, and discourse at the table upon points of learning; causeth the meat to corrupt within the flomacke, and breedeth head-ach, or heavinesse of the braine: we may indeed seare somewhat; if we will needs (while we be at our repatt) fall to refolve such a sophistical argument, as the Logicians call Indos: or if wee be disposed to reason and dispute about the masterfull sophiline named Kyritton: It is faid, that the crowne or upmost tust growing upon the date tree. manipretate called the braine thereof, is exceeding fweet and pleafant to the taffe, howbeit, hurtfull to the brames of the head: howbeit, these prickie and intricate disputations in Logicke at supportine; are no 30 for the way: but this bird pleasant banketting dishes, but offensive to the braine, tedious, and irksome, nothing more. But being forme, if those men will not permit us to discourse, to heare, reade, or talke of other matters in supper time, which together with honestie and profit, have an attractive pleasure and sweetnesse joined therewith: we will defire them to let us alone, & not trouble us, but to arife from the table, and goe their waies into their galleries and hals for wreftling, and there to hold and maintaine fuch politions among their scholars and champions, whom they withdraw and turne away tained hould hook from the study of good letters; and accustoming them to spend their time all theday long in feoffes and feurrile speeches, they make them in the end (as gentle Ariston faid) as witleffe, and without fenfe (yet glib and well greafed) as the stone pillers which support those galleries, and places of exercife where they use to converse and keepe schoole. But we contrariwise being 40 ruled by the physicians, who advise us alwaies to interpose some competent time between supper and fleepe, are not prefently to go unto it, after we have filled our bellies with viands, and stuffed our spirits, even whiles the morsels of meat bee all raw, or beginning now to be concocted, thereby to hinder and state digestion; but give some space and breathing time betweene, untill the meat bee well fetled in the ftomacke. And as they who give us counfell to moove and stirre the bodie after meales, will us, not to runne our selves out of breath, nor to exercife our felves fo, as that we put all the parts of our bodie to the triall, after the manner of the Pancratiasts; but either to walke faire and softly, or to daunce after a gentle and easie manner; femblably, we are to thinke, that we ought to exercise our wits and minds after a dinner or supper, not about any affaires of deepe studie, and profound meditation, nor in sophistical disputes, 50 tending to the offentation of a quicke and lively spirit, or which bee litigious, and breed contention; but there be many questions besides of naturall philosophie, pleasant to be discussed, and eafie to be decided; many pretie tales and narrations there are, out of which a man may draw good confiderations and wife inftructions, for to traine and frame our manners; and thefe conteine that grace & facilitie in them, which the poet Homer calleth Menoeikes, that is to fay, yeelding to anger, and in no wife croffe and refiftant: Heereupon it is, that fome doe pleafant-

ly teame this exercise of moovoing, propounding & resolving historicall or poetical questions; the second course or the service of banketting dishes, for students and learned men. Moreover, there be other forts of pleasant talke besides these, and namely; to heare and recite fables, devited for mirth and pleasure; discourses of playing upon the flute, harpe, or lute, which many times give more contentment and delight, than to heare the flute, harpe, or lute it felfe plaint edupon. Now the very precise time measured as it were and marked out to be most proper and meet for fuch recreations; is when we feele that our meat is gently gone downe, and feeled quietly in the bottome of the stomacke, shewing some signe of concoction, and that naturall heat is flrong, and hath gotten the upper hand.

Now forasmuch as Aristotle is of opinion, that walking after supper doth stirre up and kin-10 dle (as one would fay) our naturall heat: and to fleepe immediately after a man hath supped, doth dull and quench it: confidering also, that others be of a contrary minde, and hold; that rest and repose, is better for concoction; that motion so some after, troubleth and impeacheth the digettion and distribution of the meats, which is the cause that some use to walke after supper, others sit still and take their ease: me thinks a man may reconcile and satisfie veric well after a fort these two opinions; who cherishing and keeping his bodie close and still after fupper, settethhis mind a walking, awakeneth it, suffering it not to be heavie & idle at once by and by; but tharpneth and quickneth his spirits, as is before faid, by little and little, in discourfing, or hearing discourses of pleasant matters and delectable, such as be not biting in any wife, nor offenfive and odious.

Moreover, as touching vomits or purgations of the bellie by laxative medicines, which are the curfed and detestable easements and remedies of fulnesse and repletion; surely they would neverbe used but upon right great and urgent necessitie: a contrary course to many men, who fill their gorges and bodies with an intent to void them foone after; or otherwise, who purge and emptie the same for to fill them againe, even against nature; who are no lesse troubled, nay much more offended ordinarily, by being fedde and full, than falting and emptie: infomuch as fuch repletion is an hinderance to the contentment and fatisfying of their appetites and lufts; by occasion whereof, they take order alwaies, that their bodie may be evermore emptied; as if this voidance were the proper place and feat of their pleasures. But the hurt and dammage that may grow upon these ordinary purgations and vomits, is very evident; for that both the one 30 and the other, put the body to exceeding great straines and violent disturbances. As for vomiting, it bringeth with it one inconvenience by it felfe, more than the former, in that it procure th & augmenteth an unfatiable greedinesse to meat: for ingendered there is by that meanes a violent & turbulent hunger (like as when the course or stream of a river, hath bene for a while stopped & staid) snatching or greedy at meat, which is evermore offensive, & not a kind appetite indeed, when as nature hath need of meat; but refembling rather the inflammations occasioned by medicines or cataplasmes. Hereupon it is that the pleasures proceeding from thence, patle and flippe away incontinently, as abortive and unperfect, accompanied with inordinate pantings and beatings of the pulse, great wrings in the enjoying of them, and afterwards enfue dolorous tenfions, violent oppressions or stoppings of the conduits & pores, & the reliques or 40 retentions of ventofities; which staie not for naturall ejections and evacuations, but runne up and downe all over our bodies, like as if they were shippes surcharged, having more need to bee cased of their burden, than still to be loden with more excrements. As for the troublesome motions of the belly and guts, occasioned by purgative drougues, they corrupt, spill and resolve the natural strength of the solide parts, so that they engender more superfluties within than they thrust out and expel. And this is for althe world, like as if a man, being discontented to see within his native citie a multitude of naturall Greekes inhabitants, should for to drive them out, fill the same with Scythians or Arabian strangers. For even so, some there be, who (greatly miscounting and deceiving themselves) for to send foorth of their bodies the superfluous humors which are in some fort domesticall and familiar unto them, put into them I wot not what, Gui-50 dian graines, Scammoni and other strange drougues fet from farre countries, such as have no familiar reference to the bodie, but are meere wilde and favage, and in truth have more need to be purged and chaced out of the body themselves, than power and vertue to void away and expell that wherewith nature is choked and overcharged. The best way therefore is, by sobrietie and regular diet, to keepe the bodie alwaies in that moderate measure of evacuation and repletion, that it may be able by proportionable temperature, to maintaine it felfe, without any outwardhelpe. But if it fall out other whiles, that there be some necessitie of the one or the other;

vomits would be provoked without the helpe of strange physicall drogues, and not with much as that it is thon, at for a fabulous

adoo and curiofitie, that they disquiet & trouble no parts within, but onely for to avoid cruditie and indigestion, reject and cast up that gentlie which is too much, and cannot be prepared and made meet for concoction. For like as linnen clothes that bee fcoured and made cleane with sopes, ashes, lees and other absterfive matters, weare more and fret out sooner than such as be washed simply in faire water; even so, vomites provoked by medicines, offend the body much more, and marre the complexion. But fay, the belly bee bound and coffive, there is not a drougher that eafeth it fo mildly, or provoketh it to the flege fo eafily, as doe certaine means. whereof the experience is familiar unto us, and the use nothing dolorous and offensive. Now in case the body be so heard, that such kinde viands will not worke and cause it to be sollible. then a man ought for many daies together, to drinke thinne and cold water, or use to fast, or else take some clister, rather than purgative medicines, such as disquiet the body, and overthrow the temperature thereof. And yet many there be, who ever and anon are ready to run unto them; much like unto those lewd and light wanton women, who use certeine medicines to cause abortion, or to send away the fruit which they have newly conceived; to the end that they might conceive foone againe, and have more pleafure in that fleshly action. Now is it time to fay no more, but to let them goe that perfwade fuch evacuations.

As for those on the contratic side, who interject certaine exact, precise, and criticall fastings, observed too straightly according to just periods and circuits of daies: surely they teach nature. (wherein they doe not well) to use aftriction before it have need; and acquaint her with a neceffarie abstinence of food, which in it selfe is not necessarie, even at a prefixed time, which 20 calleth for that then, whereto it is accustomed. Better yet it were, for a man to use these cha-Aicements of his body, freely and at his owne liberty, without any foreknowledge of furbition: and as for other diet, (as hath beene faid before) to order it fo, that it may frame and be obsequent to all manner of occurrences & changes that shall come betweene, and not to be tied and bound to one forme and manner of life, exactly to keepe certaine daies, just numbers, and fet circuits, without failing or miffing in any jot. For this course is neither sure, nor easie; it is not civill nor yet agreeable to humanitie: it resembleth rather the life of an oister, or some stocke of a tree; to captivate himselfe, and be so subject and thrall, that he cannot change or alter his viands; he may not once varie in his faltings and abstinencies, in his motions or repose, but continue alwaies close and covert in a thadie kinde of life, idle, private to himselfe, without 20 conversing with stiends, without participation of honors, farre remote from the administration of weale publicke, which were to thut himfelfe up as it were a close prisoner; a life I affure you which I cannot like nor allow: for wee cannot built our health with idleneffe and doing naught, which two are the principall inconveniences incident unto difeases: and all one this were, as if a man would thinke to preferve his eies, by not employing them to fee; or his voice, by speaking not at all; thus to be perswaded, that for the preservation of health it were necessarie to have continuall repose, without doing ought: for a man in health, cannot doe better for to mainteine the fame, than to be emploied in many good duties, and commendable offices of humanitie. An abfurd error therefore it is, to thinke idlenesse to be either healthy or holsome, confidering that it destroicth the very end of health, which is emploiment: neither is it true, 40 that the leffe men doe, the more healthfull they be. For Xenocrates had not his health better than Phocion; nor Theophrastus than Demetrius: and as for Epicurus and all the crew of his fecturies, they had no benefit at all for the atteining of that contentment and tranquillitie of the bodie which they make fo great reckoning of, and praife to highly; by flying and avoiding all State affaires, and medling in no publicke and honorable office. Other meanes therefore and provision would be made, to enterteine and keepe that disposion and habitude of the bodie, which is according to nature: for this is certeine; that all forts of life be capable, as well of fickneffe as of health. Howbeit, polititians (quoth he) and States-men are to be admonished to doe cleane contrarie unto that which Plato advertised his young scholars to doe. For Plato ever ashe went out of the schoole, was woont thus to say unto them: Goe to my sonnes, see 50 you employ that leafure which you have, in some honest sports and passines. But we may exhort and put in minde those who deale in the administration of common-wealth, to bestow their labour and travell in honest and necessarie things, and not to overtoile and spend their bodies in small matters of little or no consequence; as the manner is of most men, who trouble and torment themselves about just nothing, overwatching, running to and fro, heere and there, up and downe about things which many times are neither good nor honest; but onely because they would difgrace and shame others, either upon enviethat they beare unto them, or upon obstinate and wilfull selfe-conceit, or else to pursue and maintaine some vaine and soolish opinions that they have taken. For I thinke verily it was in regard of fuch persons especially, that Democritus faid: If the body should call the foule judicially into question upon an action of injurie or wrong done, and for to make fatisfaction of loffe and damage; the were not able to answer it , but must needs confesse the action , and be condemned. And Theophrastus peradventure faid well and truely; when speaking by a metaphor or allegorie; he affirmed, that the foule paid a deere rent for her dwelling within the body. For (I affure you) the bodie may thanke the foule for many harmes that it fulfaineth; when as the ufeth it not with reason, nor intreateth it according as it is meet and convenient; and looke when the hath any proper and peculiar passions of her owne, or some enterprises and actions to be performed, she maketh no fpare of the poore bodie. As for the tyrant Jalon, hee was wont (I wornot upon what reason or ground) to fay: That he ought to deale unjuftly in small matters, who would be just in the greatest affaires; and even so, wee may well advise a man of State and government, to make no reckoning of trifling things, but disport, play, and folace himselse in repose with them; if he would not have his bodie over-spent, dull, or lazie, against the time that he should emploie it in great and important causes: much like to an old shippe which hath beene drawen up to land, forto be newly calked and trimmed, after it hath rested a time, is fit to doe new service at sea; for even so, the bodie upon repose and case, when soever the soule shall put it to any affaires, will be ready to follow

And therefore when occasions will permit and give leave, wee are to refresh and recreat our selves, not envying the bodies naturall sleepe, or usuall repose and refection of dinner, ne yet easement and recreation, which is of a middle nature betweene pleasure and paine, nor observing aftrict rule; which many men doc keepe, and in keeping it, spill and spend the bodie by fudden mutations; like as iron that is often made hot and quenched againe: for when foever the body is foiled and tired with travels, then they will even melt and diffolve it in exceffive and unmeasurable pleasures: and all upon the sudden againe, when it is weakned & enseebled with the delights of Venus, or by drinking out of courfe, they will draw and drive it prefently to the feri-20 ous travels of the common hall or the court, to the folliciting and following of fome affaires of great importance, which requireth earnest attendance and hot pursute. Heraclitus the philosopher, being fallen into a dropfie, willed his physician to make drought of great raine. But most men ordinarily doe fault heerein exceeding much: now when they be wearied, toiled, and foiled with painfull labours and wants, yeeld their bodies to be melted and spent quite with voluptuous pleasures; and afterwards againe, wrest and straine them as it were upon the teinters, immediately upon the fruition of some pleasures. For nature verily neither liketh nor requireth these alterations and sudden changes by turnes: but it is the incontinencie and illiberall lasciviousnesse of the foule, and nothing else, that abandoneth her-selse inordinately unto pleasures and delights, so soone as it is out of laborious exercises; like as mariners and failers doe at sea. 40 And contrariwife, immediately after fports & pleafures, betaketh it felfe to the eager purfute of gaine, & to the management of great affaires; giving no time and space of rest to nature, to enjoy repose and quiet tranquillitie, wherof it hath need, but setteth it out of frame, and distempereth it mightily, by reason of this inequalitie. But wise and discreet persons are verie wary and carefull in this behalfe; never prefenting fuch pleafures to their bodies when they be out-wearied with labour and travell, for need thereof they have none at all; and befides, they doe not regard nor thinke upon them, having their mindes continually intentive upon the honeftic and decency of the action or thing whereabout they are; dulling or dimming as well the joy, as the earnest solicitude and care of their minde, by the meanes of other desires and appetites; as it is written of Epaminondas, that he should say in game and meriment, of a certaine valiant man, 50 who about the time of the Leuctrique warre, died of ficknesse in his bedde: O Hercules, how had this man any leafure to die, amidde fo many important affaires! even so it may be said truly and in good earnest of a great personage, who hath in his hand the managing of some weightie affaires in matter of government, or treatife of philosophie: How should such a man as he have time either to be drunken, or to furfeit with gluttonie, or given himselse to stelly pleafures of the body? But wife men indeed, when they be freed from important matters of action, can finde a time to rest and repose their bodies, discharging them of needlesse and unprofitable travels, but much more of fuperfluous and unnecessarie pleasures, flying and shunning them as enemies and contrarie to nature.

I remember that upon a time I heard, how Tibertus Cefar was wont to fay: That a man being once above three-fcore yeres of age deferveth to be mocked and derided, if he put forth his hand unto the physician for to have his pulse felt. For mine owne part, I take this speech of his to bee somewhat too proud and insolent; but me thinks this should be true: That every man ought to know the particularities and properties of his owne pulse, for there bee many diversities and differences in each one of us: also that it behoovet no man to be ignorant in the severall complexion of his owne bodie, as well in heat as in drinesse: also to be skilfull what things be good for him, and what be hurtfull, when he useth them: for he that would learne these partition cularities of any other than of himselfe, or goeth to a physician to know of him, whether he be better in health in summer time than in winter; or whether hee stand better affected intaking dry things rather than moist; also whether naturally he have a strong pulse or a weake, a quicke or a slow; surely hath no sense or feeling of himselfe, but is as it were deaste and blinde, a sitanger he is dwelling in a borrowed body, and none of his owne: for such points as those, are good to be knowen and easie to be learned; for that we may make proofe thereof every hower, as having the body with us continually.

Also meet it is, among meats and drinks, to know those rather which be good and holsome for the ftomack, than fuch as be pleafant to the tooth; and to have experience of that which doth the stomacke good, more than of that which is offensive thereto; as also of those things that do 20 not trouble and hinder concoction, than which content and tickle the tafte. For to demand of a phyfician, what is cafe of digeftion, and what not; what doth loofe, and what bindeth the belly; me thinks is no leffe shamefull than to aske him, what is sweet; what bitter; what sowre, tart or austere. But now we shall have many folke, that know well how to find fault with their cooks and dreffers of meat, for feafoning their broths, or making fauce to their viands, being able to difeerne which is fweeter than it ought to be; which is over-tart or too much falted: and yet they themselves are not able to say, whether that which is put into the bodie and united therewith, be light or no; and whether it be harmleffe, not offenfive, or profitable. Hereupon it is, that their pottage misseth not often, the right seasoning; whereas contrariwise, for want of well seasoning their owne felves, but daily faulting therein, they make much worke for physicians: for theye- 30 fleeme not that pottage best, which is the sweetest, but they mingle therewith many sharpe juices and fowre herbs, to make it fomewhat tart withall; but contrariwife, they fend into the bodie all maner of fweet and pleafant things, even untill itery, Ho; partly being ignorant, and in part not calling to minde and remembrance, that nature adjoineth alwaies unto things that be good and holfome, a pleafure not mingled with displeafure and repentance. Moreover, we are likewife to remember and beare in minde, all those things that be fit and agreeable to the bodie; or contrariwife, in the changes of the seasons in the yere, in the qualities and properties of the aire, and other circumstances, to know how to accommodat and apply our diet accordingly: for as touching all the offences proceeding from nigardife, avarice and pinching, which the common fort doe incurre about the painfull inning and laborious bestowing or laying up of their 40 come and fruits; who by their long watchings, by their running and trudging to and fro, discover and bewray what is within the bodie, rotten, faulty & ulcerous: we are not to feare, that fuch accidents will befall to learned persons or students, ne yet to States-men and polititians, unto whom principally I have addressed this discourse; but they ought to beware and eschue another kinde of more eager covetousnesse and illiberall nigardise in matter of studie and literature, forcing them to neglect and not regard their owne poore bodies, which often times being fo travelled and outwearied, that they can doe them no more fervice, yet they foare them never the more, nor give them leave to be refreshed and gather up their crummes againe; but force that which is fraile and mortall, to labour a vie with the foule, which is immortall; that (Ifay) which is earthly, to hold out with the spirit, that is heavenly. Well, the ox said unto the carnell 50 his fellow-fervant, who would not ease him a little of his burden: Thou wilt not helpe me now to beare somewhat of my charge; but shortly thou shalt carie all that I carie, and mebesides: which fell out so indeed, when the ox died under his burden; semblably it hapnesh to the soule, which will not allow the fillie bodie (wearied and tired) fome little time of rest and repose : for foone after comes a fever, head-ach, dizzineffe of the braine, with a dimneffe of the fight, which will compell her to lay afide all books, to abandon all good letters, disputations and studie; and in the end is driven to languish and lie sicke in bed together with it for company. And therfore Plato wisely admonishes us, not to move and exercise the body without the soule, nor the soule without the body, but to drive them both together equally, as if they were two steeds drawing at one spire of a chariot; and especially at such a time, when as the body is bussed with the soule, and laboureth together with her, we ought to have the most care of it, and to allow it that attendance & cheristiment, which is meet and requisit, to the end, that thereby we may requite it with good and desireable health; esteeming this to be the greatest benefit and most singular gift that proceedeth thereupon, in that neither the one nor the other (for default of good disposition) is impeached or hindered in the knowledge of vertue and the practise thereof, as swell in literature to as in the actions of mans life.

OF THE ROMANS FORTUNE.

The Summarie.

Fever therewere any Statepolitike, in the rifing growth and declination whereof, we are to see & acknowledge the admirable providese of God, together with the strength and wishdome of man, certes the Romane empire ought to be set in the sormost range. The cause of the foundation and advancement of this great Monarchie, are otherwise considered by those whom the heavenly trueth (revealed in the holy Scripture) doth illuminate, than by the Pagans and Sages of this world, guided onely by the discourse of their reason, corrupted with sinne and ignorance of the true God. For when the question is, as touching the government of the universal world, although the sovereigne Lord thereof, use often times, the spirituall and corporal wigor both of mortall men, for to execuse his will, yet we may be hold above it, and beginning the considerated with the source of the corrections.

exploit of visible instruments, this great and incomprehensible wisdome of his; who having decreed in himselfe all things, executeth every moment his deliberations; so that in regard of him, there is nothing cafuall, but all keepe a course according to his determinate and resolute will: but in respect of us, munthings be accidentall; for that the counsels of that eternall and immutable wisedome are hidden from us, and appeare not but by little and little. Infidels and milereants, who are not able to comprehend this scores, have imagined and set downe for governesses of mans life, Fortune and Vertue; meaning by Fortune, that which the common saying comprises him these sew words: In this world there is nothing els but good lucke and bad; but so, as if any man could skill how to manage his owne fortune, 40 hemight make it of bad, good and commodious: and this they meant by the word Vertue, which is an habitude or disposition of the mind and body; by the meanes whereof, he that uindued therewith, malis prevent and overthrow quite all the affaults of Fortune. Some there be, who abuse the word Fortune, for to abolish the providence of God; and others have attributed so much unto Vertue, that they have fet man out of those limits, in which his owne proper nature, and above all the divine trueth, placed him. Others againe, have aftribed some thing unto Fortune, and yet they neither under stand nor declare what it importet h, but have given out (although very irrefolutely) that Fortune cannot give the check to a vertuous man. If we had this treatife following entire and perfect, all the ancient philosophic and learning, autouching this question, had bene manifestly discovered unto us. But the principall part of this discourse is lost, in such fort, as Plutarch (having brought in Fortune and Versue disputing upon 50 this point: Whether of them (kould have the honour of the foundation and maintenance of the Romane empire?) hath left unto us nothing but the plea of Fortune; who by divers reasons and proofs holdeth that the wisdome & valour of the people of Rome, was not the cause of their grandence; but Fortune, that is to fay (as he express shewesh in one place) the guidance and helpe of God, who hat he or affects his estate for many others, and for to hold one good part of the world jointly mone body, under such a chiefe and sovereigne. As concerning the reasons alledged in the favor and maintenance of Fortune, they be marked in order, and drawen out well at large: whereas those of Vertue are omitted, or peradventure reserved to the judgement and discretion of the reader, for to mount, devise, and apply them by himselfe, and of them all to collect and gather one conclusion, tending to this, for to show the great wonders of Gods providence in susteining the Romane empire, and the notable aid of an infinit number of instruments, which the said divine providence emploied in planting, raising up, and pulling downe so mighty and renowmed a dominion.

OF THE ROMANS FORTUNE.

Ertue and Fortune have fought many great combats, and those oftentimes one against the other: but that which presenteth it selfe unto us at this time, is the greatest of all the rest; to wit: the debate and plea which they had together as touching the empire of Rome, namely; whether of them twaine wrought that worke? and which of them brought foorth so mightie a puissance? For this will be no sinall testimonie on her side who shall gaine the victorie, or rather a great apologie, against the imputation charged upon the one and the other. For Vertue is accused, in that the is honest, but unprositable: and fortune, that the is uncerteine, but yet good: and it is commonly faid, that as the former is fruitleffe for all her paines; fo the other is faithleffe and untruftic in all her gifts. For who will not fay, if the greatnesse of Rome be adjudged and awarded to one of them, that either Vertue is most profitable, in case she could doe so much for good and honest men. or Fortune most firme and constant, if the have preserved and kept so 20 long, that which she once bath given? I'm the poet in those works of his which he composed without verse, and in prose, saith: That Fortune and Wisedome (two most different things, and farre unlike one to the other) produce neverthelesse most like and semblable essects: both the one and the other indifferently make men great and honorable; they advance them in dignitie, puissance, estate and authoritie. And what need I (for to draw out this matter at length)rehearfe and reckon up a number of those whom they have preferred, considering that even nature herselfe who hath borne us, and brought foorthall things; some take to be Fortune, and others Wifedome. This prefent discourse therefore, addeth unto the citie of Rome a great and admirable dignitie, in case we dispute of her as our manner is of the earth, the sea, the heaven and the starres, namely, whether it were by Fortune or by providence, that she was first founded 30 and had her being? For mine owne part, I am of this opinion, that howfoever Fortune and Vertue have alwaies had many quarrels and debates otherwife, yet to the framing and composition of so great an empire and puissance, it is very like they had made truce and were at accord; that by one joint-confent alfo, they wrought both together, and finished the goodliest piece of work that ever was in the world. Neither think I that I am deceived in this conjecture of mine; but am perswaded, that like as (according to the saying of Plato) the whole world was not made at first, of fire and earth, as the two principall and necessarie elements, to the end that it might be visible and palpable, confidering that as the earth gave massinesse, poise and firmitude; so fire conferred thereunto, colour, forme, and motion. Belides, the other two natures and elements which are betweene these two extremes (to wir, aire and water, by softning, melting, tempering and quenching (as it were) the great diffociation and diffimilitude of the faid extremes) have drawen together, incorporate and united by the meanes of them, the first matter; even so, time and God together, intending fuch a stately piece of worke as Rome, tooke Vertue and Fortune, and those they tempered and coupled in one, as yoke-fellowes; to the end, that of the thing which is proper both to the one and the other, they might found, build, and reare a facred temple indeed, an edifice beneficiall and profitable unto all, a strong castle seated upon a firme ground-worke, and an eternall element, which might ferve in flead of a maine pillar, to fuffeine the decaying state of the world, readie to reele and finke downward; and finally, as a fure ankerhold against turbulent tempests, and wandering waves of the surging seas, (as Democritus 50 was woont to fay.) For like as some of the naturall philosophers hold: That the world at the first was not the world, and that the bodies would not joine and mingle themselves together, for to give unto nature a common forme, composed of them all: but when the said bodies, (such as yet were small and scattered heere and and there,) slid away, made meanes to escape and flie for feare they should be caught and interlaced with others; such also as were more strong, firme, and compact, even then strove mainly one against another, and kept a foule coile and stirre together, in such manner, as there arose a violent tempest, a dangerous ghust and troublesome agitation, agitation, filling all with ruine, error, and thipwracke, untill fuch time as the earth arofe to greatnesse by the tumultuarie concourse of those bodies that grew together, whereby she herielfe began first to gather a firme consistence; and afterwards yeelded in her-felfe, and all about her a fine feat and refting place for all other. Semblably, when the greatest empires and potentacies among men, were driven and caried to and fro, according to their fortunes, and ranne one against another, by reason that there was not one of that grandence and puissance as might command all the reft, and yet they all defired that fovereignty: there was a woonderfull confufion, a generall destruction, a strange hurliburly, a tumultuary wandering, and an universall mutation and change throughout the world, untill such time as Rome grew to some strength 10 and bigneffe, partly by laying and uniting to her-felfe the neighbour nations and cities neere abouther; and in part, by conquering the feignories, realmes, and dominions of princes fare of, and ftrangers beyond fea: by which meanes the greatest and principall things in the world began to reft, and be fetled as it were a firme foundation and fure feat, by reason that a generall peace was brought into the world, and the maine empire thereof reduced to one round circle, To firme as it could not be checked or impeached: for that indeed all vertues were feated in those who were the founders and builders of this mightie State; and besides, Fortune also was ready with her favour to fecond and accompany them; as it shall (more plainly) appeere and be shewed in this discourse ensuing. And now me thinks I see from this project, as it were from fome high rocke and watch tower; Vertue and Fortune marching toward the pleading of their 20 cause, and to the judgement and decision of the foresaid question propounded: but vertue in her part and maner of going, seemeth to be milde & gentle, in the carriage also of her ete, stated and composed; the earnest care likewise and desire she hash to mainteine and defend her honor in this contention, maketh her colour a little to rife in her face, albeit the be farre behinde Fortune, who commeth apace, and maketh all the hafte she can: now there conduct her, and attend upon her round about in manner of a guard, a goodly traine and troupe

Of worthies brave, who martiall captaines were, In bloudy warres, and bloudy armours beare.

All wounded in the fore-part of their bodies, dropping with bloud and fwet mingled together, leaning upon the truncheons of the launces & pikes halfe broken, which they hud won from their enemies. But would you have us to demand and aske who they might be? They fay, that they be the Fabricii, the Camilli, the Lucii furnamed Cincimnatt, the Fabii Maximi, the Claim Marcelli, and the two Scipioss: I fee alfo C. Marius all angry, and chafing at Fortune. Music Scevola likewife is amongft them, who fheweth the flump of his burnt hand, crying aloud withall: And will you afcribe this hand. alfo to Fortune? And Marcus Horatius Coeles that valliant knight, who fought fo bravely upon the bridge, covered all over with the fhot of Tuskan darts, and fhewing his lame thigh feemeth to fpeake (from out of the deep whitle-pit of the river into which he leapt) these words: And was it by chance & Fortune that my legge became broken, & I lame upon it? Loe, what a company came with vertue to the triall of this controverse and matter in question!

All warriours flout in complet armour dight:

Expert in feates of armes, and prest to fight. But on the other fide, the gate and going of Fortune feemes quicke and faft, her spirit great, and courage proud, her hopes high and haughtie: the over-goeth vertue, and approcheth nere at hand already; not mounting and lifting up her felfe now, with her light and flight wings, nor flanding a tiptoe upon a round ball or boole, commeth the wavering and doubtfull; and then goeth her way afterwards in discontentment and displeasure: but like as the Spartiates describe Venus, saying; That after the had passed the river Euroras, the layd by her mirrors and looking glaffesscaft afide her daintie jewels , and other wanton ornaments , and threw away that tiffue and lovely girdle of hers; and taking speare and shield in hand, sheweth her selfe thus pre-50 Pared and fet out, unto Lycurgus; cuen to Fortune having abandoned the Perfians and Affyrians, flew quicklie over Macedonia, and soone shooke off Alexander the great: then travailed fhea while through Aegipt and Siria, carying after her kingdomes as the went; and to having ruined and ouerthrowen the Carthaginians state, which with much variety and change she had oftentimes upheld; the approched in the end to mount Palatine, and when the had paffed over the river Tiber, even there (as it flould feeme) she cast off her wings, then she put off her flying patins; her boule to inconstant turning and rolling to and fro the forsooke, and so entred Rome as to make her stay and abode there: and in this guise and maner sheweth she her selfe now, and maketh her apparance for to heare justice, & have this quarrell decided: Not as a base. unknowne, and obscure person (as Pindarus faith) nor guiding and resting with her hand two helmes; but rather as the fifter of Eunomia, that is to fay Acquitie; and of Peitho, that is to fav Persivasion; and the daughter of Promethia, that is to say Providence, according as Alcinus the poet deriveth her genealogie and pedigree. Moreover she holdeth betweene her hands that plentifull Horne of all aboundance, so much celebrated and renowmed, and the same filled, not with store of frutes alwaies fresh and verdant which Autumue yeeldeth, but brim full of all those pretious and exquisite commodites

Which any land or fea doth breed, or out of rivers [pring: Which in deepe mines by delfe are found, or havens by veffels bring.

And those powreth the foorth aboundantly, and giveth abroad in great largesse. There are about her also to be seene in her traine, a number of most noble and right excellent personages, to wit: N uma Pompilius descended from the Sabines; Tarquinius Priscus from the citie Tarquinit; whom being aliens and meere strangers the enstalled kings, and enthronized in the roje all feat of Romulus. Also Paulus Aemilius, who brought backe his armie fafe and found from the defaiture of Perfeus and the Macedonians, where he atchived fo fortunate a victorie, that there was not seene one Romane with a weeping eye, for the losse of any friend in that warre: and when he returned in triumph magnified Fortune . Even fo did that good olde knight, C4- 20 cilius Metellus, furnamed Macedonieus, aswell in regard of his brave victories, as of this rarefelicitie of his, that he was caried unto his sepulture by soure of his owne sonnes, who had beneall confuls; namely, Quintus Balearius, Lucius Diadematus, Marcus Metellus, and Caius Caprarius; there attended also upon his corps, two sonnes in law of his, that married his daughters, both confular men, and as many nephewes, his daughters children; men of marke and name all, both for great proweffe in feats of armes, and also for their high place which they held in government of State, and commonweale. Aemilius Scaurus likewife (who being of a low degree and condition of life, yet came from a stocke more base than it, a new upstart and of the first head) was raifed and advanced by her, and by the meanes of her favour, made a great lord and prince of that high court and honourable counfell, called the Senate, Cornelius Sylla likewife, whom 30 the tooke out of the lap & bosome of Nicopolis a courtisan, for to exalt him above all the Cunbrické Trophees and Laureat Triumphs; yea, and the seven consulships of Marino, to raisehim to that high pitch and fovereigne degree of an absolute monarch in the world, and a dictatour; he (I fay) openly and directly gave himselfe (as it were) by way of adoption unto Fortune, and attributed his whole estate and all his actions to her favour, crying with a loud voice with Oedipus in Sophocles:

To Fortunes court I owe all sures, And her good sonne my selfe reputes.

Infomuch as in the Romane language he furnamed himfele Felix, that is to fay, Happie: and unto the Greeks, he wrote thus in their tongue : Λέκιος Κορνήλι & Εύλαιας Επαφεί Απε. that is to fay: 40 Lucius Cornelius Sylla, beloved of Venus and the Graces. And verily those trophees of his, which are to be seene in our countrey of Charonea, in regard of those noble victories which he gained against the lieutenants generall of king Mithridates, have the like inscription, and that right worthily. For it is not the night (as Menander faith) but Fortune, that is best acquainted and in greatest favour with Venue. Should not be therefore (who is desirous to plead the cause of Fortune) doe very well to lay this for a good ground of his plea, and in the forefront and Exordium of his oration, bring in very fitly and properly for his witnesses to depose, the Romans themselves, who have ascribed more unto Fortune than to Vertue? Certes, late it was among them, & after many ages, ere Scipio N umantinus builded a temple to Vertue: & after him, Marcellus caused to be built that chapel bearing the name, Virturis & Honoris, that is to say, Of Ver- 50 and Honour: like as Aemilus Scaurus gave order for another to be reared by the name of Mentis, that is to fay, of understanding; even about the time of the Cunbricke warre :in which age, (when literature, and professors of learning & eloquence, flocked thicke, as it were, and resorted to the citie of Rome) they beganne to have in price and reputation, such matters: and yet to this very day there is not one chapell of Wildome, Temperance, Patience & Magnanimitie, ne yet of Continence; whereas of Fortune there be temples fo stately, fo glorious, and so ancient withall, that a man would take them to have bene edified even in maner when the first foundations of the citie were laid. For first and formost, Anew Martin the nephew or daughters sonne ofking Numa, and the fourth king of Rome after Romulus, founded one in the honour of Fortune. And peradventure he it was that furnamed Fortune, Virilia, and derived it of Fortia; for that Virility, that is to fay, Manhood, and Fortitude, that is to fay Proweffe and Valour, have most helpe by Fortune, to the archieving of victorie. As for that temple of Feminine Fortune, named otherwise Muliebris, they built it also before the daies of Camillus, at what time as Mariiu Coriolanus (who led under banners difplaied, against the city of Rome, a puissant power of the Volscians) was turned backe and retired, by the meanes and intercession of certeine noble dames that encountered him: for those ladies went in a solemne ambassage toward him, accom-10 panied with his wife and mother, and fo earneftly intreated and effectually perfwaded with him, that in the end they prevailed, infomuch, as for their fakes he pardoned and spared the citic, and fo withdrew the forces of that barbarous nation: and then it was (by folks fayings) that the statue or image of Fortune at the dedication thereof, pronounced these words: You have (good Romane dames) according to the ordinance of the citic, confecrated me right devoutly. And verily Furius Camillus (at what time as he had quenched the flaming fire of the Gaules, and recovered the city of Rome out of the very fcoles of the balance where it was to bee weighed in counterpoise against a certeine quantitie of golde) erected a temple, neither to Good counsell nor to Valour, but unto * Fame and Rumour, even in that very place by the new freet, where * To Mas Le-(by report) Marcus Ceditius as hee went by the way, heard in the night a voice, that gave wat- suition as form thinke; to the range and advertised, that shortly after they should looke for the Gaules to warre upon them. As for that temple (upon the banke of the river Tyber) of Fortune furnamed Fortis, that is to and, 350fay, Strong, Martiall, Valiant, and Magnanimons, for that to her belonged generofitie and the others. forcible power to tame and overcome all things, they built a temple to the honour of her, within the orchards and gardens that Cafar (by his last will and testament) bequeathed unto the people of Rome; as being perfwaded that himselfe (by the gracious favour of Fortune) became the greatest man of all the Romans, as himselse doth testifie. As concerning Julius Cafar, I would have bene abashed and ashamed to say, that through the savour of Fortune he was listed up to that rare greatnesse, but that his owne selfe beareth witnesse thereof: for being departed from Brindon the fourth day of Ianuary, and imbarked for to purfue Pompeius, even at the verie 30 height and in the heart of Winter, he croffed the feas most fafely, as if Fortune had held in the tempeltuous weather of that feafon; and when he found Pompeius strong and puissant aswell by sea as land, as having all his forces affembled together about him in a fet and standing campe, being himselse but weake and accompanied with a small power; for that the companies which Antonius and Sabinus should have brought, lingered and staied behinde, he adventured to take feaagaine; and putting himfelfeinto a fmall frigat, failed away unknowen both to the mafter, and also to the pilot of the said barke, in simple habit, as if he had bene some meane and ordinary fervitor : but by occasion of a violent returne of the tide, ful against the current of the river, & withall, of a great tempest that arose, seeing that the pilot was readie to alter his course, and turne abaft backe, he plucked away his garment from his head wherewith he fat hoodwinked, and dif-40 covered his face, faying unto the pilot : Holde the helme hard (good fellow) and be not afraid to fet forward : be bolde (I fay) hoife failes, fpred them open to the winde at aventure, and feare not, for thou haft aboord, Cafar and his Fortune. So much perfivaded was he, and confidently affured, that Fortune failed with him, accompanied him in all his marches and voiages, affifled him in the campe, aided him in battell, conducted and directed him in all his warres : whose worke indeed it was, and could proceed from nothing els but her, to command a calme at fea, to procure faire weather and a Summer feason in Winter; to make them swift and numble, who otherwise were most slow and heavie; to cause them to be couragious, who were greatest cowards and most heartlesse; and that which is more incredible than all the rest, to force Pompeyto flic, and Ptolemeus to kill his owne gueft, to the end that Pompey might die, and yet Cafar be not 50 flained with his bloudshed. What should I alledge the testimonic of his sonne, the first emperour furnamed Augustus, who for the space of fittie yeeres and foure, was absolute commander both by sea and land of the whole world? who when he sent his nephew or sisters some to the warres, praied and wished at Gods hands for no more, but that he might prove as valiant as Seipio, and as well beloved as Pompey, and as fortunate as himselfe; ascribing the making of himselfe as great as he was, unto Fortune; as if a man should intitle some singular piece of worke with the name of the workeman or artificer: which Fortune of his, was the cause that he got the start and vantage of Cicero, Lepidus, Paufa, Hirtim, and Marcus Antonius, by whose counsels, brave exploits and proweffes, expeditions, victories, voiages, armadocs, legions, campes, and in one word, by these warres, as well by sea as by land, she made him ever chiefe and principall, lifting him on high still, and putting them downe by whom hee was mounted and advanced; untill in the end . hee remained alone, and had no peere nor fecond. For it was for his fake that Gieera gave counfell: Lepidus ledde an armie; Panfa vanquished the enimie; Hirtius lost his life in the field; and Antonius lived riotoully in drunkennesse, gluttonie, and lecherie: for' I reckon Cleopatra among the favors that Fortune did to Angustus, against whom, as against some rock, Antonius fo great a commaunder, so absolute a prince, and mightie triumvir, should runne himfelfe, besplit, and finke; to the end that Cafar Angustus might survive and remaine alone. And to this purpose reported it is of him; that there being so inward acquaintance and familia-10 rity, as there was among them, that they used often to passe the time away together in playing at tennis, or at dice, or feeing some prety sport of cocks and quailes of the game, which were kept for the nonce to fight: when Antonius went evermore away with the worst, and on the loofing hand; one of his familiar friends, (a man well feene in the art of divination) would manie times frankly fay unto him by way of remonstrance and admonition: Sir, what meane you to meddle or have any dealing with this young gentleman, (meaning Augustus) Fly and avoid his company, I advise you; more renowmed and better reputed you are than he; his elder you are, you have a greater commaund and feignoric than he, more expert in feats of armes, and of better experience and practife by farre: but good fir, your Genius or familiar spirit is afraid of his, your Fortune, which by it felfe apart is great, flattereth and courteth his, and unleffe 20 you remoove your selfe farre from him, it will for sake you quite and goe unto him.

Thus you see what evidences and proofes Fortune may alledge for herselfe, by way of testimonic. But we are befides to bring foorth those which are more reall, and drawen from the things themselves, beginning our discourse at the very foundation and nativitie as it were of Rome city. In the first place therefore, who will not say and confesse, that for the birth, the prefervation, the nouriture, rearing, and education of Romulus, well might the excellencies of Vertue be the hidden ground-worke, and first foundation; but furely it was Fortune alone that raifed the fame above ground, and built all up? For to beginne at the verie generation and procreation, even of those, who first founded and planted the citie of Rome, they seeme both to proceed from a woonderfull favour of rare Fortune: for it is faid, that their mother lay with 30 god Mars, and was by him conceived: and like as the report goeth, that Hereules was begotten in a long night, by reason that the day extraordinarily, and besides the course of nature was held backe, and the funne stated in his race and rifing; even so we finde it recorded in histories, that when Romulus was gotten, and conceived, the funne became ecclipfed, by reason of his ful conjunction indeed with the moone, like as Mars being a very god, medled with Sylvia a mortall woman: also that the same hapned againe unto Romulus, just upon the very same day when hee was translated out of this life: for they fay, that even at the very instant when the funne entred into the ecclipfe, he also departed out of fight, and was no more seene; which fell out to be upon the day called Nona Capratina: upon which day, the Romans doe still at this present celebrate a solemne feast. Now when these first founders were in this manner bred and 40 borne; after that the tyrant fought to make them away, by good fortune it happed, that the minister to take them and execute the deed, was neither a barbarous nor a mercilesse cruell slave, but a gracious and pitifull fervitour, who would in no wife murder the filly babes: but finding a convenient place, upon the banke by the river fide, adjoyning hard to a faire greene meddow, and shadowed with pretietrees growing low by the ground; there he bestowed the infants, neere unto a wilde figge tree, which they called afterwards Ruminalis; for that a teat or pappe in Latin is called Ruma; which done, it chaunced that a bitch-woolfe having newly whelped her litter, and feeling her pappes bestruct with milke, and so stiffe by reason that her young ones were dead, that they aked againe, and were ready to burft, feeking to be eafed and to difcharge her-felfe thereof; came gently to these babes, stooped downe, and seemed to windea- 50 bout them, put unto them her teats, defirous & labouring to be delivered of her milk, as if it had beene a second litter: And then (see the fortune of it) a certeine bird (consecrated to Mars, which thereupon men name in Latine Picus Martius, that is to fay, a Speght or Wood-pecker) chaunced to approch neere, and having alighted gently upon the tips of her toes fast by them, & loftly opened with one of her clees the mouthes of these infants, one after another, the conveied into them certeine morfels, minced finall, even of her owne food & provision. That this is true, the faid wilde fig tree at this day is named Rumnalis of the woolves teat, called in Latine

Ruma, which she held unto the babes for to suckle them, doth testific. And long time after, the inhabitants about that place have observed this custome; not to expose and call foorth any thing that is bred and borne amongst them; but to reare and nourish all, in a venerable memoriall of this happe and refemblance of the accident which befell unto Romulus and his brother Remus. Now that these two fondlings were nourished and brought up afterward in the citie of Gabii, unknowen to all the world that they were the children of Sylvia, and the nephewes or daughters children of Numitor the king; may feeme to be acraftic theevith calt, and deceitfull sophistrie, proceeding from Fortune 3 to the end that they should not perish before they haddone some woorthy exploit, by reason of their noble birth, but be discovered by their ve-10 ry deeds and effects; ficwing their vertue as a marke of their nobilitie. And heere I call to minde a certeine speech which Themistocles (a brave and wife captaine) upon a time gave to fome other captaines, who after him, and in a fecond place, were in great name at Athens, and much effected, howbeit pretending to deserve more honour than he: The morrow-mind (quoth he) quarrelled and contended upon a time with the feast or holi-day, which went before it flaying. That she was * full of labour and businesse, and never had any rest; whereas in het *xama.6< not there was nothing but eating and drinking that, which before hand had beene prepared and especially. provided with great paine and travell; unto whom the feast made this answer: Certes, true it is, that thou faiest; but if I had not bene, where hadst thou bene? Even so (quoth Themistoeles) if I had not conducted the Medians warre, what good would you have done now? and where 20 had your imploiment bene? Semblably, methinks that Fortune faith the fame unto the Vertue of Romulus: Thy acts are famous, and thy deeds renowmed; thou half shewed by them indeed, that descended thou art from divine bloud and some heavenly race; but thou seeft againe, how farreshort thou art of me, how long after me it was, ere thou didst come in place; for if I had not (when time was) shewed my selfekinde, gracious and courteous unto those poore infants, but had forfaken and abandoned them filly wretches, how could you have had any being, and by what meanes should you have bene so gloriously seene in the world? in case (I fay) a female wilde beaft, even a free wolfe, had not come in the way, having her bigs swollen, enflamed and aking with the plentie of milke, flowing (as it were) aftreame unto them, feeking rather whom to feed, than by who she should be fed? or if the had bene alrogether favage indeed & hunger-30 bitten; these roiall houses, these stately temples, these magnificent theaters, these saire galleries, these goodly halles, palaces and counsell chambers, had they not bene at this day, the lodges, cottages and stalles of shepherds and herdmen, serving (as slaves) some lords of Alba and Tascan, or els some masters of the Latine nation? The beginning, in all things, is chiefe and principall, but especially in the foundation and building of a city; and Fortune is the who is the authour of this beginning and foundation, in faving and preferving the founder himselfe: for well may Vertue make Romulus great, but Fortune kept him untill he became great.

It is for certeine knowen and confessed, that the reigne also of Numa Pompilius, which continued long, was guided and conducted by the favour of a marvellous Fortune: for to fay that the nymph Aegeria, one of the Wood-Fairies, called Dryades, a wife and prudent goddeffe, was ena-40 moured of him, and that lying ordinarily by his fide, taught him how to establish, governe and rule the weale-publicke, peradventure is a meere fabulous tale; confidering that other persons, who are recorded to have bene loved by goddeffes (and to have enjoied them in mariage; as for example, Peleus, Anchifes, Orion & Emathion) had not for all that (thorowout their life) contentment and prosperitie, without some trouble and adversitie: but surely it seemeth that Numa in very trueth had good Fortune for his domesticall and familiar companion, and to reigne jointly with him; which Fortune of his (receiving the citic of Rome, as in a boilterous and troublefome tempelt, or in a turbulent fea, to wit, in the enmittie, envie and malice of all the neighbor-cities and nations bordering upon it; and befides disquieted within it selfe, and troubled with an infinit number of calamities and feditious factions) quenched all those flames of anger, and alaied 50 all spightfull and malicious grudges, as some boilterous and contrary windes. And like as men fay, that the fea, even in mid-winter receiveth the yong brood of the birds Halcyones, after they benewly hatched, and giveth them leave to be nourifhed and fed in great calme and tranquilitie; even so Fortune (spreading and drawing round about this people newly planted, and as yet ready towag and shake every way, such a quiet and still season, void of all busie affaires, without warres, without mortalitie, without danger or feare of danger) gave good meanes unto the citie of Rome to take root and fet fure footing, growing still in repose with all securitie, and without any hinderance and impeachment whatfoever. Much like therefore, as a great carraque, hulke or gallie, is framed, wrought and fet together by many a knocke and ftroke, and that with great violence; whiles it feeleth the blowes of fledges and hammers, is pierced with spikes and great nailes, cut with fawes, axes and hatchets; and when it is once made and finished by the shipwright, ought to rest quiet and in repose, for a competent time, untill the braces be well selled and fastened, and the joints firmly knit and compact : for otherwise, he that should stirre it, and shoot it into the sea, whiles yet the junctures and commissiones be yet greene, fresh, loose, and not well confolidate, all would chinke, cleave and open, when it came to be never fo little shaken and toffed by the boifterous billowes of the fea, fo that the would leake & take in water thorowout: even fo, the first prince, authour and founder of the city of Rome, having composed it of rufficall peifants and herdmen, as it were, of rough-hewen planks and pofts of rough and flubburne oake, had much adoe, and tooke no finall paines, but engaged himfelfe farre into fundry warres, and exposed his person and estate to manifold and great dangers, being of necessity enforced to encounter and fight with those who opposed themselves, and withstood the nativitie (as it were) and foundation thereof, before he could bring his worke to an end; but the fecond king receiving the fame at his hands, gave it good time and leafure to gather ftrength, and to confirme the growth and augmentation thereof by the favour of happie Fortune, who affoorded him the meanes to enjoy great peace and long repose. But if at that time, some such as king Porfenna, had come against it, pitching his campe before it, and leading a strong armic of Tuskans to give affault thereto, whiles the walles were yet greene, foft, and ready to shake with every finall thing; or if fome puffant prince and potentate, or woorthy warriour from among 20 the Marsians, upon apostasse and revolt; or els some Lucan, for envie or upon a troublesome ipirit and defire of contention, a bufi-headed person, factious and quaressome, such an one as afterwards Mutius or from Silon was, furnamed the Bolde; or last of all, Telesinus, with whom Sylla fcuffled, an found himselfe somewhat to do; him I meane, who (as it were) with one signal could make all Italie rife and take armes: if one of these (I say) had come and given the alarme, environing and affailing with found of trumpets this Sage-like prince and philosopher Numa, whiles he was at facrifice, or in his devotions and praires to the gods; furely the citie in that infancy of hers and first beginnings, had never beneable to have held out and withstood so great aftorme and tempest, neither had it growen up as it did, to so goodly a number of lustic and ferviceable men: whereas, it feemeth that the long peace which continued under this king, ferved in stead of a provision of furniture and all forts of munition for innumerable warreson. fining; and the people of Rome, much like unto a champion who hath to fight a combat, having bene exercifed and enured at leafure, in a peaceable time, for the space of three and forty yeeres after the warres which they had fought under Romalus, became ftrong enough, and fufficient to make head against those that afterwards assailed them : for it is for certeine recorded, that during all that time, there was neither peftilence nor famine, no unkinde barrenneffe of the earth, nor unscasonable diffemperature of Winter or Summer, to afflict or trouble the city of Rome, as if there had beene no humane providence, but onely a divine Fortune which tooke the care and government of all those yeeres. In those daies likewise it was, that the two-leaved doores of the temple of Janus were thut up and locked fast, those (I meane) which they call the gates of 40 warre, for that they were fet open in the time of warre, and kept shut when it was peace. No sooner was king Numa dead, but these gates were opened for the Albane watre, which brake out suddenly and with great violence, and so stood open still, during an infinit number of other warres ensuing continually one after another thereupon: but in processe of time, namely, about source hundred and foure score yeres after, they were shut againe, when the first Punicke warre was ended, and peace concluded with the Carthaginians, even that yeere, wherein C. Attilius and Titus Manlius were confuls. After this, they were fet open by occasion of new warres, which lasted untill the very time that Cafar Augustus wan that noble victoric under the Promontory Actium. Then had the Romans a ceffation or furcease of armes, but the same continued not long; for that the tumultuous stirres of the Biscains, the Galatians and Germains comming all together, 50 troubled the peace. And thus much may serve out of histories, for testimonies in behalfe of the felicity and good Fortune of king Numa.

But the Kiugs also that raigned in Rome after him, highlie honoured Fortune, as the chiefe patronesse, and the prop or piller, as Pindarus saith, which supported and upheld the citie of Rome; as we may judge by the reasons and arguments following. There is at Rome, I wot well, the temple of Vertue highlie honored: but founded it was and built of late daies, even by Marcellus, who forced and won the citie of Syraeusa. There was another also in the honor of reason, understanding, or good advice, which they called by the name of Mentis: but Aemilius Seawus was the man who dedicated it; about the time of the Cimbricke warres . For that by this, the learning, the artes and pleafant eloquence of the Greekes were crept already into the citie: but, to wildome there is not yet to this day fo much as one temple or chappell; neither to temperance, nor patience; ne yet to magnanimitie, wheras of Fortune there be many churches and temples verie auncient, and those much frequented; and to speake in one word, celebrated with all kinds of honor; as being founded and erected amid the nobleft parts, and most conspicuous places of the citie. For there is the temple of Masculine Fortune called Fortuna virilis, which was built by Martius Ancus the fourth king of Rome, and by him fo called; for that he to thought that Fortune availed as much as Fortitude to the obtaining of victoric. As for the other, entituled by the name of Fortune Feminine; otherwise called Fortuna Muliebris, everic man knoweth that they were the dames of the citie, who dedicated it, after they had averted and turned backe Martius Coriolanus, who was come with a puisant power of enemies, and prefented himselfe before the citie. And Servius Tullius who augmented the puissance of the people of Rome, and brought it unto a goodlie and beautifull maner of government, no prince fo much, having set downe and established a good order for the giving of suffrages and voices at the elections of magistrates, and enacting of lawes: and besides instituted the order of millitarie discipline; having been himselfe the first censour of mens maners, and the controller or overfeer of every mans life and behaviour; who feemed also to have been a right valiant 20 prince, and most prudent withall: this man I say, whollie avowed himselfe the vassaile of Fortune, and did homage to her, acknowledging all principalitie to depend upon her; in such fort asmen fay Fortune her selfe used to come & lie with him, descending downe by a window into his chamber; which now the call the gate Feneftella. He founded therefore within the Capitoll one temple to the honor of Fortune, called Primigenia, which a man may interpret, first begotten and another to Fortune obsequens, which some take to be as much as obeisant; others, gratious and fauourable. But not to stand any longer upon the Romaine names and appellations; I will leave them, & endevour to reckon up and interpret in Greekeahe meaning and fignification of all these temples, founded and dedicated in the honor of Fortune. For in the mount Palatine there flandeth one chappell of private Fortune; and another of gluing Fortune: 30 which tearme may haplie feeme to be ridiculous; howbeit, by way of a metaphor it carieth a fignification verie important, as if we were to understand thus much by it: That it draweth unto it, and catcheth those things which be farre off, and holdeth fast what loever sticketh and cleawith to it. Moreouer, neere unto the fountaine called Muscofa, that is to fay, mossie; there is another chappell of Fortune the virgin: as also in the mount Efquilius, another of Aduerse Fortune; upon the streete called the Long Way, an altar there is erected to Fortune Goodhope; or, as it were Hope: and neere adjoining unto the altar of Venus Epi-talaria, that is istofay, Foote-winged Venus, a chappell and image of Fortune Malculine: befides a thoufand honors and denominations more of Fortune, which Servius for the most part instituted and ordeined; as knowing full well, that in the regiment of all humane things, Fortune is of 40 great importance, or rather can doe all in all. And good reason he had therefore, considering that himselfe by the beneficiall favor of Fortune, being descended as he was by birth from a captive, and that of an enemie nation, was raifed and advaunced to royall dignitic. For when the citie of the Corniculanes was won forciblie by the Romanes, a certaine young damfell named Oerisia, being taken prisoner (who notwithstanding her infortunate captivitie; was neither for beauty of face, nor comely behaviour blemished or stained) was given unto queene Tanaquil, the wife of king Tarquin, to serve her, and afterwards bestowed in marriage upon one of the reteiners or dependants to the king; such as the Romans call Chentes: and from these two came this forefaid Servine. Others fay, that it was nothing fo; but that this maiden Oerifia taking ordinarily certaine first frutes or affaics as it were, both of viands and wine from the kings 50 table, carried the same to the hearth of the domesticall altar; and when one day above the rest the cast these primicies or libaments aforesaid (as her usuall manner was) into the fire upon the hearth; behold all on the fudden when the flame went out; there arose out of the said hearth, the genitall member of a man; whereat the yoong damofell being affrighted, reported what a strange fight she had seene, unto queene Tanaquil alone: who being a wise and wittie ladie, appparelled and adorned the maiden like a bride in every respect, and shut her up with the forefaid apparition; taking it for a divine thing, prefaging fome great matter. Some fay, that this was the domesticall or ture larged of the house, whom they call Lar; others Vulcane, who was enamored of this yoong virgine: but whatfoever it was, Oerifa was thereupon with childe, and fo was Servius borne. Now whiles he was but an infant, there was feene a thining light, much like unto the flash of lightning, to blaze out of his head round about. But Valerius Antica recordeth this narration otherwife: faying, that Servius had a wife named Gegania, who happed to die; by occasion of whose death, hee grew into a great agonie and passion of forrow, in the presence of his mother, untill in the end for very heavinesse and melancholy, hee fell a sleepe, and as he flept, the woman of the house might perceive his head shining out in a light fire; a fufficient argument and testimonie; that engendred he was of fire; yea, and an affored presage of a kingdome unlooked for; which he attained unto after the decease of Tarquinius, by meanes of the port and favour that Tanaquil graced him with . For otherwife, of all the kings that were 10 of Rome, he seemed to bee the man that was unlikest to reach unto a monarchie, and least intended, or minded to aspire thereunto: considering that when he was king, he determined to refigne up the crowne; though hee was empeached and staied for so doing: because Tanaquil upon her death-bed conjured and bound him by an oath to continue in his roiall efface and dignitie, and in no case to give over the politike government of the Romans, wherein hee was borne. Lo, how the regall power & kingdome of Servius may be wholly afcribed unto Fortune. feeing that as hee came unto it beyond all hope and expectation, so hee held it even against

But to the end it may not be thought, that we withdraw our felves and retire, flying unto antiquitie, as it were into a place obfeure and darke, for want of more cleere and evident proofes, let us leave the historic of the kings, and turne our speech unto the most glorious acts of the Romans, and their warres, which were of greatest name and renowne: wherein I will not deny; and who is there but must confesse? there did concurre

according as Timothem the poetwriteth? but the prosperous traine and happy course of their affaires, the violent fireame also, & current of their progresse into such puffance & growth of greatnesse, sheweth evidently unto those who are able to discourse with reason, and to judge aright, that this was a thing conducted neither by the hands nor counsels, ne yet by the affection ons of men, but by some heavenly guidance and divine direction, even by a fore-winde and gale of Fortune blowing at the poupe, and haltening them forward. Trophees upon trophees by them were erected, one triumph met with another continually; the former bloud upon the weapons not yet cooled, but still warme was washed away by new bloudshed comming upon it: they reckoned and numbered their victories, not by the multitude of enemies flaine and heapes of spoiles, but counted them by realmes subdued, by nations conquered and brought to subjection, by isles and firme lands of the continent reduced into servitude and bondage, and all to augment the greatnesse of their empire. In one battell king Philip was chased out of Macedonia: one blow and one conflict caused Antiochus to abandon and forgoe Mis: by 40 one defaiture the Carthaginians lost Lybia: one man alone in one expedition, and by the power * All this is to of one armie, * conquered unto them Armenia, the kingdome of Pontus, the fea Euximus, bounderflood Syria, Arabia, the Albanians, the Iberians, all the nations even as fatre as the mountaine Cancasus, and the Hircanians, yea and the very ocean sea which environeth the world round about; faw the fame man thrife victor and conquerour: the Nomades in Affricke he repreffed and vanquished, even to the coasts of the fouth sea: he subdued Spaine which revolted and rebelled with Sertorius, as far as to the atlantike fea: the kings of the Albanians he purfued, & never left the chase until he had driven them to the Caspian sea. Al these brave exploits and glorious conquelts he atchieved, so long as he used the publique Fortune of the citie, but afterwards he was overthrowen and came to ruine by his owne private defires. Now that great Demon and tute-lar god of the Romans, did not fecond them for a day as it were and no more; neither in a fhort time did his best and came to the height and vigor of his gracious favour, as that of the Macedonians; nor gave them his affiftance upon the land onely, as he who was the patron of the Lacedemonians; or at sea alone, as the Athenians god; ne yet was long ere he would stirre, as he whom the Colophonians trufted upon; no, nor gave over quickly, as the Perfians patrondid: but even from the very nativitie and foundation of the citie; it began, it grow up, waxed, and went forward as it did, it managed the government of it, it continued firme and fure with it, by land, by fea, in warre, in peace, against Barbarians, and against the Greeks: He it was that when Anniball the Carthaginian overspred all Italy, in manner of a land floud, or violent brooke, wrought it fo, that partly through envie, and in part through the malice of his fpightfull fellow-citizens, no fuccours and fupplies were fent to feed and mainteine him; and fo by that meanes walted, fpent, and confumed him to nothing in the end : he it was that dispersed and kept the armies and forces of the Cimbrians, & Teutonians a great way, and a long time afunder, fo as they could not meet; to the end that Marius might be furnished and provided fufficiently to fight with them, and to defait them both, one after another: hee empeached the joining together of three hundred thouland fighting men at one time; all invincible foldiers, 10 and appointed with armes insuperable, that they might not invade and over-runne all Haly. For this cause, and by the meanes of this protector, Amiochus sas still, and stirred not to aid Phil. p, all the whiles that the Romans made tharpe warre upon him: likewife, when Anisochus was in diftreffe and danger of his whole estate, Philip being discomfitted before, durst not hold up his head, and died the while: he, and none but he procured, that whiles the Marsians warre fer all Rome and Italy on a light fire, the Sarmatian, and Bastarnianwarre held king Mithridates occupied. Finally, through his procurement, king Tigranes, when Mithridates flourished, and was in his ruffe most puissant, upon suspition, envie, and distrust, would not joine with him; and afterwards when the faid Mithridates had an overthrow, combined and banded with him, that in the end he might also lose his life and perish with him for company.

Romans Fortune.

What! in the greatest distresses and calamities that lay heavie upon the citie; was it not the Romane Fortune that redreffed all, and fet it upright againe? As for example: When as the Gaules were encamped round about the mount Capitoll, and held the castle befreged:

A plague she sent, the souldiers soone fell suke, Throughout their host, whereof they died thicke.

Forume also it was, & meere chance, that revealed their comming in the night, & gave advertifement thereof, when no man in the world either knew or doubted thereof: and peradventure it would not be impertinent and befides the purpose, in this place to discourse of it more at large. After the great discomfiture and overthrow that the Romans received neare the river as many as could fave themselves by good foot-manship, when they were come to Rome, filled the whole citie with a fright and trouble; infomuch, as the people woonderfully amazed with this fearefull newes, fledde feattering heere and there, excepting onely a few, who putthemselves within the castle of the Capitoll, resolved to keepe that piece, and abide the extremitie of the flege: others who escaped after that unfortunate battell and defeiture, affembledthemselves immediately in the citie Veii; and chose for their dictator Furius Camillus, a man, who the people (proud & infolent upon their long prosperitie) had before time rejected, and fent away into banifliment, condemning him for robbing the common treature; but then being humbled by his affliction, and brought to a low ebbe; called him backe againe, after that discomfiture; committing and putting into his hands, the absolute power and soveraigne authoritie; but to the end it might not be thought, that it was by the occasion of the iniquitie and 40 infortunity of the time, and not according to order of law, that the man excepted of this high magistracie, and that in a desperare state of the citie, without all hope that ever it should rife againe, he was elected by the tumultuary fuffrages of a broken armie, differfed and wandring heere and there: his will was, that the fenators of Rome who had retired themselves within the Capitoll aforefaid, should be made acquainted and advertised thereof, and that by their uniforme confent, they might approove and confirme that election of him, which the fouldiors and men of watre had decreed. Now among the others, there was one named Caius Pontius, a valiant and hardy man, who undertooke, and promifed in his owne person to goe and carry the newes of that which had beene determined, unto those who abode within the Capitol; and verily he enterprized athing exceeding dangerous, for that hee was to paffe through the middes 50 of the enernies, who then invested the Capitoll with trenches, and a strong corps-de-guard: when he was come to the river fide by night, he fastened just under his brest certaine broad pieces of plates of corke, and to committing his body to the lightnesse of such a barge, hee bare himselfe thereupon, and hulled with the course of the water, which was so good and favourable unto him, that it carried him over, and fet him gently upon the banke on the other fide of the river, without any danger at all; where he was no fooner landed, but hee went directly toward that place which he faw was without all light, conjecturing by the darkneffe and filence withall, that he should not light upon any of the watch or ward there: thus he began to climbe Hhh up the steepe rocke, whereas he could find any way to set sure footing upon the stones that stuck out, or wherefoever he found a place to yeeld better accesse and ascent than another; so fetching a compatte, and catching hold with his hand upon the rough cragges, and bearing himfelfe as well as possibly he could, he made such shift, that in the end he crawled up to the toppe thereof; and there those Romans that kept watch and ward, and were foremost of the corps deguard, having efficid him, helped to pull him up: then declared lice unto those within the place, what had beene fet downe and agreed upon by them who were without, from whom hee had no fooner received their affent and approbation of the forefaid ordinance concluded, but the veric fame night he made his returne the way that he came, unto Camillus: the next morning, one of the barbarous enemies, as hee walked about that place, thinking of no fuch thing, perceiving by very chaunce, partly the print of a mans tiptoes, together with the marks of uniteady footing, and partly the graffe and weeds crushed and broken, which grew heere and there in fuch places, where they had fome little earth to mainteine them; as also the tracts and traces where he had leaned and wreftled with his bodie, either in clambring up, or ftriving overthwart; went straight waies and related unto his fellow-souldiors what he had seene; who taking it thus, that the enemies themselves thewed them the way, and trode it out before them, affaied prefently to doe the like, and to gaine the toppe of the rocke. In the night time therefore having observed where the place was most folitary, and void of watchmen, they mounted up, without being descried and discovered, not onely by the men who were in guard and sentinell, but not fo much as by the dogges, which were fet a front before, for to affift the watch, 20 to fleepie they were all, both the one and the other. Howbeit, the good Fortune of Rome wanted no voice to bewray fo imminent a danger, and to give warning thereof; for there were within the Capitoff certeine geefe confectated into the goddesse Juno, kept at the cities charges, in the honour of her, close under her temple: now is this creature of all others by nature very timorous, and at every little noise that is made, ready to be affrighted; and at that time especially, by reason that there was within the place great scarcitic of victuals, they were neglected, and for that they were kept formewhat hungry, flept not fo foundly as they were wont to doe; by reafon whereof, at the first, being aware of the enemies comming, even so soone as they had gotten over the battlements of the wals, they came ful but upon them, & being affrighted besides to fee their bright armour, fet up fuch a gagling note after their manner, that all the court of the 20 caltle rung with their violent and disconant noise: whereat the Romans were awakened, and suffice ting deepely what the matter was, ranne incontinently to the wall, gave the enemies the repulfe, and turned them downe with their heads forward: in memoriall of which accidents and occurrents, Fortune goeth as it were in triumph even at this day. For at Rome they are woont upon a certeine fet day of the yeere in a folemne procession, to have a dogge carried in a thew, crucified; and a goofe borne in a gorgeous litter upon a rich cushion, most sumptuous ly dight and fet out: which spectacle representeth and sheweth unto us the puissance of Fortune, and the great meanes that the hath to effect all those things with ease and facilitie, which in mans reason seeme unpossible; considering that she giveth a kinde of wittie perceivance and understanding, to brute beasts, otherwise foolish and voide of reason; yea and infuseth 40 bold courage and thrength to those which by nature are fearefull, weake, and cowardly. For what man is there, unlesse he be altogether deprived of natural sense and affection, who would not be aftonied and ravithed againe with a woonderfull admiration, to confider and discourse after a fort with himselfe, comparing the heavie cheere and mourneful condition of this citie in those daies, with the selicitie and statelieport thereof at this present; to looke up (I faie) to the Capitoll, and behold the riches there, the sumptuositie and magnificence of the monuments and oblations there to bee feene; the excellent pieces of worke, wrought by most cunning artificers, striving who might doe best; the presents of cities, contending who thould bee most bounteous and liberall; the crownes sent by kings and princes, and what precious things foever the earth, the fea, the illands, the firme lands of the continent, 50 the rivers, trees, beafts, champain fields, mountaines and metall-mines doe affoord; and in one word, the first fruits and choise parcels of all things in the world, which seeme all to strive one with another, to embelifh, grace, adorne, enrich and beautifie this onely place? and withall, to looke backe unto those times past, and consider how it went within a very little, that all this thould never have beene, or at least wife not extant at this day; feeing that all being within the power of mercileffe fire, fearefull darkneffe of the mirke night, cruell and barbarous fwords, and most bloudy minds and inhumane hearts of these Gaules; the poore contemptible beasts, foo-lift, reasons less and timorous, made the overture to save all, and were the principall instruments of prefervation; also, how those brave gallants, valourous knights, and great captaines and commanders, the Mantii, the Servii, the Posthumii and Papyrii, the ancestours and progenitours of so many noble houses afterwards, were very neere and at the point to have beene undone for ever, and come to nothing; had not these filly geese awakened and started up to fight for their countrey, and to defend the god, patron, and protection of the city. And if it be true that Polybins writeth in the fecond booke of his historie, as touching those Gaules, who at that time surprifed the city, and were lords of Rome: That when newes came fuddenly unto them, how certeine of their barbarous neighbous neere at hand, were entred in armes within their owner to countrey, and won all before them as they went; they had returned in half backe, and made peace with Camillus, certes, without all doubt, Fortune even then had bene the cause also of the cities fafetie, in distracting the enemies, or rather in withdrawing them another way contrary to all hope and expectation of man. But what need we to fland thus upon these old histories, wherein there is no certeintie to build upon delivered; confidering that the state of Rome was then ruinate, and all their annales, records, registers and memorials either perished or confounded, according as Livie himselfe hath left in writing; feeing that the affaires of the Romans which happened afterward, and cary more light and perspicultie with them, declare and testific sufficiently the love and indulgence of Fortune? For mine owne part, I count this for one fingular favor of hers, to wit, the death of Alexander the Great, a prince of incomparable courage, and 20 spirit invincible, who being lifted up by many great prosperities, glorious conquests and happy victories, lanced himselse in maner of a starre volant in the aire, leaping out of the East into the Well, and beginning not to shoot the slaming beames and slathing raies of his armour as farre as into Italie; having for a pretenfe and colourable cause of this enterprise and expedition of his, the death of his kinfman Alexander the Miloffian, who together with his army, was by the Brutians and Lucanians (necre unto the citie Pandassa) put to the sword and cut in pieces: although (in trueth) that which caried him thus against all nations, was nothing els but a desire of glory and fovereignty, having proposed this unto himselse upon a spirit of zeale and emulation, to surpasse the acts of Baschus and Hercules, and to go with his armic beyond the bounds of their voiages and expeditions. Moreover, he had heard fay, that he should find the force and yalour of the Romans, to be as it were a gad of steele, to give edge unto the sword of Italie; and he knew well enough (by the generall voice and report abroad in the world, which was brought unto him) that famous warriours they were, and of greatest renowne, as being exercised and hardened like frout champions in warres and combats innumerable,

And werily, as I do weene.

A bloudy fight there would have beene, if the undanted and unconquered hearts of the Romans, had encountred in the field with the invincible armies of the Macedonians: for furely the citizens of Rome were no fewer at that time innumber, by just computation, than a hundred and thirty thousand fighting men, able all to beare armes, and hardy withall:

Who expert were on horfebacke for to fight, And when they faw their time, on foot to light.

The rest of this discourse is lost, wherein we misse the reasons and arguments that Vertue alledgeth for herselse in herplea.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Whether we may discourse of learning and philosophie at the table.

Ome there be (fir Sossim Senerio) who fay that this ancient proverbe in Greeke, Music must make an entire.

have beene mery together. Hecreupon it is, that in our countrey, men commonly fay: That both oblivion and also the palmar, or the plant Ferula, that is to say, Fenel-giant, be confecrated unto Bacchus; which giveth us to understand, that the errours and faults which passe at the table, are either not to be remembred at all, or els deserve to be chasticed gently as children are. But seeing you also are of the same minde that Euripides was, namely: That howsoever yet the oblivion generally of all that is spoken at the boord and when we drinke wine, is not only repugnant to this vulgar saying: That the table makes many a striend; but also hath divers of the most renowmed and excellent philosophers to be are winted to the contrary, to wit, Plato, to Xenophon, Aristotle, Speusppp, Epicurus, Prytanis, Hieronymus and Dion the Academique, who all have thought and reputed it a thing woorth their travell, to put downe in writing, the talke that had bene held at meat & drinke in their presence. And for that you have thought it meet, that I also should collect and gather together the principall and most memorable points of learned discourses, which have passed fundry times and in divers places, both here and there; I meane asswell at Rome among you, as also with us in Greece, when we were eating and drinking together among our friends; I settled my selfe unto it willingly; and having sent unto youthree books heretofore, conteining every one of them ten questions, I will shortly send you theref; if I may perceive that these which you have already, were not altogether thought unlearned, importinent, and without good grace.

Bad things and filthie to forget, Indeed, is counted wildome great,

The first question then, which I have set abroad, is this: Whether it be a feemly and decent thing, to philosophize, that is to say: To speake and treat of matters of learning at the table? for you may remember very well, that this question being moved upon a time at Athens after supper: Whether it were besitting those who are come to make good cheere, for to enter into fpeech, or mainteine discourse, as touching philosophicall matters or no? and if it were: How far-forth it might be allowed, and within what bounds it ought to be limited? \artifon, one of the company there prefent: What (quoth he) and are there any persons indeed (tell me for the love of God) who denie philosophers and learned men a roome at the boord? Yea mary are there (my good friend, quoth I againe) who not onely doe fo, but also in good earnest and great gravitie (after their ironicall maner) give out and fay: That philosophie, which is (as it 30 were) the miffresse of the house, ought not to be heard speaking at the boord, where men are met to make merry; who commend also the maner of the Persians for good and wise, who never would feeme to drinke wine merily, and untill they were drunke, nor yet to daunce with their wedded wives, but in the company of their concubines; for femblably, they would have us at our feafts and banquets, to bring in muficke, dances, plaies, masks and counterfeit pleafures, but in no wife meddle with philosophie; as if the were never meet for mirth and play, nor weat frich a time fit and disposed for serious study. For even so the oratour Hocrates (say they) could never be brought to make any other answere to those that earnestly intreated him, and were very urgent, that he should make some good speech before them, when he and they were drinking wine, but this: The time fitteth not now for those matters which I professe, and have skillin; 40 and of fuch things as this prefent time requireth, I am altogether unskilfull. Then Cratocrying out with a loud voice : Now fo god Bacchus helpe me (quoth he) I con the man thanke, and commend him highly, for refusing and (as it were) for swearing talke at table, in case he meant those long clauses and tedious traines or periods of sentences of his, wherewith he should have driven away all the Graces from the feaft. But, in my conceit, it is not all one, to banish from the boord an affected speech or rhetorical language; & to chase away a philosophical discourse; for certainly, philosophic is a farre different thing, which being the arte professing to teach us how we are to live, there is no reason to thut the doores against her, at any game, sport, or pleafant paltime for our recreation whatfoever: for the ought to fland by, and be prefent at all, for to instruct us what time, what measure and meane we should observe : unlesse by the same rule, 50 we will fay, that we must not admit to our feasts, either Justice or Temperance, or other vertues, as scorning and scoffing (for sooth) their venerable gravitie. Now, if we were to eat and drinke fome where in a folemne judiciall hall or publike place of justice, as the maner is of those who feathed Orestes, and enterteined him with all silence; somewhat it were, and peradventure it might ferve for some pretense or excuse (though the same were but an untoward and unhappie precedent) to colour and cloake our ignorance and incivilitie: but in case, Bacchus be by right furnamed Lysus or Lydius, that is to say, the Deliverer and Setter-free of all things, and principally of the tongue, from which it taketh away the bit and bridle, giving all libertie to the voice; I suppose it were meere folly and sortishnesses indeed, to deprive that time (which commonly is most talkative and tullest of words) of the best speeches and most fruitfull discourses: It were absented (I say) to dispute in schoole, what duties are to be observed at a feast; what is the office of a guest; how a man should be have himselfe at the table; & in what for the ought to drinke wine; and then afterwards wholly bereave all banquets and feasts of philosophy, as if she were not able to confirme that by deed, which she prescribeth and teacheth in word. And when thereupon, you inferred and said: That it was unmeet and bootlesse to goe about for to contradict Crass in these points, but it behooved rather to studie what limits to appoint, and what prescript forme to steet downe of philosophicall discourses at the table, to avoid that jest (which usually and not unpleasantly is cast foorth at them, who are given litigiously to cavill, argue and dispute, when they should eat) taken out of this verse of Homer:

For this time now to supper goeyee, That soone twixt us a combat may bee.

and with all exhorted and animated me to speake mine advice, I entred into speech and faid. That first and formost I thought it a point especially to be considered, what manner of persons are meet at a feaft, and what the company is ? for if there be more in number of learned men than of others at the boord, fuch as the table was of Agathon, of Socrates, of Phedrus, Paulanias, Eryximachus, Calbias Charmidas, Amisthenes, Hermogenes and others like unto them, 20 fuffer them we will to have philosophicall talke, tempering and mixing Bacchus, (that is to fair wine) no leffe with the muses than with the Nymphes, (that is to saywaters;) for that, as these makehim to enter and goe downe into the bodie milde and gentle; fo the other may cause him to be as kinde, curteous, and acceptable to the minde. For if so bee there are some few ignorant and unlettered persons, among many learned and skilfull clearks, yet will they like unto mute letters, and confonants betweene vowels, participate with them in a kinde of voice, not altogether inarticulate and unfignificant, yea, and learne fomewhat by those meanes, of their skill and knowledge: but fay there be a fort of rude guests, such as can abide to heare either the crowing and finging of any bird whatfoever, or the found of any string or piece of wood, it skils not what it be, rather than the toong of a philosopher: then were it good to practise that 30 which Pififtratus did; who being at fome debate and difference with his owne children, and perceiving that his enemies were well enough contented therewith, and laughed thereat in their fleeves; called a folemue affemblie, wherein hee delivered this speech unto the people: That defirous he had beene indeed to have drawen his children to his owne opinion, but fince it would not be, and seeing how obstinate they were bent, he meant to be ruled by them, and to follow their minde; even so a learned man and a philosopher being matched with other guests, that have no lift at all to give eare unto his fage fawes and wife words, will raunge himfelfe to their fide, and change his owne conceit, he will I fay, daunce after their pipe, and take pleafure in their pastimes, folong as they exceed not the bounds of honestie and civilities as knowing thus much: That men cannot flew and exercise their eloquence but in speaking, but 40 they may declare and practife their philophie even in filence and faying nothing; yea, and indisporting themselves with others, giving and taking pretic scoffes interchangeably. For it is not onely a point (as Plato faith,) of extreme injustice, when a man is unjust, to make a femblance and thew of justice, but also a kind of soveraigne &principal wisdome to philosophic, & yet to feemeno philosopher, & by way of game & mirth, to doe the ferious offices of those that are in good earnest, studious: for like as the frantike women in Euripides called Baccha, without armes or any weapon of iron and steele, onely smiting with their little javelits or ferula-stems, wounded those that set upon them; even so the pleasant words of true philosophers indeed, call out by way of jeft, yea, and the very laughters of wife men are able to moove and correct in some fort, such as are not altogether incorrigible, nor so hard as nothing will pierce and en-50 ter into them. Moreover, I suppose there be certeine narrations fit to be related at a feast where men are affembled, whereof fome be drawen out of written histories, others, prefent occasions and occurrences do daily yeeld, and those conteine examples to incite and provoke men partly to the study of philosophie, and in part to pietie, religion & devotion toward the gods: some induce us to imitate generous & magnanimous acts, others ingender a fervent zeale to performe the works of bountie and humanitie: which precedents, he that can closely and with dexterity use as documents and instructions to those that be drinking with them, so as they perceive him not, shall discharge the time which they drinke, of many vices, and those not the least, which are imputed unto it: some there be, who put leaves of burrage into their wine, others besprinkle the sloores and pavements of parlours and dining-chambers with water, wherein they have infused or steeped the herbes vervain & maiden-haire; having an opinion, that these devices procure some joy and mirth in the hearts of those who are at a feast; and all to imitate ladie Helene, who, as Homer reporteth, with certaine spices and drougues that she had medicined and charmed (as it were) the wine that her guests should drinke; but they doe not perceive, that this tale being fetched from as farreas Aegypt, after a great way and and long circuit. endeth at the last in honest discourses, fitted and accommodated to time and place: for that the faid Helene recounteth unto them as they drunke with her at the table, the travels of noble uly Tes, and namely,

Io

What things this valiant knight had done, and what he had indured; What wrongs also he wrought himselfe, to which he was inured;

For this was that Nepenthes (if I be not deceived) a medicine which discusseth and charmethal forrow and paine, even a discreet speech, framed aprly and in season to the affections and occafions which are prefented: but men confiderate, well advifed, and of good judgement, howfoever they may feeme to deale in philosophie, yet they carrie their words, and place them so. that they are effectuall, rather by a gentle way of perswasion, than by force and violence of demonstration. For thus you see how Plate also (in the treatise called, His banquet; where hee dif- 20 courfeth of the finall end of humane actions, of the foveraigne good of man, and in one word, treateth of God and heavenly matters, like a divine and theologian) doth not enforceand thretch the proofe of his demonstration, nor bestreward powder as it were with dust his adverfarie, according to his wonted manner, otherwife to take furer hold, that hee might not pollibly struggle out of his hands; but induceth and draweth on the hearers his guests, by a weaker kinde of arguments and suppositions, by preticexamples, and pleasant sictions. Moreover, the very questions and matters at such a time and place propounded, & not only their reasons, ought to be somewhat easie, the problemes and propsitions plaine and familiar; the interrogations also and demaunds probable, and carying a resemblance of truth, and nothing darke or intricate; lest they doe perstringe and dazzle their eies, who are not quicke fighted, suffo- 30 cate fuch as are but weake spirited, and in one word, turne them cleane away, who are but shallow witted and of a meane conceit. For like as there is a custome allowable, to remoove and stirre (when a man will) the guests at a feast, by urging them either to daunce alone, or in a ring; but he that should force them to rife from the table, for to put on armour and fight in complet harneis, or to fling the barre, or cast a sledge, doth not onely make the feast unpleafant and nothing acceptable to his guests, but also hurtfull unto them; even so, easie and light questions, exercise mens spirits handsomly, and with great fruite and commoditie; but we must reject and banish all disputations of matters litigious, intricate, and snarled (as Democrifaith) to wit, knottie questions & hard to be undone, such as both busie themselves, who propose them, and trouble those that heare them. For thus it ought to be, that as the wine is all one 40 and common throughout the table; so the questions propounded at a feast or banquet, to be talked of, should be intelligible unto all, for otherwife, they who broch matters so darke and myfficall, were as unreasonable, and should have as little regard of the common benefit of their company, as the crane, and fox in Aelops fables, had one of the others good. For the fox having invited the crane to dinner, fet before her a good messe of fattie broth, of beanes and peafe, which he had powred upon a broad shallow stone vessell, in such fort, as the poore crane was made a foole and laughing-flocke by this meanes, for that with her long and fmall bill fle could get none of it up, but it went still besides, it was so thinne and glibbe withall: the crane againe, because she would be quit and meet with the fox, bad him to dinner, and presented unto him good victuals within a bottle, that had a long and narrow necke, at which the her-felfe could 50 eafily convey & thrust her bill to the very bottome; but Reinardwas not able to take out his part with her; even fo, when learned men at a table plunge and drowne themselves (asit were) in fubtile problemes and questions interlaced with logicke, which the vulgar fort are not able for their lives to comprehend and conceive; whiles they also againe for their part come in with their foolish fongs, and vaine ballads, of Robin-bood and little John, telling tales of a tubbe, or of a roasted horse and such like; enter into talke of their trafficke and merchandise, of their markets and fuch mechanicall matters; certes all the fruite and end of fuch an affemblie at a cast is utterly lost, and were injurie done to god Bacchus: for like as when Phrynicus & Aeschy-Lu first brought a tragedie (which at the beginning was a folemne fong, in the honour of Bacchus) to fables and narrations patheticall, arose this proverbe: And what is all this I pray you to Bacchus? even so it comes many times into my minde to say thus unto one that drawet h by head and shoulders into a feast, that sophisticall and masterfull syllogisme called Kuensay. My good friend, what is this to Bacchus? Haply there is some one who singeth certain of these ordinatic fongs at feafts, called * Scotta, as a man would fay oblique or crooked, when the great than - * Some thinks ding cuppe of wine is fet in the middes of the table before all the company, and the chaplets they were to ding cuppe of white Section among the guells, which that god Bacchus puneth upon our heads, called, x of flowers divided & dealt among the guells, which that god Bacchus puneth upon our heads, 10 to fignific, that hee giveth us all liberty: but furely this is neither good nor honest, ne yet is to tay, by beforming that freedome which should bee at feastes, howsoever some say, that those the country? fonnets are not darkly composed, as the word Seotia seemeth to implie, which significan crooked; but that they tooke the name, because in old time the guests, at first sung altogether and cane, with one voice and accord, one fong in the praise of Bacchus, and afterwards every one in his turne chanted another apart; giving one to another in order from hand to hand, a branch or garland of a myrtle tree; which I suppose they called * Asaron; for that he who tooke the said garland of a myrtie tree; which I inploit they called "Ajalon; for that he wild toke the had branch was to fing in his courfe; and to the fame purpose, a lute there was, or an harpe that went "Ajadan." roundabout the table; and looke who could skill to play upon it, tooke it in hand and fung die and the thereto in measures; but those who had no knowledge at all in musicke, and refused the faid in the 20 strument, gave occasion of the name Section, because such maner of singing was not common or easie unto all: others there be who say: That the said branch of myrtle went not round about to all the guests in order, but passed from table to table, or from bedde to bedde; for when he that fat formost at the first table, had fung, he sent it to the principals or first man of the second, and he to the chiefe person of the third; and so consequently, the second did by the second; by reason whereof, and in regard of this crosseand overthwart varietie in the oblique revolution thereof, the fong was called Scotion.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether themaster of the feast ought himselfe to assign unto every guest his place, or suffer them to (it as they will them selves?

MY brother Timon having upon a time invited many persons to a feast, willed every one of them as he entred in, to take his place, and sit where he thought good himselse, for that there were among them, strangers, citizens, neighbours, familiars, friends, and kinssolke, and in one word, all that were bidden were not one mans children, but a medley and mixt number of all forts and conditions. Now, when as they were for the most part, come already, and had takentheir places, a certeine stranger well appointed, like an amourous gallant in some comedie, all in his purple, excessive otherwise in curious and costly apparrel, attended beside, with a traine 40 of lacquies and pages following at his heeles; and in one word, better guarded than regarded, came to the doore of the hall or dining-chamber, who after he had cast his eie round about, and viewed all the companie how they fat at the table, would not enter in , but flung away immediatly, and flayed not. Many there were who ranne after him, requelting him to returne and beare them company; but in no wife would hee, faying. That he faw never a place left, woorthy his person: which when they who were set already, understood, (and many of them had taken their drinke well, and had in maner their full load) they being right glad, tooke up a great laughter, and with this note:

Now farewell he, since needs he will be gone, Better his roome, than company (quoth ech one.)

50 but after that supper was done, my father addressing his speech unto me who sat a great way off: Timon and I (quoth he) have chosen thee for a judge, to decide a matter of some question and difference betweene us: for I blamed and reprooved him a pretie while fince, about this itranger; for if at the first, he had ordered the matter well, according as I would have had him, and bestowed every man in his owne place, we should not have bene condemned for our oversight and diforder in this behalfe, especially by such a person who hath the skill

Horsemento range in comely battell ray, And targatiers on foot, to leade the way.

For it is reported that Paulus Aemilius (him I meane, that defaited Perfeus king of Macedonie. after that glorious victory)made many great and magnificent fealts; wherein (befides the wonderfull furniture and provision that he ordeined) he observed in all points a singular order & dispofe, faying: That to one & the fame man belonged the knowledge, aswel how to fet out a most friendly and merry feast, as to range a most terrible battell; for both the one and the other required great discretion and good order: which was the reason that Homer the poet was wont (when he spake of right valiant warrious and most roial personages, deserving best the highest place of command) to tearme them x09 uni 12695 Native that is to fay, the disposers and setters of the people in order, Yea, and you that are philosophers, doubt not to say and affirme: That the great God of heaven (in making and creating the world) did nothing but change diforder into good order, 10 without putting to or taking away ought that was before, by disposing and setting every thing in place, meet and convenient; and fo, by giving a most beautifull forme to that confused maste or Chaos in nature, which had no forme at all, wrought this admirable piece of worke, which we call the World. As for these great & high points indeed of doctrine, we learn them of you; but we our felvesare able to fee and observe thus much; that how sumptuous foever a feast be otherwife, yet if it want good order, there is no grace or pleasure at all in it. A very ridiculous thing it is therefore, and a meere mockerie, that cooks, clearks of the kitchin, and fewers, should be fo carefull what diffies ought to be ferved first, second, in the middle, or in the last place; yea, and (believe me) to looke unto it very diligently, that there be a convenient place ordeined for perfumes and fweet odours, when they are to be brought in; for chaplets alfo, and garlands, that are 20 to be distributed & dealt about; and last of all, for a minstrell wench (if any be there) to sing & play, where the may be belt heard; & in the mean while the mafter of the feaft, fuffer those who are bidden to all this, for to fit pell-mell at the table at a venture, as if they came onely to fill and cram their bellies, without giving (either to age, or to dignity, or to any matter of like qualitie) that ranke and order which is fit, decent, & meet for every one : in the keeping of which discretion, the best man in the place hath his due honor in sitting highest; he that is second & inserior, is by use and custome acquainted and well contented to fit accordingly; and the huisher, who hath the ordering of the matter, is well exercised, to distinguish and judge that, which is besitting every one according to his estate and degree. For it can not stand with any reason, that in the Counsell-house there should be a place knowen, either of fitting or standing, more or lesse honourable, according to the quality and dignity of the person; and that for setting men at the table, there should be the like order observed. And is it meet, that the host or master of the feast thould drinke to one before another, and yet have no regard at the first, in placing of his guests? putting no difference nor observing any distinction at all? making of a feast, even in the verie beginning, one myconos (as they fay in the common proverbe) which is as much as a mith-math and confused mingle-mangle of all. And thus much of the reasons and allegations of my father, for his plea. But Timon my brother, on the contrary side, answered: That he was not wifer than fage Blus; and confidering, that he refused alwaies to be arbitratour or umpire betweene two of his owne friends, though they requested him; why should himselfe become a judge at once, among fo many kinfefolke and friends, yea, and other persons besides? especially, where 40 the question is not about money and goods, but as touching preeminence and superiority; as if he had fent for them all, not to be merry and make good cheere, but to disquiet them, and set them out one with another, who were good friends before? For if (quoth he) Menelaus in olde time, committed one great abfurdity, infomuch as there grew upon it, a proverbe and by-word, in that he intruded himselfe unsent for, into the counsell of Agamemnon? far greater reason there is, that he should be thought more absurd, who constitute th and maketh himselfe, of a courteous boil and civill malter of a feast, an austere judge and precise censurer of those that require no fuch matter, nor willingly defire, that one should determine and judge of them, who is the better man or the worfe; seeing they are not cited peremptorily to a judicial court for triall of a controversie, but invited friendly to a good supper, for to mak merry? Over and besides, no 50 easie matter it is, to make distinction aright; for that some go before in age, others, in degree of kinted and linage; and therefore, he that should take such a taske or charge in hand, ought evermore to be studying upon the degrees of comparison, or els of the argument in logicke, A comparatis, that is to fay, drawen from comparison; and to have alwaies in his hand, either the Topiques of Aristotle, or els the Precedences of Thrasmachus, a booke which he entituleth Hy perbollontes, wherein a man should doe no good at all; but contratiwise much harme, by transferring the vain-glorie about higher place, from judiciall courts, common halles and theaters, to fitting at feafts; and when he hath endevored to abate and repreffe other pattions of the foule by good fellow thip and company keeping, now firre up and fet on foot, pride and arrogance; of which in mine advice, we ought to fludie more for to cleanfe our foules, than to wall and scoure away the dirt and filth from our feet: to the end that wee may converte familiarly and fellowlike at the table, with all mirth and finglenesse of heart. But now, when we goe about and do what we can with one hand, to take away from our guetts all rancor and enmitte, bred cither upon anger, or fome worldly affaires that they have had together, in making them eat at one table, and drinke one to another, wee doe as much as lies in us, with the other hand to fret an old fore, and kindle a new fire of grudge and malice by ambition, in debafing one, and 10 exalting another: but if withall, according to the preference which wee have made in the placing of them, we take the cuppe also and drinke oftner, or set better meat and daintier diffus to fome than to others; if I fay we make more of this man than of that, cheere one up, and tpeake unto him after a more familiar manner than to another; furely, in flead of a feast of friends and familiars, it will be a stately affembly altogether of lords and potentates. But if in all things else we are carefull and precife in our feafts, to observe and maintaine equalitie of persons; why beginne we not at the first, in the placing of our guests, to accustome and acquaint them for to range themselves, and take their seats simply and familiarly one with another? considering at the first entrance into the hall or great chamber, they fee that they were nor summoned aristocratically to a fenate house of lords and great States, but invited democratically and after a popular manner to supper, where the poorest may take his place with the richest, like as in the flate of a citie and common-wealth, called Democratie. After these opposite reasons were alledged, and that all the company there present demaunded my sentence, Isaid: That taking my felfe chosen as an arbitrator, and not as a judge, I would deale indifferently, and with an coual hand in the middle betweene both: As for those (quoth I) who feast young men their equals, all friends and of familiar acquaintance, they ought to accustome them (as Timon faith) to carie themselves so void of pride and arrogance, that they may take contentment in any place what foever that falleth out unto them; and to think this facilitie & fingleneffe of heart, to be a fingular meanes and provision for the feeding and nourishing of amity: but in case the question be of enterteining strangers, or worshipfull personages of high calling & great place in common-weale, or of elder persons, I feare me, that as wee shut out at one dore in the forefront pride and arrogance, so we let it in at another backe-gate behinde, by our indifference and making no distinction. Heerein therefore we ought to give somewhat unto use and custome, or else we must altogether forbeare all manner of cheeting up, drinking to, and faluting of our guests, which fashions we use not without judgement and discretion hand over head, to such as we meet with orfee first; but with as great regard and respect as we can, honoring them according to their woorth and qualitie:

With highest place, with wiands of the best, with most cups full, and those not of the lest.

asfaid Agamemnon that great king of the Grecks, putting as you fee the feat in the first and to cheefe place of honor. We commend also king Aleinous, for that he placed the stranger who came in, next unto himselfe,

And cauf d his some Laodama, a gallant, for that guest To rife, who close to father sat, and whom he loved best.

For to displace a best beloved sonne, and in his roome to set an humble suppliant, was a singugular example of rare courtesse, and humanitie. And verily the gods themselves doe observe this distinction of place, and of sixing: for Neptune although he came last into the assemble of the gods in counsell, Tet sooke his owne place for all that, And in the mids of them he fat.

as being the feat which of right appetteined unto him. And Minerva feemeth alwaics to chalenge as proper and peculiar to her above all others, the very next place to Jupiter: which the poet Homer doth after a fort covertly infinuate unto us, speaking of dame Thet is in this maner:

By Jupiter fre fat, of speciall grace

And favour; For Minerva gave her place.

But Pindarus fignifieth as much in expresse tearines when he saith:

To lightning next that flasheth fire Sat Pallas, close unto her fire.

Howbeit, Timen faid: That we ought not to take from others, for to gratifie and pleasure one; and take he doth away, who maketh that vulgar and common, which by right is proper; & proper there is nothing, more than that which is meet and befitting the dignitic of each perton: moreover, in giving that superioritie and preeminence to running fast, and making most hatte, which is done unto vertue, kinred, magistracie, and such other qualities, in seeming to avoid the opinion of being odious or offensive, to his bidden guests, he draweth upon himself. to much more trouble and heart-burning of others; for he offendeth them in depriving everie one of that honour which he deserveth, or is woont to have. For mine owne part, I doe not 10 thinke it fo hard a piece of worke to make this distinction, as hee would have it to be: for first and formost, it is not ordinarie nor often seene, that many men of like degree and dignitie, are bidden to one and the fame feast; besides, being as there are, many honorable places, a man of judgement and differetion, hath good meanes to dispose of them accordingly, among manie, if there be occasion: for one of them he may content in setting him highest and above the rest; another he may pleafe with a place in the middeft; to one he may doe the favour, as to fet him next unto himfelte; another he may gratifie by placing him close to some friend or familiar of his, or else fast by his master and teacher: in this order, I fay, he may fatisfie many of them who teeme to be of better reputation, in distributing the places also which are of more respect among them; as for the reft, I leave them meanes also for their contentment; namely certaine 20 gifts, favors, curtefies, and kindneffes, which may in fome fort make amends for the want of foure honorable place. But fay, that their deferts and dignities be hard to be diffinguifbed, or the persons themselves not easie to be pleased; marke what a device I have in such a case to serve the turne: My father (if he be prefent) I take by the hand, and fet him in the most honourable place of all; if not, I do the fame by my grand-fire, my wives father, or mine uncle by the fathers fide, or my colleague and companion in office, or els my fellow-fenatour and brother-alderman, or some one of those who hath some speciall and inward prerogative above others of honour and account, with the mafter of the feast himselfe, that biddeth the guests; taking this for a rule in the cases borowed out of the books of Homer, which are presidents of ducties, and shew what is beforming every man to do; and namely, in that place where Achilles feeing Menelaus 30 and Antilochus debating the matter very hotly, about the second prize for horse-running, and doubting how farre-forth their anger and contention might proceed, would needs give the faid prize in question, to a third man; pretending in word, that he tooke pitie of Eumelus, and thathe was minded to doe him some honour; but indeed and trueth, it was to take away the ocasion of difference and quarrell betweene the other two. As I was thus speaking, Lamprias, who was set close in an odde corner of the chamber, upon a lowpallet, thundering out his words after his wonted maner, demanded of the affiftance or companie, in this wife: My mafters, pleafethit you to give me leave for to reprove and rebuke a little, this fortish judge here? and when everic one made answer, saying: Good leave have you, speake your mind freely, & spare him not: And who can (quoth he) forbeare that philosopher, who fetteth out and disposeth of the places at a 40 feast, like as he would do in some theater, namely, according to birth and parentage, wealth and riches, estate and authority in common wealth? yea, and as if he ordeined the seats and sitting places, for to opine or give voice in that folemne affembly of the States of Greece, called Amphi-Elyones? to the end, that even at the very table, where as wee are met to drinke wine and bemerrie, we should not be rid of ambition, nor shake off the foolish defire of glory: for furely, the places at a feast ought not to be distributed so, as respective to honour, but rather to the ease and pleasure of the guests that are to sit in them; neither is the dignity of ech one by himselfe in his degree to be regarded, but rather, the affection, disposition and habitude of the mindeoneto another, how they can fort and frame together; like as our maner is to doe in some other things which are to meet in one common conjunction : for a good architect or mason wil not (I trow) 50 lay his first worke or forefront of the house, with Atticke or Lacedæmonian marble, before the Barbarian flone, because the same is in some fort of a noble kinde, and comming from the worthier place; neither will a cunning painter dispose his richest and most costly colour in the principal place of hispicture; nor the carpenter or shipwright, employ before all other timber in the stem of his ship, either the pine tree wood of Pathmos in Peloponnelus, or the cypresse of Candie: but to they order and distribute, their stone, their colours and their timber, that being joined and fitted well together one with another, the common worke arifing of them all, may bemore firme and strong, faire and beautifull, good and commodious. And thus you see, God himselfe, whom our poet Pindarus calleth the best workeman and principall attitan, doeth not place the fire alwaies aloft, nor the earth below, but according as the use of bodies compounded doth require; like as Empedocles testifieth in these verses:

The oisters. murets of the fea, and fiel-fifth every one, With masse cout, the tortoiseeke with crust as hard as slone, And coulted backe, which areh-wise he alost doth hollow reare, Shew all, that he wie earth they do

above their bodies beare. not in that place which nature ordeined for it in the first constitution and framing of the univerfall world, but in that which the composition of a new worke requireth: for disorder and converfall world, but in that which the composition of a new worke requireth: fulion is bad enough in all things; but when it commeth among men, especially when they are drinking and eating together, it sheweth her badnesse most of all, by insolencie, outrages and other enormities that can not be numbred; which to foresee and remedie, is the part of a man industrious, well seene in policie, good order and harmonie. And that is well faid of you (anfwered we) but why envie you to this company that science of order, proportion and harmonic, 20 and doe not communicate it unto us? Surely there is no envie at all (quoth he) in the way, in case ye will beleeve me and be ruled by me, in that which I doe change and alter in the order of the feast, like as you would be directed by Epaminondus, if he should range a battell in good order, which before was in difarray. We all agreed and gave him leave to to do: then he voiding first out of hall or dining, place all the boies and lackies, cast his cie upon every one of us in the face, and faid: Hearken and give care, how I meane to range and fort you one with another; for I would advertise you of it before hand, because I am of this minde, that the Theban Paramenes, juftly and upon good reason reprooved Homer, saying that he had no skill at all in * love-mat- * # love-matters, for that he ranged together in battell those who were of one and the same nation, and min. danties. gled fuch as were of the fame race, linage and bloud; whereas he should have joined the lover, 30 and the beloved, to the end that the whole battell might be incited by one spirit, and draw in the fame line, as linked by a lively bond. Semblably, will I doe in this feaft of ours, not coupling an the table, one man with another; nor matching a yoong man with a yoong man; ne yet fetting amagistrate or a ruler just by another; no nor two friends together: for surely such an ordering as this, hath no life in it, no vigor and power at all, either to breed and imprint, or to nourish and as this, hath no life in it, no vigor and power at all, either to breed and imprint, or to nourith and augment the heat of mutuall benevolence and affection of one to another; but framing and applying to that which hath need, the thing that is fit and proper thereto. I would have a fludent to fit next unto a learned man; a milde and gentle perfon, unto one that is hard to be pleafed; to an old prating fellow who loves to heare himfelfe fpeake, a youth who is defirous to heare, I would place a boafting and glorious bragger, with a drie childe and foothing companion; with a defice and colerike man, one who is filent or of few words: if I fee a rich or mighty perfonage, and withall, bountifull and free of gift, I will fetch out of one corner or other, some poore honest body to be his next-neighbour, to the end that from him (as out of a full cup) there might overflow some goodnesse, into another which is void and emptie: but I will be very wary and circumspect, that I doe not fort two oratours or professed thetoricians together, nor match one poet with another; for according to the proverbiall verse:

Abegger can no begger well abide, And chanter one by another is envied.

Howfoever these two heere Sossieles and Modelus, confirming in alternative course the speeches one of another:

Blow not the coles that ready are to dy, But just accord together most friendly.

I fever also a funder busic and troublesome persons, such as take one another by the throat, injurious solke, testie and cholericke men; interposing alwaies some milde and modest nature betweene, as a emollisive of their hardnesse, for fearethey should crush and bruse one another: contratiwise, I bring together, such as love wrestling and other exercises of the bodie, hunters also, and those that protesse husbandry: for of similitudes and resemblances, two sorts there be; the one quarrellous and given to sight, as that of cocks; the other loving and amiable, as that of jaies or dawes. Alfo thofe that be good companions, and can drinke well, I use to set and match close together; yea and amorous solke:

Not onely those who feele hot fanfies pricke To boies and of love masculine are sicke.

As Nophaeles faith, but fuch also as are pinched with the love of wives and maidens; for that being heat and enchansed with the same fire, they will catch and take hold the sooner one of another; like as pieces of iron that cleave and be united together, when they beered hot; provided alwaies, that their love doe not settle in one place, whether it be male of semale.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the reason, that the place at the table named Consular, is held honorable?

Firer this, there arose a question as touching the places of sitting at a table; for that some Are reputed honorable in one countrey, and fome in another. Among the Perfians, the middle place is accounted best; for therein fitteth the king: In Greece the first is held chiefe and principall: and the Romans make most regard of the last in the middle pallet or table; and this commonly is called the Confular place; whereas contrariwife, certeine Greeks that inhabit the country about Pontus, & namely those of Heraclea, reckon the first of the said middle pallet, the highest place of honor: but we made most doubt of the the said place called Consular: for 20 the fame was in our time also counted honorable; but not in regard, that it was either the formost or the middes; and befides, of the accidentall qualites observed therein, some were not proper and peculiar to it alone, and others feemed to be of no importance at all: howbeit, three reafons alledged there were, which feemed fomewhat to moove and induce us above the reft: the first was this: That the consuls having deposed and expelled the kings of Rome, and chaunged all into a more popular estate, withdrew themselves from the rotall place in the middes, to a lower roome, to the end, that by quitting and forgoing the place which to them apperteined, they might avoid all occasions of making their power and authoritie odious unto those that converted with them. Secondly, that feeing the two first tables or pallets being destined and appointed for the guests invited, the third, and namely the first place thereof, belonged properly 30 to him who made the feaft; for there fitteth he most commodiously, in manner of a coachman in a chariot, or pilot in a shippe; to see the whole order of the service: neither is he farre from other tables, but that he may cheere up & welcome al the company: for, of the places nere unto him, that underneath is appointed ufually for his wife or children; and that above, ordinarily and by good right, was allowed for the most honorable personage of all them that were bidden, to the end, that he might fit neere unto the master of the feast. Thirdly, this place seemed to have this propertie by it felfe, that it was thought commodious for fuch as were emploied and had any affaires in hand. For the Roman confull was nothing like unto Archias fometime the captaine generall of the Thebans; who if there had beene brought unto him any letters, newes, or advertisement of importance, in the middes of supper time; or if there fell 40 our any ferious occasions, would cry out aloud and fay: To morrow morning will we thinke of carnest matters; the pacquet of letters he laid aside, and in stead thereof, tooke a boule of wine in hand: the Roman confull (I fay) was not fuch an one, but even at these times especially he is most vigilant, and looketh circumspectly about him, for not onely according to the common proverbe in Aeschyliu:

But also amidde all pleatures, feafts, and pastimes, it is requisite in a wife captaine, and man of government, that he alwaies stand upon his guard, and carrie a watchfull eie about him; to the end therefore that he might evermore be ready to understand all occurrents, to command also, 50 direct; signe, or subscribe is need required; this place was allotted unto him of purpose above the rest; wherein, by reason that the second table stood close joined to the first, the correct within the turning, leaveth a space open, or void distance, given from and meanes very handsomely for a secretary, a notatie, a sergeant, or apparitar, a pencioner, or one of the guardyea & to any messenger or pursevant comming from the campe, to approach neere unto the confull, to declare his message, to aske any question, or to commune & confer with him, & that without troubling any body, or being molested by any person there met at the feast or banquet: for both his hand is his owne and at commaund, and also his voice at liberty, to say and doe whatsoever he would.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What manner of man he ought to be, who is chosen master of the feast?

Rate my fonne in law, and Theon our familiar friend, being with us at a certeine feaft, where there beganne fome miffule and diforder, upon large drinking of wine, which notto withflanding was foone appealed, tooke occasion thereby, to speake of the masteric and presidency of fuch feafts observed in old time, being of this opinion, and faying (withall to me) That Lought to weare a chaplet of flowers on my head, and not fuffer the auncient cuftome of creating a king or governour of the feaft; who is to give order in all things, and to fee there bee no mifrule, by difuse and discontinuance to be utterly neglected and abolished; but rather that Lought to bring that laudable order up againe, and put it in practife. Of the fame minde was the whole company, and liked very well of the motion; infomuch as they all with a loud voice and one accord, requested me to take the thing upon me: Seeing then (quoth I) that you be all of this minde, I am content to chuse my selfe president, and master of this feast: and heere to beginne withall, I give commaundement to all the rest, that for this present they drinke at their 20 owne differetion, and as it pleafeth themselves: as for Crato and Theon, who were the first that fer this matter on foot, I will by vertue of my office and place, enjoine them fummarily and in few words, to declare heere before us, what manner of person ought to bee chosen for the prefident, and mafter of fuch a feast, and whathe must aime at, when he is elected; as also how he is to carry himselfe towards those who have made choice of him; and this charge I laie upon them two, permitting them to divide it betweene them, and to handle it according to their good discretion. At the first, they made some semblance of refusal, praying me to hold them excufed:howbeit when they faw the whole company crying upon them for to obey the prefidents Crato began first & faid: That as the captaine of the guard or watch, ought himselfe especially to be a most diligent & vigilant warder, according to the faying of Plaroseven so should be who 30 hath the command of guests met together for to make merrie, be himselfe of all other a right good fellow, and a cheerefull companion; and fuch an one he shall be, in case hee be neither one that will quickly be cup-shotten, and overseene with wine; nor yet untoward and unwilling to drinke liberally; much like as Cyrus wrote fometime unto the Lacedamonians: That as in al other points he was more woorthy to be aking than his brother; fo in this respect especially, that he would take his wine in greater measure, and beare the same better than he: for hee that will bee soone drunke, groweth infolent, unseemely, and outragious in his drunkennesse: and he againe, who is too too fober, and abstinent altogether, becommeth unpleafant and unfociable, meeter indeed to be a schoole-master, and to have the bringing up of boies, than a president of a feast, to order guests. Pericles, so oft as he was chosen captaine generall of the A-40 thenians; no fooner put on his mantle of estate, and was ready to fet forward, but before any thing elfe, used thus to say unto himselfe, as it were to refresh his memorie by way of admonition: Looke about thee now Pericles; thou halt the commaund of free men; thou commaundest now the Greeks; nay thouart commaunder of the Athenians; even so thould our master of a feast reason thus within himselfe: Thou hast the rule now of friends; to the end that he neither permit them to doe any unfeemely or dishonest thing; nor bereave them of their delights and pleasures; for as he ought to be friendly affected unto them in their serious occasious, so he must be no enemie to their sports and pastimes, but framed indifferently, and as it were well tempered for the one and the other; & yet by his naturall disposition, he should, like good wine, be formwhat more inclined unto a kind of hardneffe or aufteritie: for by this meanes 50 the wine which he drinketh, will reduce his maners and behavior to a meane or mediocrity, by moiltning as it were and foftning it, that it may be more gentle and pliable: for as Xenephon faid: That the ladde cheere, heavy and rufticall severitie otherwise of Clearchus, seemed to be more lightfome and pleafant in battel and conflict, by reason of his resolute confidence; even so, he who is by nature not bitter nor crabbed, but onely grave and fevere, by drinking, becommeth more remiffe, and not fo firaight laced; and by that meanes more lovely and amiable also. And thus much of his owne perfon.

Moreover, he ought above all things, to know by experience, every one of the guests: what alteration there is wrought in them by drinking? into what accidents or passions they bee ready to fall; and how they can beare strong wine? for wee are not to thinke, but if there bee a proper temperature and feverall mixture with water fit for every fort of wine; which kings tafters, and cup-bearers know well inough, and in that regard can different and diffinguith, when they are to use more or lesse water to the delaying of wines; there is more reason that there thould be a temperature likewise of man and wine, which our master or president of a feast ought to know, and when he knoweth it, to observe; that like an expert musician, by stretching as it were & fetting up one, a note higher, in making him to drinke largely, and letting downe another by cauling him as much to spare, he may bring and reduce different natures unto an uniforme equalitie & confonance, normeasuring the same by waight & measure, pintes or quarts, to nor by fo many cupsor glaffes, but going by a certeine rule of time and age, as also by the thength of the bodic, giving to each one that which is meet and convenient. Now if peradventure this feeme an hard piece of worke, namely, to know althese particularities; yet meet it is at leaflwife that he should be skilful in generalitie, as touching severall complexions & ages: as for example; that oldfolke are fooner and more eafily made drunke than yoong perfons; those that be flirring and in continual motion, rather than fuch as be in repose and rest; sadde, heavie, penfive, and melancholike men, more than those who are jocund and merry; lastly, those who are challe, or the women modefly, much more than fuch as be diffolute or exceffively gi. ven that way. He that is thus farre foorth acquainted with these circumstances, may be a meeter and fitter person a great deale to mainteine decencie, order, and agreement at a feast, than 20 he who is ignorant therein. Furthermore, what is he who knoweth not very well, that the mafter of a feast ought to be well affected, and to carrie a loving minde unto all those who are invited to a feast; to carrie neither open malice, nor fecret grudge to any one of them: for otherwife, if he commaundeth ought, it will not be well taken; if hee distribute and deale amongst them, he shall not be thought equal and indifferent; last of all, if he be disposed to mirth and jolitic, he shall hardly escape a rebuke and blame. Lo, Theon, what maner of president and mafter(quoth Cr.sto) I have framed unto you by words, as if he were wrought out of waxe, and him Ideliver into your hands. Then answered Theon: And I receive him from you so much the rather, as one thaped and fathioned indeed for a right governour of a feaft, and a good companion besides: but whether I shall ever use him or no, or whether in so doing I shall shame my 30 felfe; I wot not: howbeit, this I am affured of, that if hee be fuch an one as you have described, he will know how to order & governe a feaft, & not fuffer that one while it feeme a folemn affembly of a citie, another while a schoole of rhetoricke, now a knot of dice-plaiers or cheaters met together, and anon a scaffold forsooth for dauncers and singers, or a stage for platers and commedians: this I fay, for that you fee ordinarily fome making orations, and pleading at the table, as it were in the court, or at the barre before judges; others exercifing themselves how to speake in publike, or effe rehearling and reading certeine of their owne compositions; and others againe taking upon them like judges of dauncers and stage plaiers, who doe best for to winne the prife; and yet this is not the worst: for Alcibiades and Theodorus made of Politions feaft, a very place of divine mifteries, reprefenting there the folemne carving of torches and 40 other ceremonies, at the shewing of some facred reliques; which I would not have a good mafter and prefident of a feast to be so carelesse as to abide; but to allow place and time for such talke, fuch spectacles, fights, plaies, and pastimes onely, which tend to that end for which feaths be made; that is to fay, to breed and augment amitie betweene them that are prefent, by the meanes of the delight they take in eating together; for that in truth, a feast is nothing elle but a pleasant recreation at the table, aiming at this marke, to contract friendship by the entercourse of mutuall drinking one to the other.

But forasimuch as in all things, varietie is very pleasing, and nature joieth in nothing more than in diversirie and change; but contrariwise, a simple uniformity alwaies, one and the same, is hurtfull, and bringeth tedious field with it incontinently; whereas the mixture of divers 50 things applied in time and place with measure, taketh that away which is offensive to pleasure, and hurtfull to profit: therefore the master of a seast must devise for his guests, and exhibit unto them some mixed sport to passe away the time whiles they be drinking. I have heard many men say, that to walke by the sea side, as also to saile along the shore, is most pleasant; and even so a man must joine alwaies sport with serious affaires, and profit with pleasure, to the end that those who play, may in some fort be in good earnest; and likewise, when they be busse in serious matters, sind some recreation; like as those who are sea-sicke, and ready ever & anon to cast up their flomacke, recover their spirits and are revived, when they see how they be necre the land; even so a man may profit in mirth and laughter; he may likewise laugh and be merry in profit, and make his serious affaires pleasant enough; for as the old proverbe goeth:

With calthrop thistles, and among the pricky rest-harrow, The violess and soft waissowers are alwaies wont to grow.

But as for all other sports & plaies, which without any profit at al, leape impudently into feafts, he shall command his guests expresly, to forbeare, lest ere they be aware, they become outragious and furious, like as those who have taken the juice of henbane: they also abuse their power, & go too far in their commandements, (for fo they be called at the wine) who enjoine flutters, 10 flammerers and mafflers to fing, or bald-pates to kembe their heads, or lame creeples to go upright on their feet without halting. Thus upon a time at a certeine merry meeting and feall, where Agamelor the Academicke philosopher was, who had a withered legge, and nothing left thereof but skin and bone, all the company (by way of mockeric) infulted upon him, and made a lawamong themselves, that they should stand all upon their right leg, and every one drinke his boule of wine, or els pay a certeine piece of money, as a forfeiture : now when it came to Agamefors turne, by right to command, he charged them all to drinke in that fort and maner, as they faw him to drinke: then called hee for an emptie earthen pitcher with a narrow mouth, to be brought into the place; into which when he had thrust his poore consumed legge aforefaid, he drunke up his cup of wine; and when all the reft had affaired, and found they could not do as he 20 did, were all forced to pay the forfeit. Heerein was Agamefor to be commended: for after his maner, the mafter of a teatt ought to be revenged, in a kinde of mirth and gentle fort; also to accultome himselfe to such commandements, astend to pleasure and profit both, charging ech one to doe those things which be proper, possible and easie for him, and yet may commend the doer : as for example, to impose upon them who have good voices, and be professed musicians, to fing; oratours and rhetoricians, to declame; philosophers, to assoile darke questions, and cleere ambiguities; and poets, to pronounce some of their verses; for every one of these, joieth and taketh pleafure, to be put to that

Wherein he knowes he can do well, And other men farre doth excell.

There was fome time a king of the Affyrians, who by voice of heralds, and found of trumper, proclamed a great prize and reward to him that could devife a new kinde of pleafure: but the king and governour of a feaft, should doe very well, to propose an honourable reward unto him, that could invent an honest game or pattime, wherein were no insolencie, some delight noin, that could invent an honest game or pattime, wherein were no insolencie, some delight noin, that could invent an honest game or pattime, wherein were no insolencie, some delight of port profitable, and procure laughter not accompanied with wanton reproofe and scornefull reproch, but sitch as earieth a grace and pleasure with it: for this is it wherein most part of feasts suffer shipwracke, namely, when they are misgoverned, or not ordered as they ought to be. But the part it is of a wise and prudent man, to know how to avoid enmity and anger in the market-place, gotten by avarice; in the publicke halles of bodily exercises, by contention and emulation; in bearing offices and suing for them, by ambition and vain-glory; and last of all, in feasts and banquets, by such plaies and passimes.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is meant by this common proverbe: Love teachethmusicke and poetrie.

THe question was mooved one day in Sostius Senerius house, after certaine verses of Suppho were chanted, how this saying of Euripides should be understood:

Love teacheth musicke, marke when you will,

Tough one before, thereof had no skill.

confidering that the poet Philoseems reporteth, how Cyclops Polyphemus the giant, cured his 50 love by the fiveet tongued muses? Whereupon it was alledged, that Love is of great power to moove a man for to be bold, hardy and adventurous, yea, and ministreth a readiness to attempt all novelties, according as Plato named it, the enterpriser of all things; for it maketh him talkative and full of words, who before was filent; it causeth the bashfull and modest person, to court it, and put himselse forward in all maner of service; it is the meanes that an idle carelesse lubber, and a negligent, becommeth diligent and industrious; and that which a man would most ber, and a negligent, becommeth diligent and industrious; and that which a man would most marvell at, a miching hard-head and mechanicall penisather, if he fall once to love, doth resent and waxe soft as iron in the fire, and so prooveth more liberall, courteous and kinde, than ever and waxe soft as iron in the fire, and so prooveth more liberall, courteous and kinde, than ever before : so that this pleasant and merry proverbe, seemeth not to be altogether ridiculous & impertinent, namely that Loves purse is tied & knit up with a leeke or porret blade. Moreover is was there spoken: That Love resembled drunkennesse, for that the one aswell as the other doth fet folke in a heat; it maketh them cheerfull, merry and jocund; and when as men be come once to that, they fall foone to fing, to rime, and make verses. And it is faid, that the poet Acfehylus composed his tragedies, when he had well drunken, and was heat with wine. I had a grandfather also my selfe, named Lamprias, who seemed alwaies more learned, witty, and fuller of inventions, yea, and to furpaffe himselfe in that kinde, when he had taken his cups liberally; and he was wont to fay: That at fuch a time he was like unto incenfe, which being fet on fire, rendereth the fweet odour that it hath. Moreover, they that take exceeding great pleasure to see their loves, to are no leffe affected with joy when they do praise them, than in looking upon them : for love as it is in every thing a great pratter, and full of words; so especially and most of all, in praises in. fornuch, as lovers would willingly perswade others to that, wherein they are themselves perswaded first; namely, that they love nothing but that which is perfect in goodnesse and beautie; and others they would have to be witneffes with them of it. This was it, that induced the Lydian king Candaules, to draw and traine Giges into his bed-chamber, for to fee the beautie of his wife naked: for why? fuch are willing to have the testimonie of others. Loe, what the reason is, that if they write the praises of that which they love, they embelish and adorne the same with verses, fongs and meeter, like as images with golde; to the end that the faid praifes might be heard more willingly, and remembred better by more people: for if they bestow a fighting-cocke, an 20 horse, or any other thing whatsoever, upon those whom they love, their minde is principally, that this their present should be faire and beautifull in it selfe; afterwards, that it be most gallantly and in best maner set out; but above all, in case they be disposed to flatter them in words or writings, their chiefe care is, that the fame run roundly and pleafantly, that they be also glorious and beautified with fine figures, such as is ordinarily the stile of poets. Then Sossus approving well of these reasons, said moreover: That it were well, if some would take in hand to draw and gather arguments out of that which Theophrastus left in writing, as touching musicke: For long it is not (quoth he) fince I read over that booke; wherein he delivereth thus much aftera divine maner: That three principall causes or roots there be of musicke, to wit, paine or griefe, pleasure or joy, and the ravishment of the spirit; of which three, every one doth bend and turne 20 the voice a little out of the ordinary tune : for griefs and forrowes, usually bring with them, moanes and plaints, which quickly run into fong; which is the reason that we see oratours in the perorations or conclusions of their speeches, the actours also in tragedies, when they come to make their dolefull lamentations, bring their voices downe gently to a kinde of melodie, and by little and little tune them (asit were) thereto. Also the great and vehement joies of the minde do lift up all the body, of them especially, who are any thing lightsome by nature, yea, and provoke the fame to leape, skip, and clappe their hands, observing a kinde of motion according to number and measure, if they can not dance:

And otherwise in furious sort, Like frantike folke they do diffort; They shake, they wag, they set out throat,

according as Pindarus faith. But in case they be somewhat more grave and staied, than others, when they finde themselves moved with such a passion of joy, they let their voice onely go at liberty, speaking aloud and finging sonnets. But above all, the ravishment of the spirit, or that divine inspiration, which is called Enthusiasmus, casteth bodie, mind, voice and all, far beyond the ordinary habit; which is the cause, that the furious and raging priests of Bacchus, called Bacchas, use rime & meeter; those also, who by a propheticall spirit, give answeres by oracle, deliver the fame in verse; and few persons shall a man see starke mad, but among their raving speeches, they fing and fay fome verfes. This being so, if you would now display love, and view it well, being 50 unfolded and laied open abroad, hardly shall you meet with another passion, which hath either sharper dolours, or joies more violent or greater exstasses and ravishments of the spirit, lying (as it were) in a trance; so that a man may discover in amorous persons, a soule much like unto that city which Sophoeles describeth:

Full of fongs and incense sweet, Of sighs and groanes in every street. No marvell is it therefore, nor a strange thing; if love (conteining & comprehending in it selfe all those primitive causes of musicke, to wit, dolour, joy, and ravishment of spirit, be likewise in all other things diligent, industrious, talkative, and namely, inclined to making of verses and chanting fongs as much or rather more, than any other passion which can enter into the heart

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Whether king Alexander of Macedonie were a great drinker.

Here was some speech upon a time, as touching king Alexander the Great, to this effect: That he dranke not fo much, as fat long at his meat, and passed the time away, in deviting and talking with his friends: but Philinus fliewed by certeine scroles, papers, and day books of the faid kings house, that they who held that opinion, knew not well what they faid; for that this particular inflance was ordinarily and ufually found in those records: That such a day the king flept all day long, upon his liberall drinking of wine; yea, and other-whiles it appeareth, that he flept the morrow after likewise; which is the reason, that hee was not so forward in venerous matters, nor given much to women, though otherwise he was haltie, quicke and couragious; great arguments of an inward heat of bodie: and it is to be seene upon record: That his fleth yeelded from it, and breathed a paffing sweet smell; infomuch as his shirts and other clothes 20 were full of an atomaticall fent and favour, as if they had bene perfumed; which feemeth alfo to bean argument and figne of heat. For we fee, that those be the hottest & driest countries, which bring foorth cynamon and frankincenfe, according as Theophrastus faith: That a sweet odour proceedeth of perfect concoction and digeftion of humours; namely, when by naturall heat, all fuperfluous mouture is quite chased and expelled. And by all likelihood, this was the principall cause, that Callist henes grew into differee, and lost the kings favour; for that he was unwilling to fup with him, in regard that he would impose upon him to drinke so much. For it is reported, that upon a time, the great boule or goblet, furnamed, Alexanders boule, having paffed roundabout the table thorowout, untill it came to Callifthenes, he refused it, and put it backe; faying withall: I will not drinke in Alexander, for to have need of Aefeulapius. And thus much 30 was faid then, concerning king Alexanders much wine bibbing.

Moreover, king Mithridates, he who warred against the Romans, among other games of prise which hee exhibited, ordeined one for those who could drinke best and eat most; and by mens faying, himselfe performed them both so well, that he won the prize in the one and the other : for he could eat and drinke more than any man living in his time: by occasion whereof, he was commonly furnamed Dieny swa, that is to say, Bacchin. But as touching the reason of this furname, wee fay it is an opinion rathly received: for when hee was a very infant lying in the cradle, the lightning caught the fwadling clothes, and fet them on fire, but never touched or hurt his body, fave onely that there remained a little marke of the fire upon his forehead, which notwithstanding the haire did cover that it was not greatly seene, so long as he was a childe: a-40 gaine, when he was a man growen, it chaunced that the lightning pierced into the bed chamber where he lay asscepe; and for his owne person it was not so much as singed therewith; but it blafted a quiver of arrowes that hung at his bed-fide, went through it, and burnt the arrowes within; which (as the foothfaiers and wife men out of their learning did intepret) figuified, that one day he should be puissant in archers and light armed men. But most men affirme, that hee gathis furname of Bacchus, or Dionyfus, in regard of the refemblance and likenesse of such accidents of lightning, and blafting, as many times befall.

After these words passed, they entred into a speech as touching great drinkers; among whom was reckoned also one Heracides, a famous wreitler, or champion, whom the men of Alexandria in our fathers daies, pleasantly called little Hercules. This good fellow when he could not 50 meet with a companion able to fet foot to his, and drinke with him continually; used to invite some to breake their fast with him in a morning; others to beare him company at dinners some he would bidde to supper; and intreat others last of all to sit with him at his collation or banquet after supper: now when the first were gone, came in the second immediatly; then you should have the third succeed them in place; and no sooner were they departed, but in steps the fourth crew, without any interruption; and he himselfe fat it out still, and making no intermission, was able to hold out with all, and beare those fower repasts and refections, one after another. Among those who were familiarly acquainted with Drusus, sonne to the emperour Tiberius, a physician there was, who in drinking would chalenge and defie all the world: but obferved it was by fome that spied and looked neere unto him: That to prevent drunkennesse, he used to take alwaies five or fixe bitter almonds before every cuppe that he drunke: and when he was once debarred of them, and not suffered so to doe, he was not able to beare his drinke nor refift the leaft headineffe and ftrength thereof. And verily fome there be who fay, that there almonds have an abstersive propertie to bite, to clense and scource the flesh, in such fort, as that they will take away the spottes and freekles of the visage; by reason of which qualitie, when they be taken afore drinke, with their bitternesse they fret the pores of the skinne, and leave the impression of a certaine biting behinde them, by meanes whereof, there ensueth a certaine revultion downward from the head of those vapours which flie up thither, and so evaporate 10 away through the faid pores. But for mine owne part, I am of this opinion rather, that their bitternesse hath a vertue to dry up and spend humors: which is the reason that of all vapours, the bitter is most unpleasant and disagreeable to the taste: for that indeed as Plate faith, consuming moisture (as it doth) by meanes of the drinesse which it hath, it doth unnaturally binde and drawin, the little veines of the toong, which of themselves be soft, and spungeous: after the fame manner men use to restraine such wounds or ulcers which be mostly, with medicines, or falves composed of bitter drougues, according as the poet Homer testifieth in these verses:

A bitter route he bruif dwith hands, and lud upon the fore, Totake the anguish cleane away, that it might ake no more: And to, applied when it was, all paines were foone allaid, The running ulcer dried anon, and flux of blond was staid.

He faid well and truly, of that which is in tafte bitter: That it hath a vertue & propertie to drie. And it should seeme also, that the powders which women strew upon their bodies for to represe diaphoneticall and extraordinarie sweets, be by nature bitter and aftringent; so forcible is their bitternesse to binde and restreine; which being so, great reason there is, (I say) that bitter almonds thould have power to withfland the strength of meere wine, considering they drie the 30 body within, and will not permit the veines to bee full, upon the tention and commotion whereof (they fay) drunkennesse doth proceed: and for evident proofe of this, there may be a good argument gathered from that which befalleth foxes; who having caten bitter almonds, if they drinke not presently upon them, die therewith, by reason that all their humors suddenly are spent and confumed.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that old folke take greater delight in pure and strong wine, than others.

Here arose a question about old persons, what the reason might be, that they loved better to drink wine without water, or arthe least used additional to the state of the stat to drink wine without water, or at the leaftwife delaied but a little? Some alledged the habit of their bodies, being cold, and hard to be fet into an heat: in regard whereof, the strength of wine was incer and agreeable to their temperature : a reason very common and ready at hand; but furely, neither sufficient for to bee the cause of such an effect, nor yet simply true; for the fame hapneth to their other fences, as being hard to be mooved and affected; yea and nothing casie to be stirred, for to apprehend the qualities thereto belonging, unlesse the same be passing flying and vehement; whereof the true cause indeed is this: that their temperature being weake, dull, and feeble, loveth to be put in minde by knocking upon; and this is the cause, that for their tafte they delight in such sapours as be biting; their smelling likewise standeth even so to odors that be strong, for affected it is with more pleasure in such as be not tempered nor delaied: as for the sense of touching, they seele no great paine of ulcers and sores; and if it happen that they be wounded, their hurt and harme is not fo great: the fame befalleth to their hearing, for their eares be in manner deafe : and heereupon it is that muficians as they grow in yeeres and waxe aged, straine and raise their voice in singing so much the higher and lowder, as if they stirred up the organs of heating by the vehement force of the found; for looke what is freele to the edge and temper of iron for cutting; the same is spirit to the bodic, for sense and feeling: and when it beginnes once to flacke, faile, and decay, the fenfe likewife and the infituments thereof becomedull, heavie and earthly, having need of fome fuch quicke thing to pricke it in good earnest as strong wine is.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

How it comes to passe, that olde solke reade better asarre off than necre at hand.

Gainst those reasons which wee devised and alledged upon the subject matter and point in hand, it feemed that there might be opposed the cie-fight; for that elder persons, for to reade any thing the better, remoove the letters farther from their eies; and in trueth can not well readencere at hand: which the poet Aefehylus feemeth covertly to implie, and fnew unto us in these verses:

Know him thou canst not, if neere he stand to thee, A good olde scribe thou maist much sooner be.

And Sophocles more plainly tettifieth as much, when he writeth of old folke in this wife:

The voice to them arrives not readily, And hardly thorow their eares the way can finde,

But neere at hand, they all be very blinde. Ifthen it be fo, that the fenfes of aged perfons, and the instruments serving thereto, are not willingly obeifant to their proper objects, unleffe the fame be ftrong and vehicment; what should the cause be, that in reading, they can not endure the reverberation of the light from letters, if they be neere? but fetting the booke farther off from their eies, they do by that meanes enfeeble (as it were) that light, for that it is spread and dissipate in the aire, like as the strength of wine when it is tempered with water ? To this probleme, fome answered thus: That they remoove books and letters farre from their eie-fight, not because they would make the saide light more mildeor lesse radiant; but contrariwise, for that they are desirous to catch and gather more fplendor, and to fill the meane intervall (which is betweene the cie and the letter) with lightfome 30 and shining aire. Others accorded with those, who holde, that the eies do send out of them, certeineraies; for by reason that aswell from the one eie as the other, a pyramidal beame doth iffue, the point whereof is in the fight of the eie, and the basis doth comprehend the object that is feene; probable it is, that both these pyramides goe forward apart one from the other a good space and distance, but after they be a great way off, and come to encounter one another, and be confounded together, they make but one entire light: and this is the reason, that albeit the cies are twaine, yet every thing that we fee, appeareth one, and not two 3 for that (in trueth) the meeting and shining together of those two pyramides in common, do make of two sights, but one. This being presupposed and set downe, olde men approching neere to letters, comprehend the fame more feebly, in regard that the pyramidall beames of their cies are not yet joined and met 40 together, but ech of them reach to the objects apart; but if they be farther off, to that the faid pyrainides may be intermingled, they fee more perfectly; much like to them, who with both hands can claspe and hold that, which they are not able to do with one alone.

Then my brother Lamprias opposed himselfe against all this; and as one who had not read the booke of Hieronymus, but even upon the pregnancy and quickenesse of his wir, seemed to render another reason; namely: That we see by the meanes of certeine images arising from the objects or visible things, which at the first be big, and for that cause trouble the fight of old folke, when they regard them necre and hard-by, being indeed but hard and flow of motion: but when the faid images be advanced and ipread farther into the aire, and have gained fome good distance, the groffe and terrestrial parts of them breake and fall downe; but the more subtill por-50 tions reach as farre as to the eies, without any paine or offence unto them, and do infinuate and accommodate themselves equally and smoothly into their concavities: so that the cies being leffe troubled, apprehend and receive them better. And even fo it is with the odours of flowers, which are very fweet to finell unto a good way off; whereas if a man come over-neere unto them, they yeeld nothing to kinde and pleafant a fent: the reason is, because that together with the favour, there goeth from the flower, much earthly matter, groffe and thicke, which corruptethand marreth the fragrant sweetnesse of the odour, if it be smelled to very neere; but in case the same be a prety way off, that terrestriallevaparation is dispersed round about, and so faileth away, but the pure and hor part thereof, continueth behinde, and pierceth forward ftill, by reason of the fubtilitie that it hath, untill it be presented unto the nostrils. But we, receiving and admit. ting the principle of Plato, affirme & hold. That there paffeth from the cies an illuminate spirit, which intermingleth it felfe with the electronesse and light that is about the bodies of visible ob. jects; by which meanes there arifeth an united composition from them twaine, according in every point one with another, but concorporate they be by measure and proportion; for neither the one nor the order, ought to periff, as being furmounted by his fellow, but of twaine contempered together in just proportion, there is made one puissance and meane facultie betweene. Seeing then, that the thing which passeth thorow the eie-sight of those persons who be farre stept in yeeres, be it some sluxion, lightsome spirit, or bright beame, (call it what you 10 will) is in them, weake and feeble, there can not be a mixture and composition of it, with the shining aire abroad, but rather an extinction and fuffocation, unleffe they remove the letters a pretic way off from their cies, and by that meanes temper and refolve the exceeding brightneffe of the light, so as the same hit not upon their sight, so long as it is too radiant and resplendant, but measured and proportioned to the feeblenesse of their eies. This also is the cause of that which befalleth to those living creatures which see best in the darke, and feed themselves by night; for their cie fight being naturally weake, is offuscate and darkened by the great light of the day; for that fuch weak raies proceeding from fo tender a fource or fountaine, will not well fort & agree with fo strong and forcible light; but their eies do send forth beames sufficient and proportion. able, to be mingled with a light more dim and duskish, like as the light of a starre in the night 10 feafon appeareth best: and thus being incorporate with it, it is cooperative to the performance of fenfe.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that clothes be better washed in fresh water than that of the sea?

Heon the grammarian, upon a time when wee were feafted by Metrius Florus, demaunded of Themistocles the philosopher, how it came to passe that Chrysopus having made mention in many places of strange positions and paradoxes, which seemed to goe to against all reason;) as for example: That salt fish, or powdred flesh, if it bee watered or washed in fea water, becommeth more sweet: also fleeces of wooll are leffe pliable, if they bee plucked forcibly, than if they be gently handled, toofed and drawen in funder. Item, that they who have fasted long, chew their meat, and eat more slowly at first, than after they have eaten a little;) rendreth no reason of the one nor the other: unto whom Themistocles answered: That Chry/ippus proposed them by the way onely, and as it were for example sake to advertise and admonth us; for that we are ever ready to believe, even without all reason, any thing that catieth with it some small likelihood and probability, and contratiwise to discredit that which at the first fight seemeth unlikely: But what reason I pray you (quoth he)my good friend have you to fearch & enquire into these matters ? For if you be so contemplative and inquisitive in find-40 ing out the caules of natural things, you need not to goe farre from that which belongeth to your profession: but tel me why Homer bringeth in Nauseaa, washing her clothes in the river,& not in the fea which was so neere unto her; notwithstanding that falt sea water being hotter, more transparent,& absterfive than fresh water of the river, seemeth by all apparance better for to wash withall? As touching this probleme (quoth Theon) long fince hath Aristotle resolved it, referring all to the terrestrity of the sea; for that in sea water there is mingled much earthlic fubflance, which causeth it to be so salt, by reason whereof, it beareth them up better who swim therein; also it carieth a greater and heavier burden than fresh water, the which yeeldeth and giveth way, as it is more fubtile, lighter, and feebler, as being more fimple and pure : in which regard it pierceth sooner, and by this penetrative facultie, it scoureth and clenseth awaie 50 all staines and spottes better than sea water: and thinke you not that this reason of Aristotle carreth great apparence of truth? Yes verily (quoth I) there is apparence and probabilitie indeed thereof, but no truth at all : for this I fee ordinarily that the maner is to incraffate fresh water with athes or gravel stones; or if there be none to be had, even with very dust, as if the roughnesse of terrestrial substaunce were more meet and apt, to clense all filthinesse, which simple and cleere water cannot doe so well, by reason of the thinne subtilitie thereof, and because it is very weake: and therefore it is not well and truely faid, that the thicknesse of the sea water him-dreth his effect. But the true cause is, for that it is penetrant and piercing; for this acrimonie doth unbinde and o pen the small pores, and so draweth foorth the ordine outwardly; whereas contrariwife, that which is groffe and thicke, is never good and meet for to wash withall, but rather it maketh spots & steines: now is the sea fattie and oileous, which may be a principal cause why it is not good to wash withall: and, that sea water is uncteous, Aristotle himselfe beareth witnesse; for even salt it selfe hath a certeine fattinesse and unctuosity in it; by reason whereof, it causeth those lampes to burne more cleere wherein it is put: yea and sea water if it be sprinkled or dropped upon the flame, will likewife be of a light fire and burne withall; neither is there any water that burneth fo much as that of the fea; and in this regard I am of opinion, that to it is of all other water hottest: howbeir there may bee another reason yeelded: for considering that the end and confummation of washing, isto drie; those things wee hold most neat and cleane which are drieft; and therefore the moisture that doth wash, must goe away together with the ordure; like as the root of Ellebore is fent out of the body with the melancholike humour: as for the humiditie which is sweet and fresh by reason of the lightnesse thereof, the finne draweth it up very quickly; whereas the faltneffe of fea water flicketh faft to the finall pores, & by reason of the asperitie thereof is hard to be dried. Then Theon: This (that you fay quoth he) is nothing, but very falle; for Aristotle in the fame booke affirmeth, that those who wash in the sea, are sooner dry than they that wash in fresh water, if they stand in the sunne. He faith fo indeed (quoth I) but I thought that you would fooner beleeve Homer, who holdeth 20 the contrarie. For ulyffes after he had fuffred shipwracke mette with ladie Nausicaa:

All terrible and fearefull to be feene For that in fea all plunged five had beene. Yea and himfelfe faid unto her women and waiting maidens:

Retire aside and stand you farre from me,
Faire damosels, until such time you see,
That I have washt from off my shoulders twaine
The filth of sea, that now my skinne doth staine.
And when he had thus faid, he went downe into the river,

And there anon, he scowr'd cleane away, The salt sea-some, upon his head that lay.

In which place, the poet hath marvelous well observed and expressed that which ordinarilie hapneth in such a case: for that, when they who come foorth of the sea stand drying them in the sunne; his heat doth presently diffipate the most subtle and lightest substance of the humiditie, and then, that which is most soule and filthy, remaining behinde, slicketh to, is baked and felted to the skinne, in manner of a salt crust, untill it be washed off with fresh and potable water.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that at Athens they never judged nor pronounced the daunce of the tribe Acantisto be the last?

T the folemne feaft which Serapion made for the victory of the daunce, which the tribe or Alinage Aeantis obtained, by his leading and conduct to which feast we were bidden, as being of that tribe; for that the people had endued us with the priviledge and right of bourgeofic in the same; much talke there was occasioned by the great emulation and strife which hadbeene for the honour of that present daunce: and indeed followed it was with much zeale and heat of affection, by reason thatking Philopappus himselfe in person, was a most honourable and magnificent prefident thereof, having defraied the charges belonging to the daunces of every tribe; who being present also with us, invited guests to this stately supper (as hee was a 30 prince no leffe courteous and full of humanitie, than studious and desirous of knowledge) had both the proposing and also the hearing of many antiquities. Now there was propounded and Put to discourse, such a matter as this, by Marcus the Grammarian, namely: that N eanthes the Cyzicene wrote in his fabulous narrations of this citie, that the tribe Aeant is had by especiall honour, this speciall priviledge above the rest, that their daunce was never adjudged to the last place. That writer (quoth the king) is not fufficient to authorize an history; but supposing that this were true, let us make it the subject-matter of our discourse at this present, and search the cause thereof. But admit (quoth our friend Mile) that this were a salse tale. What then?

(quoth king Philopappus) there were no great matter in it, if the like befall unto us for love of learning, as fornetime did to the wife philosopher Democritus; who feeding one day (as it should Iceme) upon a concumber, when he perceived the juice and liquor thereof to be verie fweet, and to tafte of honie; demanded of his maid-fervant who attended upon him, where she bought it: who named a certeine garden: whereupon he rose from the boord, and would needs have her to bring him thither, and to shew him the very place where it grew : but the wench woondering at her mafter, and asking him the reason what he meant to be gone in such haste: Why (quoth he) I must needs finde out the cause of this extraordinary sweetnesse, and finde it I shall, when I have well viewed and considered the place : hereat the maiden smiling : Sit you ftill, good fir (quoth fhe) and let this thing trouble your head no farther; for the trueth is this: 10 I chanced before I was aware, to put this concumber into a veffell that had honie in it. Then Democritus feeming to be offended and displeased with her: Thou angress me to the heart with thy prittle-prattle, I will (I tell thee) go forward in this my intended purpole; and fearch into the cause hereof, as if this sweetnesse were naturall and came of the concumber it selfe; and even so we will not pretend this readinesse and facilitie of Neanthes in delivering some matters incredible, as an evasion or excuse, to avoid this present disputation : for if none other good wil come of our discourse, yet I am sure it will serve well to whet and exercise our wits the while. Then all the companie at once with one accord, fell to praise the said tribe Aeantis, relating and colle-Cting what commendable acts soever and glorious feats of armes had beene performed by that tribe. And here they failed not to rehearfe the famous battell of Marathon, which is a Statebelonging to the tribe Acantis. They forgat not to alledge likewife, how Harmedius and Arisso. 20 gnon were Acantides, borne in Aphiane, a towne of that tribe. Also Glaucias the oratour affirmed, that the right wing or point of that battell of Marathon, was affigued to them of that tribe, proving the fame by the Elegies or verses which the poet Aeschylus had composed in the praise of their good fervice, having himselfe in person fought valiantly in the said conflict. Moreover, he showed that Callimachus the high marshall of the field, being one of that linage, both bare himselse right bravely that day, and was one of the principall authors (after captaine Militades) of that fought field, gave his voice with him, and perswaded to strike this battell. Unto this allegation of Glucius, I my felse added moreover, and faid: That the decree or commission, by vertuc whereof Militia tes led foorth the Athenian armie with banner displaied, into the field, was concluded at what time as the tribe Acantis was prefident of the counfell at Athens; as also 30 that the same tribe in the battell of Platea, carried away the praise and prise for their brave service above the rest: and hecreupon it is, that this tribe of cheantis folemnizeth every yeere a flately facrifice, for that victorie, as being commanded and appointed fo to doe by the oracle Sacrificers. of Apollo, upon the mount Citheron, and the fame performed by nymphes or maidens * Sphagitides: for the celebration of which folemnity, the city furnisheth them with beasts and other things needfull for the fame facrifice. But yet you fee (quoth I) that all the rest of the tribes may as well alledge for themselves many valiant acts by them atchieved; and namely, Leontis; from which my felfe am descended, which in glorious renowme, giveth place to none whatfoever. Confider therefore my masters, whether it bee not very like and more probable, that 40 this was attributed unto it, for to appeale and comfort that woorthy person who gave the name 4 unto this tribe; I meane Ajax the sonne of Telamon, who had not the patience to endure the overthrow in judgement, and losse of Achilles armour, but was so farre inflamed with envie, emulation, and wrath, that he spared nothing, nor cared for the ruine of all: to the end therefore that he might not fall into another fit of furie, and be implacable; thought good it wasto ease him of the thing which might of all things offend and vexe him most, in that disfavour and disgrace, to wit: That the tribe which beareth his name, should never be thrust downe into the lowest and

the Sympofiaques.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

What be the things whereof Xenophon faith: That men love bester to be asked and to be scoffed at for, when they fit at the boord, than other wise no?

F those things (ô Soisus Senecio) which are provided to furnish The Presides. and set out feasts and banquets, some are to be raunged as altogether necessarie; namely, bread, wine, viands, meats, both flesh and fish, benches, stooles, formes, and tables; others be but accessaries and may be spared, devised onely for pleasure, and not upon any urgent necessitie; as plaies, shewes, and pastimes brought in, either to be heard or seene; some pleasant buffon also or mery jester to make folke laugh, fuch an one as Philip in Kallata his house, which disports men are delighted in otherwhiles, if they be presented, and if they be not, they are not greatly miffed, nor much cared for, neither is the feast thought defectuous for want thereof. The fame may be faid of table talke: for onekinde there is which modest and civill men doe embrace and enterteine, in regard of their proper use fitting and agreeable for meales and meat indeed; another fort they admit, and allowas conteining some gentle speculation, and the same befeemeth rather the time imploied in hearing musticke, of flute, hautboies, lute and viall. And of both these, our first booke conteined certaine miscellane examples one with another; as namely; of the first fort were these questions: Whether it be good and commendable, to treat and dispute of philosophicall matters at the table or no? Alfo, whether it be better, that the mafter of the feast himselfe place his guests, at the boord, or permit them to fit at their owne discretion? Of the second kind be these; whereupon arose this common saying: That love teacheth musicke or poetrie? as also the queftion concerning the tribe Meanies and fuch like. For mine owne part, I would call the former Sympotica, as properly belonging to a feast; the other by the generall name Symposiaca, as befeeming rather a banquet after the feaft is done: howbeit fet downe they are by me pell-mell, and not diffinctly, but according as every one of them came into my minde and remembrance: neither must the readers marvell if I collect and gather certeine speeches for to dedicate unto you, which have beene haply held heeretofore by others, or by your owne felfe: for albeit our learning is not alwaies a calling to remembrance, yet oftentimes it falleth out, that to remem- 10 ber and to learne, concurre and meet together in one subject matter. Moreover, having digefled in every booke ten questions, the first of this second is one, that Xenophon a disciple of So. erates, hath in fome fort proposed unto us, when hee writeth: That Gobryas being upon a time at supper with Cyrus, as he praised many other fathions of the Persians, so he commended them especially in this: That they demaunded one of another such questions, wherewith they stood better pleafed, than if they had not beene asked at all; and betweene whiles, let flie fuch pleafant fcoffes and jeftes, as that the parties fo fcoffed at, liked thereof better, than otherwife if they had beene let alone. For if it be fo, that other men, even with their praifes many times offend us, why should we not greatly admire the seemely grace and wittie conceit of those, whose scoffes and jefts yeeld pleafure and contentment to those who seeme to be mocked therewith? This is the 10 reason why Sopater having one day invited us to a feast at Patra, mooved this talke and saide: Gladly would I know what kinde of questions and interrogatories they were? of what nature. and what the manner of them was? For no small part it is (quoth hee) of our entercourse and mutuall communication one with another, to have the dexteritie and skill, both to know and also to observe the decencie and congruitie in such pleasant demaunds and facete jelts. Nay, (quoth I againe) a great matter it is; but marke, if Xenophon himselfe as well in the Sympolium or banquet of Socrates, as in those of the Persians, giveth not us to understand what was the order thereof: and if you thinke good that we enter into this discourse, and that I should adde somewhat of mine owne. First and formost this is mine opinion: That men are well enough pleased to be asked those questions, to which they are able easily to answere, and 30 namely of fuch things as they have best skill and experience of: for if one should demaund of them, matters that they know not, either they be offended and grieved if they can fay nothing unto them (like as those who are called upon to pay debts which they are not able to discharge) or if they bring out crosse, impertinent, and untoward reasons, they are much troubled, dismaied, and perplexed: whereas if their answers bee not onely readie and easie, but also wittie and exquifite, fo much the more pleafant and agreeable it is to the answerers: now those I count wittie and exquisite, which carie somewhat with them, that the common multitude knoweth not, or which few men have heard of; fuch as be the points of aftrologie or logicke, especially if they be well seene therein, and have as it were the habit of them: for everie man is well pleased and appaied, not onely in practifing and spending his time, as Euripides faith: 40

Whereby he may quit him so well, That even himselfe he may excell,

but also in reasoning and discoursing of that wherein he hathbest skill and knowledge. For men take great contentment when they be asked questions of that which they have an insight in, and knowing so much by themselves as they doe, loth they bee to have their cunning hidden, and to be thought of others ignorant therein: therefore those who have beene great travellers, and failed in many voiages, cannot be better pleased, than when others enquire of them as touching farre countries, strange seas, the manners, sashions, and customes of barbarous nations; and you bring them to bedde (as they say) when you put them to discourse of such matters; as being most willing to describe and draw upon a table the coasts, places, straigths, so and gulses by which, and through which they have passed, reputing it to be no small frute of all their travels, and an easement of the paines which they have endured: in one word, looke whatloever we of our selves are woont, without the demand and intreaste of others to recount and relate willingly; the same are we desirous that men should aske us questions of, and how-soever we seeme to doe pleasure unto the company, yet indeed we have much adoe to hold, and with great paine sorbeare to utter the same. This is a very maladie incident to sailers and seamen above all other. As for those that be of a more modest and civill nature, they are desirous to be asked those things, which they are willing enough to utter, but that they be abashed, and in reverent regard of them that be present, passe over in silence those exploits which they have performed happily and with great honour: and therefore good olde Nestor in Homer did very wisely, who knowing well the ambitious humour and desire of glory which was in ulysses, spake unto him:

ulylles, flower of noble chrushrie, Renowmed knight, and all the Greeks glorie, To tell us now, I pray (good fir) begin, How ye both twaine did thofe greas borfes win.

For unwilling men are to heare those who praise themselves or recount their owne worthy acts, is there be not one or other of the company that is urgent with them so to do, or unlesse they be in maner forced unto it; and therefore they are glad, when they be asked concerning the ambassages wherein they have been e imploied; of their acts during the time of their government of State, especially, if they have performed some great and honourable service therein; and withall, perceive that it is not for envie nor malice, that such demands be made: for otherwise, such as be envious or malicious, weepe at those reports, and be ready to put them by, not willing to give place unto any narrations, nor to minister occasion or matter of talke, that may turne to the honorand commendation of him that delivereth the same. Moreover, this is another meanes to gratifie those who are to answere; namely, to move question of such things as they wor well to cough, that their enemies and ill-willers are loth to heare. And verily, uly see faid to Aleinous in this wise:

Aminde you have, to heare me tell my wofull miferie; Thas I might fill figh, groane and waile for my hard de limie.

Even to Oedipus in Sophocles answered thus to the company of the Chorus:

Awoeit is (my friend) toraife and wake
A griefe that long hath flept and reft dath take.

But contrariwise, Europides wrote after this fort:

How sweet is no one for to remember

The paine now past, which sometime he dia suffer! True it is, but not to those who still wander, and (being to sed in troublesome seas) do yet meet with new misfortunes and calamities. But to return eagaine to our former purpose; we ought to beware how wee demand ill newes: for men are grieved at the heart, to make report either how they have bene cast & condemned in any fute, or that that they have buried their children, asalfo, how infortunate they have bene in their traffique either by fea or land : contrariwife, they are well pleased to rehearse and repeat often times (if they be asked the question) how they have had good audience given them from the publike place of making orations, and obteined whatfoever they there demanded; how they have beene faluted and honourably entreated by 40 fomeking and potentate; and how, when other paffengers and travellers with them, have beene plunged into dangers of tempest or theeves, they onely escaped the perill: and for that in the bare relation, they feeme (as it were) to enjoy the thing it felfe, they can not be fatisfied with the discourse and remembrance thereof. Also men rejoice and take delight, when they be asked as touching their friends, who are fortunate and doe prosper in the world, or of their owner children that profit well in learning and good literature, or have fped well in pleading causes, or otherwise are of credit in the court and with princes: semblably, they be very well content and pleased, to be moved for to relate, and so are more willing to make report of the loffes or shamefull difgraces of their enemies and ill-willers, whom either they have overthrowen at the barre and caused to be condemned, or who otherwise are fallen into any disastrous calamity; for of 50 themselves, loth they are, unlesse they be required thereto, to recount such things, lest they might be reputed malicious, and glad to heare of other mens harmes. A hunter loveth very well, to have speech and question mooved unto him as touching hounds 3 so doth a champion, and one that delighteth in bodily exercises, to be trained to talke of gymnasticall pastimes and feats of activitie, like as an amorous lover, of fuch persons as be faire and beautifull; a devout and religious man discourfeth ordinarily of dreames and visions that hee feeth, and what good fuccesse he hath had inhis affaires, by observing the direction of oracles, the presages of auguric and offes, by doing facrifice, and generally, by the grace and especiall favour of the gods: and fuch be well pleafed for to be asked questions as concerning these matters. As for old folke, you shall do them a high pleasure, if you put them to it, for to make any discourse what soever; for although the narration concerne them nothing at all, nor be to any purpose, yet if one aske them questions, he tickleth them in the right veine, and scratcheth them (as they say) where it itcheth. This appeareth by these verses out of Homer:

O Nettor, fonne of Neleus, tell me in veritie,
How Agamemnon, elder fonne of Arcus, did die?
Where was his yoonger brother then,
for Menclaus hight?
Lives he or no, in Achwa,
at Argoseitie bright?

Here you fee Telemachus asketh him many questions at once, giving him occasion and matter of much speech, not as some do, who restrening olde folke to answere to the point only which is necessarie, and driving them within a narrow compasse, between them of that which is their greatest pleasure. In sum, they that would rather please and delight, than displease and trouble, propose such questions, the answeres whereunto, draw with them, not the blame and reproofe, but the praise and commendation; not the harted and spight, but the amitie and good will of the hearers. And thus much may ferve for interrogatories and demands.

As touching scoffes and merry jests, he that knoweth not how to use and handle them with dexterity, good difcretion and skill, according to time and place convenient, I would advise him altogether to forbeare them. For like as if men be in a flippery or ticklish ground, they that touch them never fo little in running by, are able to overturne and lay them along; even foat the table, when we are drinking, in danger we be upon every small occasion in the world offered (by a word not well placed, or untowardly delivered) to fall into choler; yea, and many times, more mooved we are with a fcoffe or pleasant gibe, than with a reprochfull taunt or meere flander; for that ordinarily it is seene; that a reprochfull word proceedeth from a violent fit and sudden passion of anger, even against his will that giveth it; but we take more to the heart, a mocke or fcornfull flout, as comming from a prepented malice, and a voluntary minde fet upon milchiele, without any necessitie at all enforcing thereto; and to be briefe, we are in generall more 30 offended with those that can give a drie frumpe in good sadnesse, than such as cast foorth words at randon. And this we hold for certeine, that every one of fuch frumps biteth fore, and feemeth to be an artificiall kinde of reproch devifed and thought upon of purpose before-hand: as for example, if one call another falt-fish-monger, by that word he gives him openly a plainereproch; but if he fay, we remember well, that you are woont to wipe or fnuffe your nofe upon your fleeve, he mocks him covertly, and calles him as much by craft. The like frumpe it was, that Cicero uled to one Octavius, who supposed to be an Affrican borne: for when he seemed to excuse himselfe that he heard not what Cicero spake: And that is a great woonder (quoth Cicereagaine) confidering that you have an holebored through your care. And Melanthim being 40 floured and made a mocking stocke by a comedie maker: You have (quoth he) given me a reward that I never deserved, and paid me that which you owed me not : such gibes therefore and mocks as these, doe pricke worse, and much like to arrowes with barded heads, sticke longer by them who are thus flouted; and for their wittinesse more delight those who are present, than for any other pleasure else, seeme to winne credit unto him that useth them. For to speake a truth, a fcoffe or mocke is nothing else but a covert and diffimuled reproch for some fault, according to Theophrastus: so as he that standeth by and heareth it, can make construction thereof, and ghesse how to adde more unto it, as knowing and beleeving all the rest behinde to be true. For no doubt he that laugheth heartily as if he were tickled, when he heareth the answer of Theoritus to one, who being named for a common stripper of men out of their garments, as they went 50 late in the streets , asked him if he went foorth to supper? Yes mary doe I (quoth hee) but I meane to lie there all night: fuch an one (I fay) feemeth to confirme the opinion of the foreaid crime, for which the partie was suspected; insomuch as hee that mocketh and scoffeth impertinently and without grace, possesses the standers by and hearers with malice, as if they infulted over the partie mocked, and were abbetters themselves, as being glad that hee is thus derided or reproched. But in that noble citie Lacedamon, among other good disciplines in times past there taught, men learned also to jest at others without biting, and not to count themfelves nipped, when themselves were jested with : and if peradventure a man shewed himselse discontented with some broad jest, and could not be are it well, the other partie presently gave over and was quiet. How then can it chuse but be an hard matter, to finde that kinde of scoffe or taunt which may content and pleafe the party mocked? confidering that it is a point of no final arte, nor meane experience and dexteritie to bee able for to discerne and judge, what it is that in the feat of mockerie which is not offensive. Howbeit to open a little the meanes thereto: First and formost it seemeth, that as these jestes touch and sting them most who know themselves to be guilty of those vices for which they be mocked: so the same frumps if they note men for fuch faults of which they be most cleere, must needs in some fort be pleasant and acceptato ble unto them upon whom they be discharged. Thus Xenophon jesting pleasantly with that foule and ilfavoured fellow above all others, all hairy, and as rough as a beare; faid: He was the minion and love of Sambaulas. You may call to minde also Quintus a good friend of ours, who when he lay ficke in bedde, complained that his hands were cold: But you brought them warm enough not long fince (quoth Aufidius Modestus,) when you returned out of the province: which quippe being banded upon him, an honest and upright prætor, ministred occasion of mirth, contentment, and laughter; the same if it had light upon a proconfull that had used extortion or oppression, would have beene a girding and nipping reproch. This is the reason that when Socrates chalenged Critobulus the fairest young man then living, to compare their beauties, jested merrily with him, but scorned and derided him not. And Alcabiades himselse 20 was pleafantly disposed with Socrates, when he said: That jealous he was of faire Agathon. And even kings and great princes verily otherwhiles joy and take pleasure when they be spoken of, as if they were poore or private persons; like as one of these pleasants or parasiticall jesters, when king Philip feemed to gird and scoffe at him, returned upon him againe this word: What fir, know you not who I am, do not I keepe & mainteine you? For in reproching such persons with vices and defects, as which are not in them, they doe after an oblique manner give them to understand, and doe make knowen the vertues and perfections which they have. But heere wee must take heed and be fure in any wife, that such good parts they be indued withall indeed, and without all doubt; otherwise that which is spoken to the contrary, buzzeth in their heads, and breedeth a doubtfull suspicion in themselves: for hee that faith unto a rich and great monied 30 man, that he will be his broker, and helpe him to fome uturers of whom he may take up mony at interest; or unto a sober person, who drinketh nothing but water, that he is a drunkard, or hath taken his wine too liberally; or he that calleth a liberall man, well knowen to fpend magnificently, and ready to pleafure all men, a base mechanicall kumbix, and a pinching peni-father; or he who threatneth a famous advocate or counsellor at the barre, who hath a great name for lawe and eloquence in all courts of plea, and befides for policie and government is in high authoritie, that he will bring him to a non-fute, or overthrow him judicially, he (I fay) ministreth matter of good spirit and laughter unto the partie whom he seemeth so to chalenge or menace. Aster this manner king Cyrus became very lovely and gracious, by his fingular courtefie, in that he would feeme to provoke his familiars for to performe those feats, wherein he knew himselfe 40 inferior to them: and when Ismenias the famous musician plaid one day upon his flute, during the time of facrifice, but so, as for all his mulicke there appeared no good prognosticks and lignes, in the beaft facrificed, testifying that the gods were propice and well pleased; another mercenary minstrell, taking the instruments in his hand, kept a foolish and ridiculous tooting, full untowardly; and when all the company there in place reprooved him for it: To found an instrument (quoth he) to the contenument of the gods, is an heavenly gift: whereat Ismenias laughed a good, and made this answer: You take the matter amisse (quoth he) and cleane contrary, for whiles I plaied, the gods tooke fo great pleasure in my musicke, that they intended it onely, & had no while to accept of the facrifice; but when thou begannest to meddle with the Pipes, they received it immediately, and made hafte to be ridde and delivered of thy abfurd pi-50 ping. Moreover, they who call fuch things as bee fimply good, by odious and opprobrious names, and that in mirth, if they doe the fame with a good grace; please more than those who directly praise the same; like as they doe nippe and bite more shrewdly, who give reproches under faire and lovely tearmes, as for example: fuch as call wicked persons, Aristides, or base cowards, Achilles: after the manner of Oedipus in Sophocles, when he faid:

Creon who had beene alwater kind
And even at first her faithfull friend.

Another kinde there seemes to be of ironicall praise, opposite unto the former; namely, when Kkk 3 semblant femblant is made of blame and reproofe: which maner of praile, Socrates often used; as for exexample, when he called the industrious meanes that Antisthenes practised to reconcile men and make them friends, as also to gaine good will and favour, broakage, bauds-craft, entifement and allurement: as alfo, for that the philosopher Crates, had a good grace with him wheresover he went, and because he was ever welcome, honourably received, and kindly enterteined into what house soever he came, he was commonly named Thyrepanaeles, as one would say; The doore-opener. Furthermore, that mockerie is pleafing, which goeth in maner of a complaint, and yet carrieth with it a kinde of gratitude and thankefulnesse. Thus Diogenes speaking of his master and teacher Antisthenes,

Who clad me in a cloake thred bare, Andmademeragged clothes to weare; Who forced me to beg my food,

And houselesse for to walke abroad. For nothing fo good a grace it would have had, in case he had used these words: He who made me wife, contented, and happy. Also a certeine Laconian, who making a shew, that he blamed the warden of the publicke froughes and halles of exercises, for giving him wood so drie, that it would not fo much as smoake, said thus of him: Heere is one, by whose meanes we can not be fuffered to shed at eare. Semblably, if a man should call him who kept a bountifull table, and feasted him every day, a tyrant and taker of men perforce, saying withall, that he would not suffer him to cat his meales at home, nor to fee fo much as once his owne table in fo many yeeres 20 space: like as if one should complaine of the king, for making him, of a poore man, rich and wealthy, in these tearmes: That he had laied wait for him to doe him a shrewd turne, in taking from him his repose and leasure, and bereaving him of his sleepe and natural rest: or as is some man having gathered plenty of good wine, turning againe upon the gods Cabeiri in Aeschlus. should accuse them, for that they had caused him to have scant of vineger in his house, as they themselves in bourd and mirth had menaced to doe. For these kinds of covert, secret and dissimuled praifes, enter farther, carrying with them a greater grace and more effectuall by farre, in fuch fort, as they who in this wife perceive themselves to be commended, are nothing offended thereat, nor take it in ill part.

Over and befides, it behooveth him who would give a frumpe or fcoffe with a grace and dex- 30 teritie, to know also the difference of a desect and impersection, from studies and recreations whereto men are given: as namely, to diffing uith betweene avarice or a contentious humour, and the love of mulicke or of hunting: for as men cannot abide to be twit by those, so they are very well contented to be scoffed at for these; as Demosthenes the Mitylenæan plaied in this kinde pleasantly upon a time: for when he went to visit a familiar friend of his, who loved muficke passing well, and was much addicted to play upon the harpe; after that he had knocked at the doore, and the other hearing that it was he, willed him to come in : But first (quoth he) I would have you tie up your harpe. But the parasiticall bassau of king Lysunachus, contratiwise rejoined in this fort as rudely and uncivilly; for when the king had throwen a counterfeit fcorpion made of wood, upon his coat, whereat he first started and was afraied; but when he percei-40 ved once that the king was merrily disposed, and did but make sport, came upon him againe: And I will fright you, fir king, aswell (quoth he;) come on, and give me a talent from you. The like regard ought to be had, and the same difference made, as touching the defects or imperfections of the bodie, at least-wife in many of them: for if men be jested at, for that they be longnosed and hawked, or otherwise have short sout-noses, they will but laugh thereat. Thus one of the minions of Cassander, was nothing offended with Theophrastus, when he said: I woonder at your eies, that they fall not a finging, and make good musicke, confidering your nose is set and hidden within them: meaning, that he had a note fo flat and funke n. whis head. And Cyrus feeing one with a long nose and hawked withall, willed him to marrie a wife with a short and slat noie: For then (quoth he) you would match well, and make a good medly betweene you. But 50 in case we jest and make game at those whose nostrils stincke, or who have a strong and unsavory breath, they take it not well at our hands, but are displeased. On the other side, if they be plaied upon for their bald pates, they can abide it well enough, and put it up; but fay a man mocke them for having but one cie or being blinde, they will not endure it. In deedking Antigonus would jest pleasantle with himselfe for the losse of one cie; as namely, when there was prefented unto him a supplication written in great capitall letters: Why (quoth he) a man may see this, if hee were starke blinde, and had never an eie in his head: but Theorrism of Chies his prisoner, he put to death, for that, when one to comfort him, came and faid: That if the kings eies once had afight of him, he should be pardoned, and save his life: Why then (quoth he) God have mercie upon me; for impossible it is for me to escape death; which he faid, because king Antigonus had but one eie. Lee the Bizantine, when Pasades objected unto him his bleered eies, saying: Mine eies before with looking upon yours: Goe to (quoth he) you twit and reproch me, for a bodily infirmity that I have, and never looke your felfeupon a fonne of your owne, who carrieth the vengeance of God upon his shoulders : now this Passades had a sonne, who was crumpt shouldred and bunch backed. Likewise Archippus, who in his time bare a great sway in Athens, as being one of the oratours who led the people, and ruled the State, was very angry with Melan-10 thiss, who alluding to his bunch backe, and scotling thereat, used these tearnes! That he did not fland manfully upright in the defence of the citic, but *flouped and bended forward, as if he had fuffered it likewife to leane, reele, and finckedownward. And yet somethere be, who can carrie these broad jests patienty, and with good moderation; as one of the minions of king Antigo. mu, who having craved of him a talent infree gift, and feeing that he was denied it, required at the kings hands, that he would allow him a good ftrong guard to accompanie him: For feare (quoth he) that I be forlaied by the way, and rifled by him, who enjoined me to carrie a talent of filver at my backe. See, how men are diverily affected in these externall things, by reason of theinequallitie of their maimes, forme after one fort, and fome after another. Eparminondas fitting at a feast with his companions and colleagues in government, dranke wine as sharpe as 20 vineger, and when they asked him why he did to, and whether it made for his health? I know notifiat (quoth he) but well I worthis, that good it is to put mee in minde of my home diet. And therefore in casting out of jests and pleasant aunts, regard would be had of mens natures and dispositions, for that some have broader backs to beare scoffes than others: and endevour we must, so to converse with men both in bourd and in earnest, that wee offend no person, but be acceptable unto all.

As for love, a paffion very divers it is, and paffing variable, as in all other things, so in jefts and gibes especially: for that some will take offence and be soone angry, others will be merrie and laugh it out, if they be touched in that point; and therefore above all things the opportunitie of the time would be well observed : for like as when a fire is newly kindled and but weake 30 at the first, the winde will put it quite out, but when it hath gotten strength and burneth foorth, it mainteineth, feedeth, and augmenteth the flame; even fo love, when it is a breeding, and whiles it lieth secret, and sheweth not it selfe, quickly taketh displeasure and offence against those that discover it; but when it is once broken foorth, and is made apparent and knowen to all, then nourished it is, and taketh delight to be blowen (as it were) and enflamed more with scoffes and merry jestes: and that which pleaseth lovers best is this, when they be jested with, in theprefence of those whom they love, and namely in love matters, otherwise not; and if the case stand so, that they be woonderfully enamoured upon their owne wedded wives, or yoong laddes by the way of honest and vertuous love, then they joy exceedingly, they glory and take apride, in being fcoffed at for the love of them. Heerenpon Arcefilam being upon a time in 40 his schoole; when one of these professed lovers and amorous persons, chaunced in communication, to give him these words: Me thinks this that you have said toucheth none of this companie; replied thus and faid: No more than you are touched and mooved; and with all, shewed him a faire and well favoured youth in the prime of his yeeres fitting by him. Furthermore, good regard and confideration would be had, who they be that are prefent and in place, for otherwhiles, men are disposed to take up a laughter at merry words which they heare among friends and familiars, who would not take it well; but be offended thereat, if the fame were delivered before wife, father, or schoole-master, unlesse it were some thing that agreed very well with their humour: as for example, if one should mocke a companion of his before a philosopher, for going bare sooted, or fitting up at his booke all night long, studying and 50 writing; or in the presence of his father for being thriftie, and spending little; or in the hearing of his owne wife, that he cannot skill of courting and loving other dames, but is altogether devoted and serviceable unto her alone : thus Tigranes in Xenophon, was mocked by Cyrus, in these tearnes: What and if your wife, thould heare say that you made a page of your selfe, and catted your bedding and other stuffe upon your owne necke? She shall not (quoth he) heare it, but be an eie witneffe thereof, and fee it in het presence. Furthermore, when they who give out fuch merrie taunts as these, be partakers therein, and in some fort doe include themselves withall; leffe blame-woorthy they are, and nothing fo much to be reproved; as for example: when a poore man glaunceth against povertie, or a new upstart and gentleman of the first head, against meane parentage, or an amorous person girdeth at the wantonnesse of another lovers for it may feeme thereby, that there was no meaning and intent to offend or offer wrong, but that all was merrily spoken, seeing they partcipate in the like defects, for otherwise it might nippe very much, and go too neere to the quicke. Thus one of the affranchifed or freed men of the emperour, growen up on a fudden to be exceeding rich, bare himselfe very proud, and difdainfull to certeine philosophers, who fat at the table and supped together with him, insulting very infolently over them, and in the end comming out with this foolish question: How it came to passe that the broth or pottage made of beanes, whether they were blacke or white. looked greene alike? Aridices one of the philosophers there in place, asked him prefently a. 10 gaine, what the reason was, that the wales or marks of stripes and lashes, were all red indifferently, whether the whippes were made of white or blacke leather thongs? at which reply, the other was fo dashed, and disquieted, that he rose from the boord in a pelting chase, and would not taric. But Amphias of Taris (supposed to be no better than a gardiners sonne) having by way of fcorn fcoffed at one of the familiar friends of the lord deputie there, for his meane birth, taking himselfe immediately with the maner: But why say I sorfor we (quoth he) are come of no better feeds; made the party and all the company to laugh heartily. Semblably, there was a minstrell or professed musician, who kindly and with a very good grace, repressed the presumptuous curiofitie and unskilfulnesse of king Philip, who forgat himselfe so much, that hee would needs reade a lecture as it were unto the faid minstrell, how he should finger and strike; finding 20 fault with him in certeine accords of mulicke: Ah, God forbid, (quoth he) my good leege lotd that it should go so heard with your grace, as to be more skilful in this art than my selfe; for thus whiles he seemed to mocke himselfe, he told the king of his fault without offence : and this seemeth to be a device that comicall poets otherwhiles practife, to allay the bitter gall of their quips & taunts, namely, to scoffe at themselves, as Aristophanes used to make sport with his own bald pate: and Cratinus noted himselfe, that he loved wine so well, in that comedie which he intituled Pyrine, that is to fay, a bottle or flagon of wine: but above all, this regard and confideration would be had, that all such scoffes and merrie jestes, come from a man ex tempore, and readily, either by way of answer to a present demaund, or occasioned upon some other sudden scoffe, and in no wise to seeme farre fetcht, as a thing premeditate & studied on before: for 30 like as men beare and endure with more patience, the anger and debates among themselves, arifing now and then at the table, whiles they be in the middes of their cups; but if another strang ger thould come in place, and offer abuse to any of the guests, and so trouble the company, hee should be reputed an enemie, and for very hatred they would thrust him out of the dores by head & shoulders; even so, we can find in our harts, easily to pardon a scoffe, a frump, or broad jest, if it proceed from some matter, at the present deliverie, or seeme to comenaturally, unforced, and without all art; but in case it be not occasioned presently, nor respective to the purpose, but drawen (as one would say) violently by the haire of the head from elswhere; then it refembleth some ambush fore-laied afarre off, for to wrong and do injurie to one person or other; like to that jeft of Timagenes, which he discharged upon the husband of a woman, who 40 was wont ordinarily to cast up her gorge, in this maner:

Of Sympoliaques

With musicke bad you doe begin, Thus * vomiting to bring her in.

As also the demand proposed unto the philosopher Athenodorus, whether the love of parents to their children, be * muficall. For furely, fuch unfeafonable cuts and taunts as thefe, not accommodate to time and place, nor fitted to the present occasion, doe bewray a malicious you, that hath minde, and a deliberate purpose, to offer wrong and abuse: and therfore such persons as delight in these biting girds, many times for a word, which is the lightest thing in the world, as Plate faith, have paied a most heavie and grievous price; whereas contrariwise, they that know how to place their words in due time, in meet place, and aprly to the purpose, do verifie the testimo- 50 nic of the same Plato, who faith: That it is an affured signe of a mans good bringing up, and the point of liberall nurture and instruction, to know how to jest with a decent grace, and without the offence of any person.

THE

This equivocation in Greeke, carrieth that grace with it, which I can not fo aptly expresse in English. * promit. fome reade quantit. that is to fay, naturall. However it be, you must understand it of wanton love, which is neither naturall nor harmonicall. For this Athenedorus was noted for incest with one of his daughters.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Why men be more hungrie, and eat better in Autumne, than in any other quarter of the yeere?

N the borough Elenjine, after the ceremonies of facred mysteries were performed, who as the folemnitie (celebrated with fo frequent concourse of people) was at the highest, we were seafled by Glaucias the oratour in his house, where when others had made an end of supper, Xenoeles his brother, began after his maner, to cavill and fcoffe at my brother Lamprias, twitting him 10 with his large feeding, and indeed hitting in his teeth and reproching him with the voracitie of the Bootians, who are taken to be good trencher-men : whereupon I (in the defence of my brother, and to be revenged of Xenoeles) tooke occasion out of the doctrine of Epicurus, and faid unto him: What (good fir) all men do not define and determine the utmost point and perfection of pleasure, to be indolence or the privation of paine, as your good master Epicurus doth: and befides, my brother Lamprias, who honoureth and effecmeth more the walking galleries of the Peripateticks, and the schoole of the Stoicks, called Lyeeum, than he doth the garden of Epicurus, must of necessitie and in effect, beare witnesse to Aristotle, who affirmeth: That there is no man, but he eateth more in Autumne, than in any other feafon of the yeere : and a reason he giveth thereof, although it be now out of my head. So much the better (quoth Glaucias) for 20 weour selves will see if we can finde it out after supper is done. Now when the tables were taken away, Glaucias and Xenocles both, imputed the cause thereof to the fundry fruits of that scason, and that after a divers fort. For one faid, that new fruits do make the bellie foluble, and fo by evacuation of the bodie, engender alwaies fresh appetites to meat. The other, to wit Xenoeles, affirmed, that thefe fruits (for the most part) carrie with them a certeine piercing and mordicant quallitie, yet pleasant with all, whereby they provoke and quicken the stomacke to appetite, more than any viands or fauces whatfoever; infomuch as those who be fickly, and have lost their stomacks, recover the fame many times, by eating fome of those fruits new gathered. But Lamprias alledged, that our familiar and naturall heat, by which we are nourifhed in Summer time, is dispersed, and becommeth more feeble and resolved : but contrariwise, upon the entrance of Au-30 tumne, it gathereth it selfe together inwardly againe, and is fortified by the meanes of the colde ambient aire, which knitteth, conftreineth, and closeth up the pores of the bodie. Then I (because it should not be thought that I would be one to participate in this conference without contributing somewhat of mine owne, when my course came to speake) declared, that in Summer time, by reason of the excessive heat of the weather, we are more thirstie, and in regard of the same heat and drought, take in more moisture and liquid nourishment: Now therefore, nature (quoth I) by reason of the change of the aire and the season, seeking (as her maner is) for the contrary, caufeth us to be more hungry in Autumne, than at other times, and for the temperature of the bodie, tendereth unto it as much driefood, as it had taken moisture in Summer time: and yet a man can not well fay, that the cause of this effect dependent nothing at all of 40 the viands which we eat, confitting much of new and fresh fruits, not onely thicke gruels and pottage, but also of pullet wheat-bread, and flesh, reared the same yeere, which being more savory than those of the yeeres past, do by consequence provoke those that use to feed upon them, for to eat better.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

Whether was before, The hen or the egge?

His long time I absteined from eating egges, by reason of a certeine dreame which I had, 50 L being desirous to make that experience in an egge, which is made in an heart, by occasion of a vision which hath evidently appeared unto me many times in my sleepe. And heereupon, when I was one day at a feaft which Sofius Senecio made unto us, the companie conceived an opinion or suspition of me, that there were entred into my head, the fantasses and superstitions of Orpheus & Pythagoras, and that I abhorred to cat an egge, like as many do forbeare the heart and the braine of a living creature; for that I beleeved it to be the principle and fountaine of generation: infomuch as Alexander the Epicurean, by way of a jeft, and to move laughter, alledged these verses:

* Hai Nusσαν εισάζων. which foundeth all one with rlad รับหัวนา ยาวน์reade according to the former, it lignifieth muficke : after the later, it betokeneth (count all one, to make of * beanes, our meat, As if the heads of parents we dideat.

As who would fay, that the Epicureans by this word word work that is to fay, beanes, meant ame. matically and covertly, egges, because that the breeding of young, or conception, in Greeke, is called zones, as if there were no difference at all, but they thought it all one to eat egges and the living creatures which lay them. Now if I had alledged my dreame unto them, for my defence, as the very cause of mine abstinence, certes, mine answere would have seemed more absurd and ridiculous, than the dreame it felfe, especially, to this Epicurean: and therefore I flood not greatly upon excusing my selfe unto the said Alexander, playing upon me so merrily, but fuffered him to feed and mainteine that opinion conceived of me : for furely, a pleafant man he was, honest, civill, and well learned. Howbeit, he tooke occasion heereupon, to set on foot 10 that doubtfull question of the egge and the bird, which had busied and amuzed the heads so much of great naturallists, and searchers into the causes of natural works, and namely to know. whether of the twaine was before? Whereat Sylla our familiar friend faid: That with this little question of the henne and the egge, as with a small lever; screw, or such like engine, we shaked the great frame and weightie fabricke of the generation of the whole world, and therefore willed him to furcease and proceed no farther, to speake thereof. But when Alexander laughed at it, and made no more reckoning of it, than of a ridiculous question of no importance, nor confequence at all depending thereof; my fonne in law Firmus began in this wife: I must beere borrow (quoth he) the indivilible elements of Epicurus, and make use of those motes or attomi of his; for it is betrue which he suppose than daieth for a ground: That small principles should 10 affoord beginning to great bodies; it foundeth by all likelihood to great reason, that the egge was before the henne: for as farre foorth as by our fenfes we are able to judge, it is more fimple, whereas the henne is a body mixt and compounded; and to speake in generalitie, the principle or element is ever first: the seed is a principle, and the egge full of seed, and lesse, than the chicke or living creature that is hatched of it : for like as the progresse and proceeding unto vertue is of a middle nature, betweene the first disposition and the finall habit and perfection thereof; even fo it should feeme, that the egge is a certeine processe and advancement forward of nature, tending to make a living creature of the feed disposed thereto: moreover, as in a beast or such a living creature it is commonly faid and received, that the atteries and veines bee formed first, and it is a specific fair blable, good reason there is to hold, that the egge was before the bird, as the continent 300 miles to hold, that the egge was before the bird, as the continent 300 miles to hold. before the thing conteined within: for foit is with very arts, which make the first draught of their works grolly without forme & fashion; but afterwards give distinct figure and shape to every part thereof, according to that which Polyeletus the famous imager was woont to faie: That their workemanship in potterie was then most difficult and hard, when the claie and the finger naile mette together: that is to fay, when the worke was at the point to be finished: and therefore it flandeth well to good reason, that the matter yeelding and obeying but flowly unto nature at the beginning, when the mooveth and frameth by little and little, produceth at the first, rude lumpes and masses, not as yet brought into shape and fashion, such as egges be; but as the fame grow to receive the impression of some forme, there is afterwards wrought out and framed a living creature within: for like as there is engendred first a grub, which in time grow-40 ing hard by reason of drinesse, cleaveth and openeth in the end, and putteth soorth another litthe winged flie, which we call Nympha, before it is a perfect bee; after the fame manner, the egge heere is the first sublistent matter of generation; for necessarie it is, that in every change and transfirmutation, that must precede and have a being first, which is to be altered and turned into another: see you not how cankers or catterpillers are bred in trees, and wormes in wood, either by the putrefaction, or concoction of humiditie? and will any man deny that the faid moithure went before; and that by order of nature, that which ingendreth is more auncient than that which is ingendred? for as Plate faith: The matter in all things that breed, serveth in stead of mother & nource; and that is to be counted the matter, whereof the thing is composed, & con- 50 tifferh which is bred. And now for that which remaineth (quoth he, and therewith he laughed) I will fing unto those that be skilfull and of understanding, one holy and sacred sentence, taken out of the deepe fecrets of Orpheus, which not onely importeth thus much, that the egge was before the henne, but also attributeth and adjudgeth unto it, the right of eldership and prioriry of all things in the world: as for the rest, let them remaine unspoken of in silence (as Herodotracfaith) for that they be exceeding divine and mysticall; this onely will I speake by the way: That the world conteining as it doeth, so many forts and fundry kinds of living creatures, there is not in manner one I dare well fay, exempt from being ingendred of an egge, for the egge bringeth foorth birds and foules that flie; fifthes an infinit number that fwimme; land creatures, as lizards; fuch as live both on land & water, as crocodiles; those that be two footed, as the bird; such as are footlesse, as the erepent; and last of all, them which have many feet, as the unwinged locult. Not without great reason therefore is it confectated to the facted ceremonies and mysteries of Bacehus, as representing that nature which produceth and comprehendeth in it selse all things.

When Firmus had discoursed in this wife, Senecis opposed himselfe and said: That the last finilitude and comparison which he brought, was that, which first and principally made against 10 him: For you marke not ô Firmus (quoth he) how ere you were aware, you opened the world like a gate, as the proverbe faith, even upon your felfe; for that the world was before all other things, as being most perfect, and reason would, that whatsoever is perfect, should precede the unperfect; the entier and found goe before that which is wanting and defectious; and the whole before the part, for that there can be no parcell, but the whole thereof went before : for no man useth to speake thus: The feeds man, or the egges henne; but corrariwise we say: The mans feed, and the hennes egge, as if both generative feed and egge did fucceed and follow them, taking their owne generation in them first, and afterwards paying againe (as it were a debt unto nature) a successive generation from them: for need they have of that which is proper and familiar unto them, and thereupon are endued with a naturall defire and inclination, to produce fuch ano-20 ther thing as that was from whence they came: and heereupon it is, that feed is thus defined, to be ageniture or thing bred, having need and defire of new generation. Now there is nothing that either standeth in need or hath an appetite to that which is not, or hath no being: and wee may plainly fee, that egges have their totall effence and fubstance, from that compact knot and composition which is gathered within the body of a living creature, and faileth heerein onely, that it hath not fuch organes, instruments, and vessels as they have; which is the reason that you shall never finde written in any historie, that an egge was ingendred immediately of the earth; for even the poets themselves doe say: That the egge out of which sprang Castor and Pollax, fell from heaven; whereas the earth even at this day produceth many complet and perfect creatures; as for example, mice in Aegypt, and in many other places, ferpents, frogges, and 30 grash oppers, by reason that the principle and puissance generative, is infused and inserted into it from without. In Sieille during the time of the Servile warre, much carnage there was, and agreat quantitie of bloud shedde and spilt upon the earth, many dead bodies corrupted and putrified above ground, lying unburied; by occasion whereof, an infinit number of locusts were engendred, which being ipred over the face of the whole island, spoiled and destroiced all the come in the countrey: all these creatures therefore are bred and fedde of the earth; and of their nourishment they yeeld a generall superfluitie, apt to ingender the same kind, and that is called, feed; and for to be discharged thereof, by meanes of a certeine mutuall pleasure, the male and the female match and couple together; and so some according to their nature, breed and lay egges; others bring foorth young ones alive; whereby it is evidently feene, that the primitive 40 generation came first and immediatly from the earth, but afterwards, by a certeine conjunction of one with another, in a fecond fort, they breed their yoong. In fumme, to fay that the egge was before the hen, is as much as if the matrice were before the woman; for looke what relation there is betweene the faid matrice and the egge, the femblable hath the egge unto the chicken that is ingendered and hatched within it. So that , to demand how birds were made when there were egges, is all one, as to aske how men and women were created, before the naturall parts and genetall members of the one sex and the other were made? And verily the members for the most part, have their subsistence and being together with the whole; but the powers and faculties come after those members; the functions succeed the faculties, and consequently, the effects or complements follow upon the faid functions and operation: now the accomplished 50 workeor perfection of that generative facultie in the naturall parts, is the feed or the egge: fo that we must of necessitie confesse, that they be, after the generation of the whole. Consider moreover, that, as it is not possible that there should be concoction of meats or any nourishment, before the living creature be fully made and compleat, no more can there be any feed or egge; for that both the one and the other, is made by certeine concoctions and alterations: neither is it seene, how before the full perfection of a living creature, there should be anything that hath the nature of the superfluity or excrement of nutrition; and yet I must needs say, that naturall feed otherwise, in some fort, may go for the principle and beginning of life; whereas the egge in no proportion answereth to such a principle, for that it hath not a sublistence first, nor any reason or nature of the whole, because it is imperfect. And hereupon it is, that we never fay, that a living creaure had any being or subsistence, without an elementarie beginning : but we affirme, that there was a principle of generation, to wit, the power or facultie generative, by which the matter was transmuted, and wherein there was imprinted a generall temperature; and that the eggeafterwards, is as it were a certein supergeneration, much like unto the bloud & milke of a living creature, after nourishment & concoction: for never shall you see an egge engendred of mud; for that an egge hath the generation and concretion within the bodie onely of a living creature; whereas there be an innumerable fort of creatures procreated & bred of mud and within mud. And to seeke no further for allegation of other examples to prove this, there 10 be taken every day an infinit number of celes, and yet never faw any man one cele, either milter or fpawner, or that had any row in it. And more than that, if one let out all the water forth out of the poole, and cleanse it from all mud and mire, yet after the water is returned thither agains into the place, there will be celes soone engendred. And therefore we may conclude necessarily, that whatfoever in generation hath need of another, can not chuse but be after it; and that which otherwise may be of it selfe, and without the other, must of necessitie precede and goebefore in generation: for this is that prioritie whereof I speake. To prove this, marke how birds do build and make their nests before they lay egges; women also provide cradles, clouts, beds, and swadling-clothes for their little babes, before they crie out, or be delivered; and yet you will not fay (I trow) that either the neft was before the egge, or the fwadling cloths before the infant, 20 For (as Flato faith) the earth doth not imitate a woman, but a woman the earth; and confequently, all other females. And very like it is, that the first procreation out of the earth, was performed entire, and accomplished by the absolute vertue and perfection of the Creatour, without need of fuch inftruments, veffels, or fecondines, which nature devifeth now, and frameth in parents, by reason of their imbecillity and weaknesse.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether wrestling were of all the exercises and games of prise, most ancient or no?

E made a feaft in the honour of Soficles the Coronean, for joy of the victorie which hee obteined at the Pythicke games, over all other poets. And when the time drew neere at hand, wherein the Gymnicke mafferies and feats of activity, were to be performed; the greatest talke was at table, as touching the wrestlers; for that many of them resorted thither, and those the most renowmed champions of all Greece. In our company was Ly smaches, one of the agents or procuratours of the high commissioners, called Amphictyones, who moved speech, and said, how not long before, he heard a Grammarian fay: That wreftling was the most ancient combat of all those exercises that were named Gymnicke, for that they were performed by men naked's and he added moreover: That the very name thereof in Greeke, imported no leffe; for min, alludeth neere unto mixas, which is as much as [of olde] or [in times past.] And it may seeme 40 (quoth he) that ordinarily, the things that be moderne and newly devised, borrow the names imposed upon those that be of more antiquity: for so we say that aun or, that is to say, the fluit or hauthoics, is turned, bortowing the tearme of round, which is a platterie or stringed instrument: and we call even at this day, i. the playing upon the pipe or hautboics, by the name of Resultant, that is to fay, striking with the fingers, which no doubt is a tearme fetched from the harpe or lute. And even fo, the very place where they do exercise, who performe all feats of activitie naked, is named πάλαις εσ, of πάλη, that is to fay, wreftling; which (no doubt) was a denomination given to it at the first, and time out of mind, howsoever it be reteined still, and extendeth to other exercises invented fince, & taken up long after. Then began I, and said: That this argument and testimonie, was not sufficient to conclude thereupon : For admit (quoth I) that Pale- 50 fra was derived of man, which fignifieth wrestling, yet it was not because of all others it was most ancient, but for that it is the only exercise that requiretheley, called mino, dust also and ceroma, which is a composition of oile and waxe, wherewith wrestlers be anointed. For surely, in these places, called Palastra, there is practifed neither running arace, nor fift-fight or combat with buffets, but only wreftling, called min, and Paneration, wherein they go to it with hand and foot, yea, and by the very teeth and all: for that in these two exercises, the champions lie along other-whiles, and wallow in the dust and mire, named mix . And evident it is, that Paneration is a mixt exercise of wrestling and fist-fight. Againe: What likelihood or reason is there (quoth I) that wreftling, which of all combats is most wittie and artificiall, should likewise be of greatest antiquitie? for need and necessitie produceth that first, which is simple, plaine, and without arte; performed rather by fine force and maine violence, than by rule and method. When I had thus delivered my conceit, Sosieles seconding my words: True it is (quoth he) that you say, and the better to confirme your opinion; it seemeth unto me, that min is derived of the veibe madden, that is to fay, to overthrow or lay one along by craft and deceit. Nay rather (quoth Philinus) it tooke the name of munasms, that is to fay, the flat palme of the hand, because this part especially of both the hands is most emploied by them that wrestle; like as those, who 10 go to buffets, use their two fifts or hands clutched together; whereupon, that maner of fight is called moyen, that fignifieth, a fift; and the other, min of minus, that is to fay, the broad palme of the hand. Howbeit, for a finuch as the poets use this verbe maximum, for out minute and reserve, that is, to strew and sprinckle dust, which we see wrestlers for to practise more than any other champions, it may be very well, that the word make, was derived from maked Confider yet moreover (quoth he) how the curriers or runners in a race, do all that lies in them, to leave their concurrents a great way behind, and be as farre before them as possibly they can; those also that fight at buffets, though other-whiles they be very defirous to buckle and close together, yet the wardens and judges of the games will not permit them once to catchhold: but we see that wrestlers onely doe claspeabout, and imbrace one another with their armes; and the most part of their striving one against another, whether it be performed by taking hold either directly or indirectly, by tripping, by coping and tugging, doe all bring them together, and enterlace them: fo that it is not unlike, that by reason they approach so as they do, and be necrest one to another, their wrestling was first called min, of mass. which fignificth neere at hand.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is thereason that Homer among the combats of prize, sesteth alwaies in the first places. The fight at bustess; in the second, wrestling; and last of all, running the race?

30 VV Hen these words had passed to and fro, and after that wee had commended Philinus, Lysimachus began againe, saying: And which of all the games of prize should a man fay was first performed? The race or carriere, as at the Olympique solemnities for heere at the Pythique games, the manner is to bring in certeine champions at every feverall game or plaie: first boies to wrestle, and after them, men-wrestlers also; then those that performe fist-fight, one after another; and likewife the champions called Paneratiasta: but there, after that children have atchieved all their combats, the men growen were called in: Mary, this I would have you to confider well (quoth he) whether Homer hath not done very expresly, to show the order which was observed in histime? for alwaies in his poemes the fight with fift among all the Gymnick combats, standeth first; wrestling second; and the running of a course last: Heere-40 at Crates the Theffalian, woondring (as if he had beene amazed) O Hercules (quoth he) what a number of things are we ignorant of! but I befeech you, that if you have readily under your hand any of his verfes, you would not thinke much to call them to our remembrance, and recite them: Why (quoth Timen then) it is well knowen in manner to all the world, and none there is but his eares refound againe with this; that in the honorable funerals of Patroclus, the fame order of combats was precifely observed; and the poetkeeping the same order still, and never milling it, hath brought in Achilles speaking unto good Neftor in this manner:

Heere father old, I give to thee, This gift of meere gratuitee: For now with fift thoumailt not fight: To wre file fill thou hast no might: Thou canst no more the javelin launce, Nor in the race thy (elfe advaunce:

And anon he inferrest the aged grey-beard, answering with along traine of words, as the maner is of these old folke, after this fort:

The time was when at buffet fight, the prize I wonne in field,

LII

And

And with my fift made Clitomede fir Oenops sonne, to yeeld: Ancæus the Pleuronien in wrestling gave me place, And Iphiclus by soot-manship, soverranneinrace.

Afterwards in another place he speaketh of uliffes, challenging the Phæocians to combat in this wise:

At buffets dry with good hard clutched fift,
At wrefiling, or at running if you lift.
But of Alcinous making a kinde of excule, and in fort condemning himselfe, in these words: 10
At buffets hard we fight not well,
Neyet in wrefiling doe excell:

But swift of foot, and light we are, Andrunne a course with you we dare.

Thus you may fee his order, he changeth not upon any occasion or occurrence presented. neither rathly, and as it came into his head, now in one fort, and then in another; but following from point to point, as it were by a certeine rule and prescript, what was the use in those daies, and what was done then; he keepeth himfelfe to the fame method', according as they likewife observe still in the said auncient order. Afterthatmy brother had finished his speech, I said: 20 That in mine advice he had spoken very well and truely to the point; but yet for all that, I could not conceive the reason of the said order: and some otherwere there present, who thoughtit unlikely, and were not perswaded, that in case of combat and atchieving seats of activitie for victorie, either fighting with fifts, or wrestling, should goe before running: and therfore they requested me to search farther into the matter, and to setch the reason thereof from the verie original: whereupon I fet in hand presently and extempore, spake to this effect: That I thought all these combats to be the very representations and exercises of warfare; for proofe whereof, the custome was and is at this day, after that these combats be performed, to bring into the place a foot-man in complet harneis, and armed at all pieces, as it were to witnesse, that this is the end whereunto tendall these exercises of the body, the contentions also and æmulations, 30 for to gaine the prize, and the priviledge graunted unto the victours when they returned with triumph to those cities where they were borne; namely, to make some breach in the walles, and to throw downe some part thereof: the mystery and meaning whereof is thus much; that the walles of a citie ferve in small stead, if there be no men in it who are able to fight, and know how to winne the victorie. In Lacedamon they that once had gained the prize at these sacred and crowned games; by a speciall priviledge of honour, were allowed a certeine place in the battell, to be raunged neere unto the kings person, and there to fight: and of all living creatures, there is none but the horse onely that can obteine the crowne in such games; for that he alone of all beafts, is by nature framed, and by discipline trained to accompany men in battels, and with them to fight: now if this be true, and to the purpose: We observe moreover (quoth I) 40 that the first and principall worke of those who fight in the field, is to strike the enemie, and to ward his blowes; the second is, when they be come to close and to grapple with hand gripes, to thrust and assay how to overturne and lay one another under-foot: which by report was the vauntage, that our countrimen being well practifed in the feat of wreftling, had over the Spartans, at the battel of Leuttres, whereby they overthrew them, & bare them to the ground this alfo was the caufethat Aefehylus the poet in one place, speaking of a valiant warrior, nameth him:

A wrestler stout, and tried in field,
To fight it out with sword and shield.
And Sophoeles in one of his tragedies speaking likewise of the Trojanes, reporteth thus much of them in these tearmes:

They love great horfes for to sit, as valians men at armes; Bowes borned as both ends they bend, and draw with strength of armes; They fight so close, they catch such hold, and gripe fust with bands twaine, That in their wrestling, all their shields resound and ring againe.

The third is this, when all is done; either to flie and runne away apace, if they be vanquifued, or elfe to follow hard in chafe, if they be conquerors. By good right therefore, the fight with fifts goeth first; wrestling followeth in the second place; and tunning commeth in the last; for that buffetting represented the charging of the enemie, and the avoiding of his recharge; wrestling may be compared with the violent buckling and conslict pel-mell in the medly; and by running, they learne how to pursue, or to escape by good footmanship.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Why the pine, sapine, or pitch tree, and such other as yeclar ofm, will not abide to be graffed in the seatchion, or by way of inoculation.

Solarus feasting us upon a time within his orchards, which were well watered, and environed all about with the river Cephifus, the wed unto us trees carying armes and braunches of fundry forts, after a very strange manner, and all by the meanes of a kinde of graffing in the budde, called inoculation: for there faw wee olive boughes growing out of lentiske or mastick trees; pomgranats out of myrtles; oakes there were which put foorth faire pirries or peare-trees; and 20 plane trees that admitted and adopted apple trees; figge-trees also which were grafted with mulbery impes and cions; other mixtures there were belides of wilde plants, fo ramed and made gentle, that they bare frute: whereupon some other of the guests began to jest and be merry with Soclarus, faying: That he nourithed certeine kinds of beafts, more monstrous than the fabulous Sphinges or Chimæraes of the poets. But Craton proposed this question: What the cause might be, that those trees onely which be oileous and full of rosin, admit not any such mixtures and compositions? For never shall you see pine tree that beareth the nuts, cypres tree, pitch tree or fapine, to mainteine or feede the graffe of a tree different in kinde. Then Philo, there is (quoth he) one maxime or principle held among the learned, and the fame confirmed by the experience of husbandmen: That oile is an enemie to all plants; and there is not a readier way 20 to kill what tree foever a man will, than to rubbe or befmeare it with oile; like as bees also by that meanes are foone destroied: fo it is therefore, that all those trees which have beene named, are of a fattie fubstance, and have a fost and uncteous nature, infomuch as there distilleth and droppeth from them pitch and rofin; and if a man make a gash or incision in any of them, they yeeld from within, a certeine bloudie liquor or gumme, yea, and there iffueth from the tortch flaves made of them, an oileous humour, which shineth againe, because they are so fattie & unguinous: This is the reason why they will not joine and be concorporate with other trees, nomore than oile it felfe be mingled with other liquors. When Philo had done with his speech, Crato added thus much moreover: That in his opinion, the nature of their rinde or barke, made fomewhat for the faid matter; for the fame being thinne and drie withall, yeeldeth neither a 40 fure feat & focket as it were to the impes or buds (which there dies) to reft in, nor meanes to get sappe and nutriment for to incorporate them; like as all those plants which have barks verice tender, moift, and foft, whereby the graffes may be clasped, united, and foddered with those parts that be under the faid barke. Then Sociarus himselfe faid: That who soever made these reafons, was in the right, and not deceived in his opinion; to thinke it necessarie, that the thing which is to receive another nature, should be pliable; and easie to follow every way; to the end, that suffring it selfe to be tamed and over-come, it might become of like nature, and turne the owne proper nutriment, into that which is fet and graffed in it. Thus you fee, how before wee fow or plant, we care and turne the earth, making it gentle, foft, and supple, that being in this manner wrought to our hand, and made tractable, it may be more willing to apply it selfe, for 50 to embrace in her bosome whatsoever is either sowen or planted; for contrariwise, a ground which is rough, stubborne, and tough, hardly will admit alteration: these trees therefore confifting of a light kinde of wood, because they are unapt to be changed and overcome, will admit no concorporation with others: And moreover (quoth hee) evident it is, that the stocke in respect of that which is fet and graffed into it, ought to have the nature of a ground which is tilled; now it is well knowen, that the earth must be of a female constitution, apt to conceive and beare; which is the cause that we make choise of those trees for our stocks to graffe upon, which are most frutefull; like as we chuse good milch women that have plenty of milke in their brests. Lll 2 brefts, to be nurfes for other children befides their owne, who we put unto them: but we fee plainly, that the cypreffe tree, the fapin, and all fuch like, be either barren altogether, or elfe beare very little frute: and like as men and women both who are exceeding corpulent, groffe and fatte, are for the most part unable either to get or beare children; for spending all their nourishment as they doe in feeding the body, they convert no superfluitie thereof into genetall feed; even so, these trees employing all the substance of their nouriture to fatten as it were themselves, grow indeed to be very thicke and great; but either they beare no frue at all; or if they doe, the same is very small, and long ere it come to maturize and perfection: no marvell therefore that a stranger will not breede or grow there, whereas the owne naturall issue thriveth but badly.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Of the stay ship fish, Echeneis.

Heremonianus the Trallien, upon a time when divers and fundry small fishes of all forts were fet before us, shewed unto us one with a long head, and the same sharpe pointed. and told us that it refembled very much the stay-ship fish, called thereupon in Greeke Echeneis. and he reported moreover, that he had seene the faid fish, as he sailed upon the Sicilian sea, and marvelled not a little at the natural force and propertie that it had, fo fensiblie in some fort to 20 flay and hinder the course of a shippe under faile, untill such time as the marriner who had the government of the prow or foredecke, espied it sticking close to the outside of the ship. upon the relation of this strange occurrent, some there were in place at that time, who laughed at Cheremonianus; for that this tale and fiction, devised for the nonce to make folkemetry, and which was incredible, went currant with him, and was taken for good paiment: againe, others there were, who spake very much in the defence of the hidden properties, and secret antipathies or contrarieties in nature. There you should have heard many other strange passions and accidents; to wit, that an elephant being enraged and starke mad, becommeth appealed immediatly, upon the fight of a ram; also, that if a man hold a branch or twig of abeech tree close unto a viper, and touch her therewith never fo little, the will prefently stay and stirre no farther; likewife, 30 that a wilde bull, how wood and furious foever he be, will fland gently and be quiet, in case he be tied to a fig-tree; semblably, that amber doth remoove and draw unto it all things that be drie and light withall, fave onely the herbe bafill, and whatfoever is before ered with oile; Item, that the Magnet or Lode stone, will no more draw iron, when it is rubbed over with garlicke: the proofe and experience of which effects, is well known, but the causes thereof difficult, if not impossible to be found out. But I for my part, faid: That this was rather a shift and evasion, to avoid a direct answere unto the question propounded, than the allegation of a true cause pertinent thereto: for we daily fee that there be many events and accidents concurring, reputed for causes, and yet be none; as for example, if one thould say or believe, that the blowming of the within called Chaft-tree, caufeth grapes to ripen, because there is a common word in every 40 mans mouth.

> Loe how the chaft-trees now do flower, And grapes wax ripe even at one hower.

or that by reason of the sungous matter seene to gather about the candle-shuffes or lamp-weeks, the aire is troubled, and the skie overcast; or that the hooking inwardly of the nailes upon the singers, is the cause, and not an accident, of the ulcer of the lungs or some noble part within, which breedeth a consumption. Like as therefore, every one of these particulars alledged, is a consequent of divers accidents, proceeding all from the same causes; even so I am of this mind (quoth I) that one and the same cause, staieth the shippe, and draweth the little slish Echeneis to sticke unto the side thereof; for so long as the ship is drie, or not overcharged with moissure 50 stoking into it, it stands with great reason, that the keele glideth more smoothly away, by reason of the lightnesse that swith great reason, that the keele glideth more smoothly away, by reason of the lightnesse that swith great reason, that the keele glideth more smoothly away, by reason of the lightnesse that it is cleane and void of filth; but after once (by being long drenched and soaked in the water, it hath gotten about the keele a deale of mosse; reits, kilpe, and tangle, wherewith it is overgrowen and furred; then the wood of the said keele or bottome, becommeth more dull, and not able to cut the waves so easily; and the water beating upon the mosse and slighth there engendred, resten there still, and passen not so easily away. The mariners therefore, therefore, feeing this, ufeto cleanfe the fides of the fhip, and to forape off this moffe, reits, and fuch like baggage, from the planks and ribbes thereof, unto which it is like that the faid fith willingly cleaveth, as being a matter foft and tender: fo that we may very well thinke, that by reafon of it, as the principall cause the ship is staied, and that it is not a consequent or accessorie of that which causeth the slownesse thereof.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that the horses named Lycospades, be more couragious, and fuller of slomacke, than others?

Ome are of opinion, that these horses Lycospades tooke their denomination of certeine Srough and hard bits, called in Greeke, Augot, by meanes whereof, being fo ftomakefull otherwife, and hard to be ruled, they were woont to be tamed and restrained : but my father, who was notaman fo prompt and ready of speech as others be, and given to speake rashly and without advilement, howbeit, one who had not the least skill in horfemanship, and loved alwaies to keepe the best horses that might be come by, said : That those horses (which being but colts) were fet upon and affaulted by wolves, and yet were refcued, escaped the danger of them, proved good mettall, and swift of pace; and there upon were named Lycospades. And for that many 20 approoved this reason of his, and gave testimonie with him that he spake a trueth, occasion was ministred thereby, to search into the cause thereof; and namely, how and by what reason such anaccident as this might make horses more generous and better spirited; and verily, the most part of the company there present, were of opinion, that the said occurrent bred cowardise in horses, rather than stomacke and generolitie; and so, by reason that they became timorous thereby, and apr to be frighted upon every occasion, therefore their motions were more quicke and lively; like as other wild beatts also, when they chance to be entangled within net and toile: but I my felfe inferred, and faid: That it would be well and thorowly confidered, whether it were not cleane contrary to that which appeared at the first fight, and which they opined; for colts become not more swift and sleet of foot for avoiding the perill of being worried and devoured by wolves that fet upon them, but rather, if they had not bene nimble and full of courage before, 30 naturally, they could never have gotten away cleere, as they did, from the wolfe; no more than uly fes proved a wife man, because he avoided the danger of that giant Cyclops Polyphemus; but for that he was by nature prudent and wife, he found meanes to fave himfelfe.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the easyle that the flesh of those sheepe which have beene wolse-bitsen, is tenderer, but their wooll more subject to breed lice and vermin, than others?

40 \ Ponthe former discourse of horses, inferred there was a speech also, concerning sheepe that had bene bitten by the wolfe; for that it is a received opinion, that this biting of theirs maketh their flesh more delicate in the eating, but their wooll apt to ingender lice. As for the reason that my sonne in law Parrolles yeelded, as touching the sweetnesse of their stell, it seemedto be true; for thus he argued: That this beaft by meanes of his biting, caused the flesh to eat more short and tender, for that his breath is so ardent and sierie hot, that it is able to resolve and digest within his stomacke, the hardest bones that be; which is the reason (quoth he) that such fleih as the wolfe hath bitten, is fooner mortified, and doth puttific more quickly than others: mary, for the wooll we were not fo well refolved, as supposing that the same did not breed lice, but rather draw them forth, and let them out to be feene, by a certeine incifive or absterfive fa-50 cultie that it hath; as also through the hearthereof, whereby it openeth the porcs of the skinne; which propertie is infused into the wooll of a sheepe, by meanes of the tooth and breath of the wolfe, which altereth not onely the fleth, but even the very wooll and shag-haire of the beast which he hath worried and killed. And this reason is confirmed by experience and example; for it is well known into usall, that hunters, butchers, and cooks, formetimes with one blow knocke downe their beafts, and lay them along foone dead and breathleffe in a moment; others againe, hardly and with much ado are able to kill them, after many a stroake; and that which yet is more woonderfull than fo, fome of them infuse together with the axe or knife of iron, wherewith the beaft is flaine, fuch a qualitie that the fame putrifieth presently, and will not last sweet one day to an end: others againe, though they be not longer about the killing of a beaft than the other, yet the flesh of beasts so slaine, doth not so soone corrupt, but continueth sound and fweet a good while after. And that true it is, that the varietie & alteration occasioned by the fundry forts of death, and killing of beafts, passeth and extendeth as farre as to their very skin, their haire, nailes, houses and clees; Homer himselfe doth testifie, who of their hides and skinnes is wont thus expresly to write:

The hide it was of flurdy ox, Sticked with knife, or brain' d by knocks.

For the skinne of those beasts which die not for age, nor of long maladie, but are killed violent- 10 ly, is more firme, fast, and tough: and true it is, that of those tame-living creatures, which have beene bitten by wilde beafts, the houses, clees, and nailes turne blacke, the haire sheadeth, and the skinnes become riveled, foone teare and fall a pieces.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Whether our auncestors did better, who when they were as supper, fedde every man by himselfe and knew his owne part, than we in these daies who eat our victuals all together, and feed in common?

Hat yeere wherein I was head magistrate in my countrey, and bare that provotship whereof the yeere tooke name, most of the suppers were private repalts of sacrifices. where every man had his part and portion fet out; where with fome were woonderfully well pleafed; but others blamed the manner thereof, as uncivill, unfociable, and illiberall, faying: That fo foone as the garland or coronet of the beaft facrificed was taken off his head, and laid down. we ought to reduce our tables to the auncient order and old accultomed fashion againe: For it is not I suppose (quoth Agias) for to eat and drinke simply, that we invite one another, but for to eat and drinke together for companie and good-fellowship; whereas this parting and division of flesh and other viands into portions, doth abolish all communication & societie, making indeed many feverall fuppers, and many men to fit at fupper apart, but not one fupping with 30 another, or fellow-guest in one messe; when every man takes as it were from the butchers stall his own joint of meat, or a piece of flesh by just waight, or at a certeine fize, & so fets his part before him. For is not all one I pray you, and what difference is there I would faine know, to allow ech one of the guests at table his owne cup by himselfe, & to fill every man his Congious or gallon of wine, yea, and to allow him his table apart from others? like as by report the linage of Demophon sometime served Orestes, and so to bid them drinke without any regard or heed of others? what diversitie (I fay) is in this, and the manner of these our daies; namely, to set before every man his lofe of bread, and piece of flesh, for to feed by himselfe, as it were at his owne manger? Surely all the oddes is, that we have no commaundement to keepe filence and fay never a word when we are at our meat, as those had who interteined and seasted Orestes, and verilie 40 even this haply ought to provoke and bring us that are met, to the communion & participation of althings at a feaft or banquet; namely: that we talke there one to another; that we be partakers together of one fong of a minstrell wenches musicke delighting us all, and one as well as another, with her playing upon a pfalterie or pipe, & finging thereto. Moreover, that standing cup of amitie and good-felowship, which is set in the very middes of the company, for to drinke out of it, one to another, and that without any limitation or restreint to certeine bounds, standeth as it were a fource and lively fountaine of love and good will, and hath no other stint and measure, but the thirst and disposition of every one, to drinke at his pleasure: not like to this most unjust distribution of bread and sless to every one, which masketh it selfe with a falle colour of equality among those who are unequall; for even that, as even and equall as it seemeth 50 and in manner all one, is too much for him that needs but a little, and too little for him, who hath need of much. Like as therefore (my good friend) he is a ridiculous and foolish leech, who to many and fundrie patients, ficke of diverse and different diseases, exhibiteth and giveth medicines just of one weight, and exactly of the same measure; even so were the matter of a feast woorthy to be laughed at, who having invited to his table fundry persons who are not hungry or thirsty alike, would enterteine and serve them all indifferently after one order, meafuring the equalitie of his distribution, by proportion arithmeticall and not geometricall. True it is (I confesse) that we go or send al of us to the taverne for to buy our wine, by one & the same measure just, which is allowed and set downe by the publicke State; but to the table, every man brings his owne stomacke, the which is filled not with an equall quantitie of meat or drinke, to all others , but with that which sufficeth ech one. As touching those * banquets that Hamer diams foeaketh of, wherein every man had his part cut out; to what purpose should we bring them hither from military discipline, and the custome of a campe, to the manner and fashion of these daies? but more reason it is that we resolve and propose unto our selves, for to imitate heerein the humanity & courtefie of those in old time, who highly honored, not only those who lodged ordinarily, and made their abode with them under one roufe, but also such as drunke of the same 10 cuppe, eat of the fame meat, and fedde out of one dish with them, infomuch as they enterteined and reverenced their focietie in all things. Away therefore (I pray you) with those thore meales and flender pittances of Homer; which in my conceit are somewhat too scant and pinching, and as a man would fay, over hungry and thirstie; as having kings and princes for the mafters and makers of them, who be more sparing of their purses, and looking more neerely to their expences, than those good hoasts and keepers of ordinaries in Italy; as who being in armes and arranged in batell raie, and ready to joine in conflict with the enemie, could remember precifely, how many times ech one of their guests who dined or supped with them, tooke the cuppe and dranke. Yet commend me to those banquets and feasts which Pindarus writeth of, for furely they are much better; in which, as he faith:

Full oft a prince, and per son honorable, Among them all fat at some stately table.

For why? fuch teafts had the communication of all things together: and verily this was the felowship and knot indeed of true friends, whereas the other was a distraction and separation of persons, who made semblance to be the greatest friends, and yet could not agree and communicate together, fo much as in the feeding of one dish of meat. Agias had good audience given him, and was well commended for the reasons which he alledged; and then we set one of the company to come upon him in this manner, faying: That Agias thought it very strange and was offended that he should have an equall portion which others allowed him, carying as he did before him fuch a grand-paunch; and in truth, a great eater he was, and given exceeding 30 much to belly cheere: For a common * fish (as Democritus was wont to say) hath no bone. And * That is to yet this is that (quoth I) which especially and above all induceth us to the use of these portions, say, if a 6th and not without good reason, considering that we acknowledge fatall necessitie by the name of common, it μοίου: for according as the old lady Jocasta said in Euripides:

That which uniteth cities and great States,

And knits in league confederates. is nothing els but equalitie: and nothing in the world hath so much need thereof, as the societie than his seland communion at the table; which is grounded upon nature, and law of necessitie, nothing so bones lying much; the ulage whereof, is not newly taken up, nor drawen in, as needful, by opinion of others, upon his trenbut right necessarie in it selfe. For at an ordinary or common repast, where solke feed together 40 of one dish; if one cat more than his fellowes, certes, he that can not plie his teeth so fait, and commeth short of him, doth maligne and repine at him for it; like as that galley which maketh way, and skuddeth before others, is spighted by those that come dragging behinde. For mee thinks it is not an aufpicate beginning of a feast, nor agreeable to amitte and good fellowship, to fnatch or lurch one from another, to have many hands in a dish at once, to croffe one another with the elbow, and to be with hand or ame in his fellowes way, firiving a vie who should bemore nimble with his fingers, but furely, all these fashions are absurd, unseemely, and (as I may fay) dog-like, ending many times in fnarling, jarring, bitter taunts, revilings, and cholericke brawles, not onely of the guests one with another, but also against those that furnished the boord, and the mafters of the scall, But so long as these wise factives, unless and Adgeors, that is to 50 fay, portion and partition, had the ordering of suppers, dinners and great feasts, dispensing and fetting out an equalitie for to mainteine the societie there, a man should never see any illiterall or mechanicall diforder: for in those daies, suppers were called Adiren guests at the table, Philippin ves; the carvers ferving at the table, dweet; for that they divided, cut our, and gave to evertelone their due portions. And verily, the Lacedemonians had among them certeine distributers of flesh, whom they called x sworting, and those were no meane men of the vulgar fort, but principall persons of the State, infomuch as Lyfander himselfe was by king Agefilan ordeined and created Kpsadding in Afia, that is to fay, an officer for the distribution of stell-meat in the campe

there. But downe went these distributions and divisions, when superstuities and costly cates crept into fealts, and were ferved up to the table; for they could not then (as I suppose) so handformely cut into even portions, their pie-meats, passies, tarts, marchpaines, and such devices of pastrie; they might not so well divide ther flawnes, custards, egge-pies, florentines, and daintie puddings, going under the name of cardona and cappacion, ne yet their blamangers, jellies, chawdres and a number of exquisit fauces, and delicate junkets of all forts, sent up and brought to the board: but being overcome with the pleasure of such lickorous viands, they tooke to them, an abandoning of all equal distribution of parts and portion. A good argument and sufficient proofe hereof, a man may gather by that which we see yet at this day; namely, that the seasts at facrifices, and some publike banquets, are made after the antique maner, and served up by even to portions, to shew the simplicity and pure feeding that was in olde time: fo that I suppose, whofoever would bring up againe that distribution, should withall revive the ancient frugaline, But some man haply, will say: That where private proprietie is in place, publicke communitie is turned out of doores. True indeed, in case that propriety reteine not equalitie: for it is not the possession of a mans owne, and of a thing in proper; but the usurping of another mans right, or the covetous encroching upon the common, that hath brought injustice, debate and trouble into the world; which enormities, the lawes do represse, by the bounds, limits and meafure of that which a man holdeth as proper & his owne, and thereupon they be called in Greeke, rous, of the power and authoritic which they have to part equally unto every one, that which was common among all. For otherwise, if you admit not this distribution, you have no more rea- 20 fon to allow that the mafter of the feast should deale among his guests, to every one his coronet or chaplet of flowers, nor his owne place to fit at the boord. Nay, if any one peradventure, bring with him his thee-friend and fweet-heart, or a minstrell wench to play and fing, they multbe common to him and his friends, that all our goods may be huddled pell-mell, and made in, that is to fay, one, according as Anaxageras would have all. But if it be fo, that the challenge in proprietie of this or that, is no trouble nor hinderance of focietie and communion, confidering, that other matters of principall regard and greatest importance, are allowed for to be common, (I meane conference in talke, courtefies and kindnesses of drinking one to another, and mutuall invitings) let us furcease and give over, thus to despise, discredit and condemne this laudable maner of portions, and the lotterie in partage, which (as Euripides faith) is the daughter of 30 *Fortune, which giveth not the prerogative and preeminence, either to riches, or credit and no-Ages, that is, bilitie; but going (as it happeneth) aswell one way as another, cheereth up the heart of a poore the fould to and abject person, and depriveth no fort and condition whatsoever, of libertie; but by acquainthers or you, and adject person, and depertorment there or you, that is filence, ting the great, wealthy and mighty person with an equalitie, so as he repine not and grudge thereat, reclaimeth him unto temperance and moderation.

The Preamble or Proeme.

Imonides the poet, ô Sosius Senecio, seeing upon a time a stranger at the table, fitting still, and faying never a word, when others were merrie, and dranke liberally, faid unto him: My friend, if you be a foole, you doe wifely; but if you be a wife man, you do as foolithly: for it is a great deale better for a man (as Heraelinus was woont to fay) to hide his own folly and ignorance, than to discover the same; and that iwis is a very hard matter to doe; when we are fet upon a merrie pinne, and drinking wine luffily: for as the poet Homer faid very well:

Wine makes a man, were he both wife and grave, One while to fing, and other whiles to rave: To sport, to play, and laugh full wantonly To leave, to dannee, and foot it deintily: Words to let fall, and secrets to reveale Which better were to hold in and conceale.

In which verses, the poet if I be not deceived, doth covertly and by the way imply a difference 30 between eliberall drinking of wine, or being formewhat cup shotten, and drunkennesse indeed: for to fing, to laugh, and to daunce, be ordinarie matters, incident to those who have taken their liquor well, and be heat with wine, but to prate like a foole, and * blurt out that, which bet - * draw d Gaze ter had beene kept in, be the effects and acts of fuch as have powred in too much, and be starke as a fuch drunken; and herefore Plate faid: That the affections and conditions of the vulgar fort of men, har feet Cir. bediscovered farre better in drinking than otherwise. And when Homer faith:

They had not yet by wine and words,

Knowen one another at their bords. it is evident that he wist well enough of what power and force wine was; namely, to engender to reade and multiply many words: for furely, we come not to the knowledge of men and their maners, 40 by eating and drinking, in case they cat and drinke and say nothing. but for that drinke induceth and draweth on folke to speake much and much speech derecteth and layeth open many things, which otherwife would have lien hidden; therefore by good confequence, drinking together giveth a great light and knowledge one of another: and therefore weemay by good right reproove Acfope in this wife: What meane you good fir, to feeke for those windowes, through which one man might looke into another, and fee into his neighbours heart? for wine ferteth the dores wide enough open unto us, and bewraieth what we have within; not fuffering us to be still and silent, but taking from us the maske and vifour of all diffimulation, and shewing what we are in our colours, as if we flood in no feare at all of law, but were a great way out of the fight of our tutors and schoole-masters that kept us in awe. Wine then is enough for Ae-50 Sose, for Plato, and for all those who learch after meanes to discover the secrets of mens hearts: but fuch as defire not in this wife to trie and fift one another; but rather be willing to converse together with mirth and recreation, these men (I faie) are wont to propose questions, and enterreine such discourses when they meet; whereby the ill parts and impersections of the soule, if they have any, may be concealed and hidden; but the best gitts thereof, and that which savoureth most of civilitie and erudition, may appeare and gather more strength, as being conducted and trained by the guidance of learning and good literature, to the faire meddowes and pleasant pastures wherein the taketh delight to walke and feed; in which regard, I have for your take compiled this third Decade of banquet-questions and table discourses; whereof the first concerneth chaplets of flowers:

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Whether it be commendable to we are upon the head, flower-garlands at the table.

Here was a folemne feaft or banquet one day at Athens, which Eraton the profession in musicke made, having facrificed before unto the muses: and to this feast he invited many: among that faire company, certaine questions were mooved, and much good talke passed to as touching chaplets of flowers: for by occasion that after supper was done, many such coronets of all forts went about, and were dealt round among the guests; Ammonius beganne to fcoffe and laughatus; who in stead of laurell chaplets, did fet upon our heads rose-garlands: For that (quoth hee) these chaplets of flowers be girlish gaudes, and more meet indeed for plaifull maidens and yoong women, than the affemblies of philosophers and learned men: And I woonder much at this Eraton, that reprooving and detesting as he doth the flower-works. (as it were in long and mulicke, and blaming faire Agathon; who by report first brought up the Chromaticke musicke; and when he set out the tragadie of the Mysians, inserted it within other plaine musicke) should himselse as you see, heape upon us at this feast a number of wreathes, garlands, and chaplets of flowers, filling the whole place with sweet smels and plea- 20 fant favours; and when he shutteth up the dore of our eares, against the delights and pleasures of mulicke; should in the meane while set open the windowes of our eies and nosethrils, giving entrance thus another way unto them, for to pierce unto the foule, making a coronet and garland to ferve for pleasure and loosenesse; which should be a matter of religion and devotion: and yet I must needs say, that these oiles and persumes yeeld a sweeter savour, and more exquifit pleafant odour, than these chaplets of flowers, that fade and wither in the hands of the garland makers: howbeit, for all that, they are allowed no place in banquets and affemblies of philosophers; being an idle pleasure, not accompanied with any profit whatsoever, nor arising from any fource of naturall necessitie or appetite: for like as those who come as shadowes to a feaft, being brought thither by fome friends, who are themselves bidden guelts, according to 30 the ordinarie cultome of courtefie, finde themselves no lesse welcome and well intreated than the reft, as Arifodemus was, whom Socrates brought with him to a feast, which Agathon made; but if one goe of himfelfe prefumptuoufly, not invited nor brought thither by a friend; he is wel woorthy to have the dore that upon him; even to the pleasures of eating and drinking, which necessitie hath invited, and doe accompanie the natural appetite, are admitted and have place among wifemen: but as for others which come before they bee bidden or fent for, and presse to get in without any reason, onely upon a disordinate lust, are to be kept out and ex-

At these words of Ammonius, certeine young men who were not as yet acquainted with his fashions, being difmaied and abashed; began gently, and without more a doe to plucke off 40 and pull in funder their coronets. But I (who knew well inough that he mooved this talke onely by way of exercise, and because hee would draw us on to debate the matter) addressed my speech unto Tryphon the physician in this wife: Of all loves Tryphon, be so good as lay downe as wel as we, this goodly chaplet which you have upon your head, fo fragrant & flagrant, both of most beautifull red roses; or else declare presently as you are woont to do emany times among us, the profit and commodity that this flower garland doth conferre unto our drinking of wine fo freely. But here Eraton interpoling himselfe: How is it ordeined (quoth he) that we receive no pleasure free, but it bringeth alwaies one falarie or other with it; & ever as we folace our selves and be meric, we are displeased and discontented, in case wee enjoy not our delights with some hire or reward to cheere the fame: as for fweet finels or costly oiles, and compound perfumes,50 there is some reason peradventure why we should be somewhat ashamed of them; as also for the rich purple colours we may be abashed, in regard of the affected curiositie and superfluous expence thereof; which we are to reject, as being odours deceitfull, and fraudulent robes and colours; as fometime faid that barbarous Scythian: but colours and odours fuch as be naturall, are simple, pure, and sincere, not differing in that respect from the fruits of trees which nature bringeth foorth. Were it not then meere folly to gather the juice and liquor of fuch fruits, and in the meane time reject and condemne the fairer colours and sweet savours, that the featons of the yeere do yeeld, onely for the delightfome afpect and pleasure that floweth (as it were) out of them, if they affoord not otherwise some vertue and propertie which is good and profitable? It feemeth rather yet, that we should do the contrary; namely, if it be true as you philosophers say, that nature doth nothing in vaine and for no purpose, that the hatherented and produced thefe things, for the pleasure onely of man, as serving to no other purpose, but onely for to cheere up our spirits, and content our outward senses. Marke this moreover and besides, how unto trees and plants that prosper and grow, nature hath given leaves, to save and defend their fruits; as also that under their covere, themselves (one while warmed and another while cooled and refreshed) might be able the better to endure the injuries of the aire, and to change of seasons. As for flowers, they yeeld no commoditie at all, by their tarrying upon the plant, unleffe it be this, that we have delight in smelling, and pleasure in beholding them for a time, in that there exhale and breathe from them, woonderfull fweet favors; and they discover unto us an infinit fort of tinctures and colours, by no art of man imitable. And therefore, when westrip trees of their leaves, they seeme displeased and grieved thereat; they seele (as it were) the smart and paine of a wound; and there is left (by that meanes) a hurt and fore like an ulcer; and being thus despoiled of their naturall beauty and heart, they are ill-favoured to see to, and deformed: fo that we ought not onely (as Empedocles faith)

The leaves of laurel wholly to forbeare, And to abstaine her branches for to teare.

10 but also we are to spare the leaves and boughs of all other trees, and not by their deformitie to adorne our felves, robbing and spoiling them perforce and against nature; whereas, if we gather and crop their flowers, we do them no hurt nor wrong at all. For this maner of dealing with them, telembleth vintage and gathering grapes from the vine; and if they be not plucked in due time, they shed of their owne accord, all saded and withered. Like as therefore, they be barbarous people, who clad themselves with the selles and skinnes of sheepe, in stead of making cloth of their wooll, to apparell their bodies; even so me thinks, that they who twist and plait their chaplets, of leaves, rather than flowers, doe not use plants so well as they ought to doe. Thus much I thought good to deliver unto you, in defence of those that make and sell flower garlands; for Grammarian I am not, nor much read in poets, to alledge teltimonies out of their 30 poems; wherein it is to be found, that in olde time, the victors who wan the prize of the facred games, were crowned all with chaplets of flowers; howbeit, thus much I will be bold to avouch out of them: That the role-garland was peculiarly destined and appropriat to the muses; for so I remember, I have read in one place of Sappho the poetreffe, where speaking of a great rich woman, yet altogether ignorant, unlettered, and a meete stranger to the muses, she writeth thus:

All dead thou shalt intombedlie, And leave no name nor memorie: For roles none thou could ft come by, That flower on mountaine Pieric.

But now it is time to heare what testimonie Tryphon will alledge out of his physicke. Then 40 Tryphon taking in hand the matter in question : Our ancients (quoth he) in alder time, were not ignorant of all these points; neither forgat they to treat thereof, as having exceeding great use of plants in the practife of phyficke. For proofe wherof, there remaine at this day, most evident arguments; for the Tyrians offer unto Agemonides, and the Magnefians unto Chiron (who were the first that professed and practised physicke in those parts) the primices and first gatherings of those herbs and roots wherewith they were wont to cure and heale their patients; and prince Basehus, not onely for the invention of wine (a most puissant medicine, I may say to you, and a pleasant), was esteemed a sufficient physician; but also for that he taught those who were surprifed and ravished with Bacchanal furie, to crowne their heads with ivie, and brought that plant into honour and reputation by that meanes; for that it hath a propertie in nature repugnant 50 and contrary unto the qualitie of wine, repreffing and quenching the coldnesse which it hath, the predominant hear thereof, that men might take leffe harme thereby, and so with stand drunkennesse. And verily, the names of certeine plants, do plainly thew the great industrie and carefull diligence of our forefathers in this behalfe. For the walnut-tree they called in Greeke *Kania, * Of yara, for that it fendeth from it a certeine heavie and formiferous vapour, which hurteth the head of the head, or those who lie under the shade and boughs thereof, whereby it causeth them to be drowsie. The daffodillikewife, seemeth to have taken the name* N. ureiffus, because it benummeth the sinewes, * 124 2201, beand ingendreth a heaviefleepineffe or stupefaction: which is the reason that Sophoeles tearmed number-it the ancient coronet of the great gods, meaning thereby the gods terrestriall. Moreover, it is faid that the herbe Rue had the denomination in Greeke Thyavor, of the vertue which it hath; by reason that with the drinesse wherewith it is endued, and the same occasioned by excessive hear. it is so astringent, that it *knitteth, bindeth and hardeneth the naturall seed of man, and is a great enemie to conception and women with childe. As for the * Amethyst, aswell the herbe as the stone of that name, they who thinke that both the one and the other is so called, because they withfland * drunkenneffe, miscount themselves, and are deceived; for in trueth, both are named fo of the colour: and as for the leafe of the herbe, it hath no fresh and lively hew, but refembleth a * wineleffe weake wine, as one may fay, that either drinketh flat and hath loft the co. lour, or els is much delaied with water. Many other plants may be alledged to this purpose, 10 whose properties and naturall vertues have imposed their names: but these examples may suffice to thew the studious industrie and great experience of our ancestours; in regard whereof, they used to weare chaplets of leaves and flowers upon their heads, whiles they fat drinking wine; for strong wine and pure of it selfe, having begun to affaile the head, and to enervate or enfeeble the whole body, by feizing upon the originall fountaine of the nerves and fenfes, to wit, the braine, doth mightily trouble and disquiet a man: for the remedie of which inconvenience, the fent and finell, breathing from flowers, ferveth marvellous well, for that the fame doth defend and fortifie as with a rampar, the castle and citadell (as it were) of the head, against the affaults and impressions of drunkennesse. For these slowers, if they be hot, gently unitop and open the porce, and in fo doing, make way and give vent for the heady wine to evaporate and 20 breathe out all fumofities; and contrariwife, if they be temperatly colde, by clofing gently the faid pores, keepe downe and drive backe the vapours steaming up into the braine. And of this vertue are the garlands of violets and roses, which by their smell and comfortable sent, represse and ftay both ache and heavinesse of head. As for the flower of * Privet, Saffron and Baccaris, that is to fay, Our Ladics gloves, or Nard Rufticke, bring them sweetly to sleepe, who have drunke freely: for these send from them a milde aire, breathing after a smooth and uniforme manner; the which doth foftly comprise and lay even, the unequall distemperatures, the troublesome acrimonies and disorderly asperities, arising in the bodies of those who have overdrunk themselves; whereupon there ensuch a calme, and thereby the strength of the headic wine is either dulled, or elfe rebated. Other forts of flowers there be, the odours whereof being spred and dispersed about the braine, purge mildly the pores and passages of the senses and their or ganes, libitiliat and discusse gently, without trouble and offence, with their moderate heat, the humors and all moist vapours, by way of rarefaction, and warme the braine comfortably, which by nature is of a cold temperature: and for this cause especially those pettie garlands or poesies of flowers which they hung in old time about their necks, they called & of the would so flowers which they hung in old time about their necks, they called & of the would so flowers which they have a sife one would faie fuffumigations, and they annointed all their brest-parts with the oiles that were expelled or extracted from them. Aleyse also testifieth as much, where hee willeth to powre sweet oile upon his head that had fuffered much paine, and upon his breft all grey; for even fo fuch odors are directed up as farre as to the braine, being drawen by the sense of smelling. So it was not because they thought that the soule, which the Greeks call Hips was seated and kept residence 40 within the heart, that they called these wreathes and garlands about their necks & darby publics, as fome would have it, for then more reason it had beene to have tearmed them Embugulus, but it was as I said before, of the exhalation or evaporation upward from the region of the breast, against which they were worne pendant: neither are weeto woonder, that the exhalations of * The Yewgh Howers should have so great force; for we finde it written in records, that the shadow of * Smilax especially when it is in the flower, killeth them that lie a sleepe under it; also from the Poppie there arifeth a certeine spirit, when the juice is drawen out of it, which they call Opium, and if they take no better heed, who draw the same, it causeth them to swoone and fall to the ground: there is an herbe called Alysson, which whosever hold in their hands, or doe but looke upon it, shall presently be ridde of the yexe or painfull hickors and they say, it is very good also for 50 sheepe and goates, to keepe them from all diseases, if the same be planted along their cores and folds: the Rose, also named in Greeke Fibr, was so called, for that it casteth from it an * odoriferous fmell, which is the reason that it quickly fadeth, and the beautie passeth soone away; cold it is in operation, although it carie the colour of fire, and nor without good cause; for that the little heat that it hath, flieth up to the superficies of it, as being driven outwardly from within, by the native coldnesse that it hath.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether Ivic of the owne nature be cold or hot.

His speech of Tryphon we greatly praised : but Amonius smiling : It were not meet (quoth he) to kicke and fourne againe, nor to overthrow fo beautifull and gay a discourse as this was, embelished and adorned with as great varietie as the garlands whereof it treated, and which he undertooke to defend and mainteine: but that I cannot tell how it is come to paffe that the to Ivicisenterlaced in the chaplet of flowers, and faid by the naturall coldnesse that it is to have a vertue and propertie to extinguish and quench the forcible heat of new wine: for contrariwise, it feemeth to be hot and ardent, and the frute which it beareth being put into wine, and infufed therein, giveth it power to inebriat and make drunke, yea, and to trouble and disquiet the bodie by the inflammation that it causeth: by reason of which excessive heat, the very body thereof groweth naturall crooked, after the manner of wood that curbeth and warpeth with the fire; allo the fnow which oftentimes cotinueth and lieth many daies upon other trees, flieth in great haste from the Ivietree; or to speake more properly, is presently gone, thawed and melted, if it chance to fettle upon it, & that by reason of the heat; and that which more is, (as Theophrafin hath left in writing) Harpalus the lieutenant generall under Alexander the Great, in the 20 province of Babylon, by expresse order and direction from theking his master; endevoured and did what he might to fet in the kings or chard there, certaine trees and plants which came out of Greece, and fuch especially as yeelded a goodly shade, caried large leaves, and were by nature cold; for that the countrey about Babylon is exceeding hot and fcorched with the burning heat of the funne; but the ground would never enterteine nor abide the Ivic onely; notwithflanding that Harpalus tooke great paines, and emploied most carefull diligence about it: for plant it as often as he would, it dried and died immediatly; and why? hotte it is of the owne nature, and was planted in a mould farre hotter than it felfe, which hindered it for taking root; for this is a generall and perpetuall rule: that all excessive enormities, of any object, destroy the force and powers of the subjects in which regard, they defire rather their contraries; in such 30 fort, as that a plant of cold temperature requireth an hot place to grow in; and that which is hot demaundeth likewise a cold ground: and this is the reason, that high mountaine countries, windie, and covered with snow; beare ordinarily trees that yeeld torch-wood and pitch, as pines, cone trees, and fuch like: Andwere it not fo, my good friend Tryphon, yet this is certeine; that trees which by nature are chill and cold, shedde their leaves every yeeres for that the small hear which they have, for very penuric retireth inwardly, and leaveth the outward parts naked and deflitute: whereas contrariwife, heat and uncteous fattinesse, which appeareth in the olive, laurell and cypressettees, keepe themselves alwaies greene, and hold their leaves, like as the Ivie alfodoth for her part. And therefore good father Bacchus hath not brought into use and requell the Ivie, as a preservative and present helpe against the encounter of drunkennesse, nor 40 as an enemie to wine, who directly calleth wine with and furnameth himfelfe with under the reupon but in mine opinion; like as they who love wine, if they cannot meet with the liquor of the grape, use a counterfet wine or batley broth, called beere & ale, or els acerteine drinke made of apples, named cydres or els date-wines; even so, he that gladly would in winter season we are a chaplet of vine branches, feeing it altogether naked and bare of leaves, is glad of the Ivie that relembleth it; for the body or wood thereof is likewife writhed and crooked, and never groweth upright, but shutterfrout heere and there, to and fro at a venture; the soft fattie leaves also after the lame maner grow dispersed about the branches without all order; & besides all this, the very betties of the Ivie growing thick & cluftered together like unto greene grapes, when they begin to turne, doe represent the native forme of the vine; and yet albeit the fame yeeldeth some 50 helpe and remedie against drunkennesse; we say, it is by occasion of heat, in opening the pores and small passages in the body, for to let out the sumes of wine, and suffer them to evaporate and breathe forth, or rather by her heat helpeth to concoct and digeft it, that for your fake (good Tryphon) Bacchus may still continue a physician. Arthefewords, Tryphon stated a while, and made no answere, as thinking with himselfe, and studying how to reply upon him. But Eraton calling earnestly upon every one of us that were of the yoonger fort, iputned us forward to aide and affilt Tryphon our advocate, and the patron of our flower-chaplets, or els to plucke them 686 from our heads, and weare them no longer. And Ammonius affured us (for his part) that if any one of us would take upon him to answere, he would not recharge againe, nor come upon him with a rejoinder. Then Tryphon himselfe moved us to say somewhat to the question. Whereupon I began to speake and said : That it belonged not to me, but rather unto Tryphon, for to proove that Ivie was colde, confidering that he used it much in physicke to coole and binde, as being an astringent medicine: but as touching that which ere-while was alledged; namely, that the I vie berie doth inebriat, if it be steeped in wine; it is not found to be true; and the accident which it worketh in those who drinke it in that maner, can not well be called drunkennesse, but rather an alienation of the mind and trouble of the spirit; like to that effect which henbane worketh, & many other plants, which mightily disquiet the braine, and transport our senses and un- 10 derstanding. As for the tortuositie of the bodie and branches, it maketh nothing to the purpole and point in hand; for the works and effects against nature, can not proceed from faculties and powers naturall; and pieces of wood do twine and bend crooked, because fire (being neere unto them) draweth and drieth up forcibly, all the native and kindly humour; waere as the inward and naturall heat, would rather ferment, enterteine and augment it. But confider better upon the matter and marke rather, whether this writhed bunching forme of the Ivie wood (as it groweth) and the basenesse, bearing still downward and tending to the ground, be not an argument rather of weaknesse, and bewray the coldnesse of the bodie, being glad (as it were) to make many rests and staies; like unto a pilgrim or wayfaring traveller, who for wearinesse and faintneffe fitteth him downe and reposeth himselfe many times in his way, and ever and anon tifeth 20 againe and beginneth to fet forward: in regard of which feeblenesse, the Ivie hath always need of some prop or other to stay it selfe by, to take hold of to claspe about and to cling unto, being not able of her owne power to rife, for want of naturall heat, whose nature is to mount alost. As touching Snow, that it thaweth and paffeth away so soone, the cause is, the moisture and softneffe of the Ivie leafe; for fo wee fee that water dispatcheth and diffolveth presently, the laxitie and spongeous raritie thereof, being (as it is) nothing els but a gathering and heaping of a number of small bubbles couched & thrust together : and hereof it commeth, that in over-moist places, fobbed and foaked with water, fnow melteth affoone as in places exposed to the fun. Now for that it hath leaves alwaies upon it, and the fame (as Empedocles faith) firme and fast, this proceedeth not of heat, no more than the fall and shedding of leaves every yeere, is occasioned by 10 colde. And this appeareth by the myrtle tree and the herbe Adiantum, that is to fay, Maidenhaire, which being not hot plants, but colde, are alwaies leaved and greene withall: and therefore some are of opinion, that the holding of the leaves, is to be ascribed to an equality of temperature: but Empedocles (over and befides) attributeth it to a certeine proportion of the pores, thorow which the fap and nourishment doth passe and pierce equally into the leaves; in such fort, as it runneth sufficiently for to mainteine them: which is not so in those trees which lose their leaves, by reason of the laxitie or largenesse of the said pores and holes above, and the straightnesse of them beneath; whereby, as these doe not send any nourishment at all, so the other can hold and reteine none, but that little which they received, they let goe all at once: like as we may observe in certeine canals or trenches, devised for to water gardens and orchards, if $_{40}$ they be not proportionable and equall; for where they be well watred and have continuall nourithment, and the fame in competent proportion, there the trees hold their owne, and remaine firme, alwaies greene, and never die. But the Ivie tree, planted in Babylon, would never grow, and refused there to live. Certes, it was well done of her, and she shewed great generositie, that being (as she was) a devoted vassaile to the god of Baosia, and living (as it were) at his table, she would not goe out of her owne countrey, to dwell among those Barbarians; Thee followed not the steps of king Alexander, who entred alliance, and made his abode with those strange and forren nations, but avoided their acquaintance all that ever the could, and withflood that transmigration from her native place: but the cause thereof, was not heat, but colde rather; because thee could not endure the temperature of the aire, so contrary to her owne : for that which is 50 femblable and familiar, never killeth any thing, but receiveth, nourisheth and beareth it, like as drie ground, the herbe thyme, how hot foever the foile be. Now for the province about Babylon, they say, the aire in all that tract is so soultrie hot, so stuffing, so grosse, and apt to stiffe and ftop the breath, that many inhabitants of the wealthier fort, cause certeine bits or bagges of leather to be filled with water, upon which, as upon featherbeds, they lie to sleepe and coole their bodics.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What the cause is, that women hardly are made drunke, but olde men, very soone?

Lorus one day feemed to marvell, that Ariffule having in his treatife of drunkennesse, set downe this position: That olde men are soone surprized and overseene with wine, but contratiwife, women, hardly and very feldome; rendred no reason thereof, considering that his maner otherwise, is not to propose any such difficulties, but hee doth decide and electe the same. 10 And when he had made this overture, he mooved the companie to inquire into the cause thereof, and a supper it was, where familiar friends were met together. Then sylla faid: That the one was declared by the other: for if we comprehend the cause aright, as touching women, it were no hardmatter to finde out a reason for old men; confidering that their natures and conflitutions be most opposit and contrary, in regard of mostlure and drinesse, roughnesse and smoothneffe, fortneffe and hardneffe: for first and formost, suppose this of women undoubtedly, that their naturall temperature is very moift, which causeth their flesh to be so tender, soft, smooth, flickeand thinings to fay nothing of their naturall purgations every moneth: when as therefore wine meeteth with fo great humiditie, being overcome by the predominancy thereof, it loseth the edge and tin Cture (as it were) together with the force that it had, fo as it becommeth dull, 20 every way discoloured and waterish. And verily to this purpose, somewhat may be gathered out of the words of Ariffetle; for he faith: That those who make no long draught when they take their wine, nor drinke leafurely, but powre it downe at once (which manner of drinking they called apaskers) are not fo subject to drunkennesse as others; for that the wine maketh no long stay within their bodies, but being forcibly thrust foorth, foone passeth thorow: and ordinarilie we may observe, that women drinke in this manner; and very probable it is, that their bodies by reason of continual attraction of humours downward, to the nether parts for their monethly termes, is full of many conduits and passages, as if they were divided into chanels, pipes, and trenches, to draw foorth the faid humours; into which the wineno fooner falleth, but away it paffeth apace, that it cannot fettle nor rest upon the noble and principall parts, which if they 20 beconce troubled and possessed, drunkennesse doth soone ensue. Contraviwise, that old men want naturall humiditie, their very name in Greeke feemeth to implie fufficiently, for called they are years, not because they are peopres is that is to say, inclining and stouping downward to the earth, but because they are already in their habitude of bodie passes and pages, that is to say, earthly: Moreover, their stiffenesse and unpliable disposition, the roughnesse also of their skinne, argueth their dry nature and complexion: it standeth therefore to good reason, that when they liberally take their wine, their bodies which are rare and fpungious within, by occasion of that drinesse, quickly catcheth and sucketh up the same, and then by long staying there, it worketh up into the head, caufeth the braine to beat, and breedeth heavinetfe there; & like as land-flouds gently glide over those fields which be solide & hard, washing them onely 40 aloft, and making no mire & dirt; but if the ground be light and hollow they enter and toke fartherin; even so wine being soone caught, and drawne by the drinesse of old mens bodies, flaieth there the longer time: and were not this fo, yet we may observe that the verie nature of old menadmitteth the fame fymptomes and accidents which drunkennesse maketh. Now these accidents occasioned by drunkennesse, are very apparent, to wit, the trembling and shaking of their limbes, faltering in their toong, and speaking double, immoderate and lavish speech, pettifineffe and aptueffe to choler, forgetfulneffe and alienation of the minde and underflanding; the most part whereof being incident to old men, even when they are best in health and in most fober, a little thing God wot will fet them cleaneout, and any finall agitation whatfoever will doe the deed : fo that drunkenneffe in an old man engendreth not new accidents, but 50 fetteth on foot and augmenteth those which be already common and ordinary with them. To conclude, there is not a more evident argument to proove and confirme the fame than this; that nothing in the world refembleth an old man more, than a yoong man when hee is

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether women by their naturall complexion be colder or hotter than men?

Hen Sylla had delivered his minde to that effect; Apollonides an expert profession and well feene in raunging a battel in array, feemed by his words to approove well of that which had bene alledged as touching old men; but he thought, that in the discourse of women, the onely course was left out and overslipt, to wit, the coldnesse of their constitution, by meanes whereof, the hottest wine is quenched, and forgoeth that fierie slame which flieth up to the head, and troubleth the braines: and this was received as a very probable and fufficient reason, by all the company there in place. But Athryilatus the physician, a Thasian borne, interjected foine state of farther searching into this cause: For that (quoth hee) some are of opinion that women are not cold, but hotter than men; yea, and others there be, (and that is a greater matter) who hold, that wine is not hotte at all but cold. Florus woondering, and amazed hecreat: This discourse and disputation (quoth he) as touching wine I refer to him there; and with that pointed at me; for that not many daies before wee had disputed together about that argument: But as for women (quoth Athryllatus) that they bee rather hot than cold, they argue thus: First and formost, they are smooth, and not haire on their face and bodie, which testifieth their heat, which fpendeth and confumeth the excrement and faverfluitie that engendreth haire. 20 Secondly, they proove it by their abundance of bloud, which feemeth to be the fountaine of heat in the body; and of bloud women have fuch store, that they are ready to be inflamed, yea, to frie and burne withall, if they have not many purgations, and those quickly returning in their course to discharge and deliver them thereof. Thirdly, they bring in the experience obfervéd at funerals, which theweth evidently, that womens bodies be farre hotter than mens; for they that have the charge of burning and enterring of dead corfes, doe ordinarily put into the funerall fire one dead body of a woman to tenne of men: For that one corps (fay they) helpeth to burne and confume the rest; by reason that a womans slesh conteineth in it I wot not what unctuofitie or oileous matter, which quickly taketh fire, and will burne as light as a torch, fo that it ferveth in stead of drie sticks to kindle the fire, and set all a burning. Moreover, if this 30 be admitted for a truth, that what soever is more frutefull and apter for generation, is also more hot: certeine it is, that young maidens beripe betimes, readier for marriage, yea and their flesh pricketh fooner to the act of generation, than boies of their age; neither is this a small and feeble argument of their heat but for a greater and more pregnant proofe thereof, marke how they endure very well any chilling cold, and the injurie of winter feafon, for the most part of them leffe quake for cold than men doe, and generally need not fo many clothes to weare.

Heereat Florus began to argue against him and said: In my conceit, these very arguments will ferve well to confute the faid opinion; for to beginne with the last first, the reason why they withstand cold better than men, is because everything is lesse offended with the like: besides, their feed is not apt for generation, in regard of their coldnesse, but serveth in stead of matter 40 onely, and yeeldeth nourifhment unto the naturall feed of man. Moreover, women fooner give over to conceive, and ceafe child-bearing, than men to beget children: and as for the burning of their dead bodies, they catch fire fooner I confesse, but that is by reason that commonly they be fatter than men; and who knoweth not, that fatte and greafe is the coldest part of the bodie; which is the cause that yoongmen and those that use much bodily exercise, are least fatte of all others:neither is their monthly ficknesse & voidance of bloud, a signe of the great quantity and abundance, but rather of the corrupt qualitie and badneffe thereof; for the crude and unconcocted part of their bloud being superfluous, and finding no place to settle and rest, nor to gather confiftence within the bodie by reason of weaknesse, passeth away, as being heavy and troubled, altogether for default and imbecillitie of heat to overcome it: and this appeareth mani- 50 feltly by this, that ordinarily when their monthly ficknesse is upon them, they are very chill, & thake for cold, for that the bloud which then is stirred and in motion, ready to be discharged out of the bodie, is fo raw and cold. To come now unto the smoothnesse of their skinne, and that it is not hairie; who would ever fay that this were an effect of heat? confidering that we fee the hottest parts of mans bodie to be covered with haire? for furely all superfluities and excrements are fent out by heat, which also maketh way, boring as it were holes through the skinne, and opening the paffages in the fuperficies thereof. But contratiwife wee may reason, that the fliecknesse of womens skinne is occasioned by coldnesse, which doth constipate and close the pores thereof. Now that womens skinne is more fast and close than mens; you may learne and understand by them (friend Ashryilatus) who use to lie in bedde with women, that annoint their bodies with sweet oiles, or odoriferous compositions; for even with sleeping in the same bed with them, although they came not so neere as to touch the women, they finde themselves all persuned, by reason that their owne bodies which be hot, rare, and open, doe draw the said ointments or oiles into them: Well, by this meanes (quoth he) this question as touching women hath beene debated pro & contra, by opposit arguments right mansfully.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

Whether wine be naturally cold of operation?

But I would now gladly know, (quoth Florus ftill) whereupon your conjecture and suspicion should arise, that wine is cold of nature? why? And doe you thinke (quoth I) that this in an opinion of mine? Whole then (quoth the other?) I remember (quoth I) that not of late, butlong agoe, I light upon a discourse of Aristorie as touching this probleme: and Epicurus himselfe in his Symposium or banquet, hath discussed the question at large; the summe of which 20 disputation (as I take it) is thus much: For (he faith) that wine is not simplic of it selfe hot, but that it conteineth in it certeine atomies or indivisible motes causing heat, and others likewise that engender cold; of which some it casteth off and loseth when it is entred into the bodie; others it taketh unto it, from the very bodie it felfe wherein it is; according as the fame petie bodies be of nature and temperature, fitted and agreeable unto us; in such fort, as some when they be drunke with wine, are well hear; others againe contrariwife, be as cold. These reasons (replied Florus) directly bring us by Protagoras into the campe of Pyrrho, where we shall meet with nothing but incertitude, and be still to feeke, and as wife as we were before: for plaine it is, that in speaking of oile, milke, honie, and likewise of all other things, we shall never grow to any particular relolution of them, what nature they beeof, but still have some evasion or 30 other, laying: That they become fuch and fuch, according as ech of them is mixed and tempered one with another: But what be the arguments that your felfe alledge, to prove that wine is cold? Thus I see well (quoth I) that there be two of you at once, who presse and urge mee to deliver my mind ex tempore, and of a fudden: the first reason then that commeth into my headisthis, which I fee ordinarily practifed by phyticians upon those who have weake stomacks: for when they are to corroborate and for the that part, they preferibe not any thing that is hot; but if they give them wine, they have present case and helpe thereby; semblablic, they repressed fluxes of the belly, yea, and when the bodie runneth all to diaphoreticall sweats, which they effect by the meanes of wine, no leffe, nay much more than by applying flow, confirming and strengthening thereby the habit of the bodie, which otherwise was ready to melt 40 away and resolve : now if it had a nature and facultie to hear, it were all one to applie unto the region of the heart, as fire unto frow furthermore, most physicians do hold, that sleepe is procured by cooling; and the most part of soporiferous medicines which provoke sleepe, be cold; asforexample, Mandragoras and poppie Juice : but thefe I must needs confesse, with great force and violence doe compresse, and (as it were) congeale the braine to worke that effects whereas wine cooling the fame gently, with eafeand pleasure representation and stateth the motion thereof; fo that the difference onely betweene it and the other, is but in degree, according to more and leffe. Over and befides, what foever is hot, is also generative and apt to ingender seed; for howfoever humiditie giveth it an aptitude to run and flow, it is spirit, by the meanes of hear, that endueth it with vigor & strength, yea, and an appetite to generation: now they that drinke 50 much wine, especially if it be pure of it felfe, and not delaied, are more dull and flow to the act of generation, and the feed which they fow, is not effectuall, nor of any force and vigor to ingendery their medling alfoand conjunction with women, is vaine, and doth no good at all, by reafon that their feed is cold and feeble: furthermore, all the accidents and paffions which colde worketh, doe befall unto those that be drunke; for they tremble and thake, they are heavie and dull of motion, and looke pale; the spirit in their joints and members, is unquiet, and mooveth diforderly; their tongues falter, flut and be double; laft of all, their finewes in the extremities of the bodie, are drawen up in maner of a crampe, and benummed; yea, and in many, drunkennesse Mmm 3 endeth in a dead palife or generall resolution of all parts; namely, after that the wine hath utterly extinguished and mortified their naturall heat. Physicians also are woont to cure these fymptones and inconveniences procured by excessive drinke and furfet, by laying the patients presently in bedde, and covering them well with clothes, for to bring them to an heat; the next morrow they put them into the baine or hot-house, and rub them wel with oile; they nou. rish them with meats which do not trouble the masse of the body; and thus by this cherrishing, they gently fetch againe and recover the heat which wine had diffipated and driven out of the bodie. And for a fmuch as (quoth I) in things apparent and evident to the eie, we fearch for the like faculties which lie hidden and fecret, how can we doubt what drunkenneffe is, and with what it may be compared ? for according as I have before faid, drunken folke refemble (for all the 10 world) old men : and therefore it is, that great drunkards foone wax old, many of them become bald before their time, and grow to be grey and hoarie ere they be aged; all which accidents fcome to furprize a man for defect of heat.

Moreover, vineger (in some sort) resembleth the nature and propertie of wine: now of all things that are powerfull to quench, there is none fo repugnant and contrarie to fire, as vineger is; and nothing fo much as it, by the excessive coldnesse that it hath, overcommeth and represfeth a flame. Againe, we fee how phylicians use those fruits to coole with all, which of all others be most vinous, or represent the liquor of wine; as for example, pomgranates and other orchard apples. As for honie, do they not mix the substance thereof with raine-water and snow, for to make thereof a kinde of wine, by reason that the cold doth convert the sweetnesse for the affi- 20 nitie that is between them, into aufteritie, when it is predominant and more puissant? what should I say more? have not our ancients in olde time, among serpents, dedicated the dragon? and of all plants, confectated Ivie to Bacchus, for this cause, that they be both of a certeine colde and congealing nature ? Now if any doe object for proofe, that wine is hot; how for them that have drunke the juice of hemlocke, the fovereigne remedie and counterpoise of all other, is to take a great draught of strong wine upon it; I will replie to the contrary, and turne the same argument upon them; namely, that wine and the juice of hemlocke mingled together, is a poison incurable, & presently killeth those who drinke it, remedilesse. So that there is no more reason to prove it hot, for refulting hemlocke, than colde, for helping the operation of it; or els we must fay, that it is not coldnesse whereby hemlocke killeth those that drinke it so presently, but rather 30 fome other hidden qualitie and propertie that it hath.

Of the convenient time for a man to know his wife carnally.

Erteine yoong men, who were new students, and had lately tasted of the learning conteined in ancient books, were ready to teare Epicurus in pieces, and inveighed mightily against him as an impudent person; for proposing and moving speech which was neither seemly nor necessarie, in his symposium or banquet, as touching the time of meddling with a wo- 40 man : for that an ancient man, well stept in veres as he was, should make mention & begin talke of venerous matters, and namely, at a banquet, where many yoong men were in place, to particularize and make question in this fort: Whether it were better for a man to have the use of his wife, before supper or after; seemed to proceed from a lascivious minde, and incontinent in the highest degree. Against which, some there were, who alledged the example of * Xenophon, who his Symposium after his supper or banquet, brought his guests (not on foot, but on horse backe, riding a gallop away home) to lie with their wives. But Zopyrus the phylician, who was very well seene and converfant in the books of Epicurus, faid: That they had not read diligently and with advisement, his booke called Symposium, that is to fay, The banquet: For he tooke not this question (quoth he) to treat of at the beginning, as a theame or subject matter expressy chosen and of purpose, 50 whereto all their talke should be directed, and in nothing els to be determined and ended a but having caused those yoong men to rise from the table for to walke after supper, he entred into a discourse, for to induce them to continence and temperance, and to withdraw them from diffolute lust of the flesh, as being at all times, a thing dangerous, and ready to plunge a man.into mischiefe, but yet more hurtfull unto those who use it upon a full stomacke, after they have eat and drunke well, and made good cheere at some great feast. And if (quoth Zopyrus) he had taken for the principall subject, the discourse of this point, is it pertinent and beseeming a philosopher, not to treat and confider at all of the time and houre proper and meet for men to embrace their espoused wives? or much better so to doe, in due season and with discretion? and is it (I pray you) not discommendable, to dispute thereof elswhere and at other times? and altogether dishonest, to handle that question at the table or at a feast? for mine owne part, I thinke cleane contrary; namely, that we may with good reason reprove and blame a philosopher, who openly in the day time, should dispute in publicke schooles, of this matter, before all commers, and in the hearing of all forts of people; but at the table, where there is a standing cup set before familiars and friends, and where other-whiles it is expedient to vary and change our talke, which otherwise would be but lewke warme or starke colde for all the wine, how can it be unseemely or 10 dishonest, either to speake or heare ought that is holsome and good for men, as touching the lawfull company with their wives in the fectet of marriage ? for mine owne part, I protest unto you, I could with with all my heart, that those Partitions of Zeno, had beene couched in some booke entituled, Abanquet or pleasant treatise, rather than bestowed (as they are) in a composition so grave and serious, as are the books of policie and government of State. The young men at these words, were cut over the thumbs; and being abashed, held their tongues, and fat them downe quietly. Now when others of the company requested Zopprus to rehearle the words and reasons of Epicurus, as touching this point. I am not able (quoth he) in particular, to decipher, and precifely to fet them downe as he delivered them; but I suppose the philosopher seared those violent concussions and motions, which are felt in the time of that conjunction; for that 20 our bodies by that meanes, be woonderfullly stirred and disquieted, in regard especially of the wine, which being of it felfe stirring and causing much turbulent agitation, it setteth the bodie ordinarily out of quietrepose: if then the full maffe thereof, being in such an agitation, meet not with a fetled calme and rest, by sleepe, but runneth on still headlong to other troublesome motions, caused by the sports of Venus, so that the cords and ligaments, which are wont to hold our bodies entire, and mainteine them firme and strong, be slacked and loosed, great danger there is, that the foundation being thus shaken, the whole edifice wil fall to the ground : for furely at fuch a time, the very genitall feed is not fo apt and ready to paffe away with cafe, being fo pent and conflipate (as it is) by reason of repletion; so that it must be setched away perforce, all troubled and confused. In which regard (quoth Epicurus) a man is to goe about this bustneffe, when the bodie is at quiet and well fetled; namely, after that the concoction and digetition on both, of our food, is perfectly finished, which all that time runneth to and fro, and willingly avoideth all fuch disquietnesse; untill (I say) the bodie have need of new nourishment. And for to confirme this opinion of Epicarus, a man may adjoine a reason out of physicke; namely: That the opportunity of the morrow-morning, when the concoction is thorowly performed, is molt fafe and fure; whereas to struggle or meddle with a woman immediatly after supper, is never without danger: for who can sell (before the meat be well concocted) whether after the panting agitation by the act of Ferm, there will not enfue another cruditie and indigeftion, so as a double inconvenience and furfet upon furfet may follow thereupon? Then Olympicus taking his turne to speake and opine : As for me, I am (quoth he) infinitly well pleased with that sen-40 tence of Climas the Pythagorean; who being demanded the question, when the best time was to embrace a woman? Marie (quoth he) when thou are minded to do thy felde most harme : for that which Zopyran faid even now of the fittime, carrieth some reason with it: and as for the other, it hath (I fee well) many and fundry difficulties and inconveniences, and is altogether unfeatonable for this purpose. Like as therefore, Thales the wife, being importuned by his mother (who preffed hard upon him) to matrie; pretily put her off, shifting and avoiding her cunningly, with words: for at the first time, when the was in hand with him, he said unto her: Mother, it is too foone, and it is not yet time : afterwards, when he had passed the slower of his age, and that the fet upon him the fecond time, and was very inftant: Alas mother, it is now too late, and the time is past; even so, it were good for every man to carry and governe himselfe in these 50 amatorious games of Venus, that when he goes to bed at night, he fay to himselfe: It is not yet time; and when hee rifeth in the morning: Now there is no time left. Heereupon Sotharus: These be indeed (quoth he) Olympicus, the parts of champions, and require such as would enter combat for to win a prize at the facted games: these matters (I say) altogether, are for those to performe, who can drinke wine freely, and make a game of it, yea, and eat flesh as luftily; but furely, this speech of yours, little besitteth this time and place; for heere are a fort of fresh and luftic yoong men newly married,

By whom, wot well, the works, in some degree, Of love and Venus, must performed be.

Neither is dame Penus as yet, retired and fled altogether from us; for we fill in chanting hymnes unto the gods, pray devoutly other whiles unto her, in this wife:

O Venus, ladie deere and goddeffe faire, Holdbacke olde age, keepe from us hoarie haire.

But let us consider now (if you thinke it good) whether Epicurus hath done well and decently, as he ought to doe, in taking away Venus from the night feason; of whether he hath not rather offended against all right and reason in so doing; considering that Menander, a man well seene in love-matters, faith: That thee is acquainted with her above all other gods and goddeffes: for 10 in mine opinion, well ordeined was this vaile and shade of darkenesse, to cover those that are minded to performe these acts, and in some fort to hide the pleasure from them, and not to come unto this game by day-light, thereby to chase from out of their eie-fight all shame and to give meanes unto lafeivious wantonnesse, for to be bold and confident; and finally, to imprint the memorie of the act to lively, that it may remaine long after in the minde, for to kindle and revive still, new lusts and stefhly desires : For the eie-sight (as Plato saith) passeth most swiftly thorow the fleshly affections of the body into us, that is to fay, into our foule, and evermore awakeneth and raifeth fresh and new concupifcence, representing with great force and vehemencie, the images of pleasure, and putting us in minde to pursue the same; whereas contratiwise, the night taking away the greatest part of fuch acts as be most furious, lulleth nature asleepe, and 20 bringeth her (as it were) to bed, in fuch fort, as it doth not exorbitate or breake forth by meanes of the fight, into lascivious loofenesse. But over and besides all this, what reason or sense is there in this, that a married man, returning all jolly, fresh and merry, from a festivall supper, and peradventure with a gay chaplet of flowers upon his head, yea, and perfumed with fweet and odoriferous oiles, should come home, go to bed, turne his backe unto his wife, pull the clothes about him round, and so lie to sleepe all night; and the morrow after, in broad day light and in the mids of houshold occasions and other affaires, send for his wife out of the nourserie or womens roome, for to come unto him about such a matter; or in the morning, turne unto her and imbrace her in his armes, at fuch a time as the cocke troads his hennes? for the even-tide (my good friend Olympicus) is the end and repose of all out day-labours past, and the morning is the be- 20 ginning of new travels. Of the evening, god Bacchus is the superintendent and president, who is furnamed Lyfus or Liber, for that he freeth us from all paines taking; and accompanied he is in this presidencie of his, with the mules, to wit, faire Terpsuhore, who loveth daunces, and pleafant Thalia, who delighteth in feafts and banquets 3 whereas the morning rifeth betimes by the breake of day, to do fervice unto Mynerun, furnamed Ergune, the work-miltreffe or patroneffe of artifans; to Mercurie likewife, the mafter of merchants and occupiers; and therefore upon the evening, attend fongs, muficke, minstrelsie, plaies, daunces, weddings,

Masques mommeries, feasts and banquets,

Noise of hautboies, fluits, and cornets. In the morning a man shall heare nothing but the thumping founds of the smithes hammer 40 and fledges, beating and knocking upon the anvill; the grafting noise of sawes; the morowwatch of Publicans, Cultomers and Toll-gatherers, crying after those that come in or go forth; the ajournements of ferjeants and criers, calling for apparance in the court before the judges; publications of edicts and proclamations; fummons to attend and be ready to make court, and to do ductie unto some prince, great lord or governour of State; at which time, all pleasures be gone and out of the way.

Of Venus then there is no talke, The flaves of Bacchus do not walke With Ivie dight : the gamesome sport Of gallant youths, is all-a-mort:

For why? as day growes on apace, Cares and troubles come in place.

Moreover, you shall never reade, that the poet Homer reporteth of any woorthy prince and demi-god, that in the day-time he lay either with wife or concubine; onely he faith, that Paris, when he fled out of the battell, went and couched himfelfe in the bosome and lap of his Helena; giving us thereby to understand, that it is not the part of an honest minded husband, but the act of a furious and wanton-given adulterer, to follow fuch pleafures in the day-time. Neither doth it follow (as Epicurus faith) that the bodie takes more harme by performing this duetic of marriage after supper, than in the morning, unlesse a man be so drunke or overcharged with meats, that his bellie is ready to cracke; for certeinly, in fuch a cafe it were very hurtfull and dangerous indeed; but if one have taken his meat and drinke fufficiently, be wel in health, and in fome meafurecheerefull; if his bodie be apt and able, his minde well disposed thereto; if hee interpose fome reasonable time betweene, and then fall to clip and imbrace his wife; he shall not thereby incurre any great agitation that night, nor feare the heavie load and repletion of meat; neither will this action worke him any dammage, or coole him too much, no yet disquiet and remoove out of their place, the atomies (as Epicurus faith); but if hee compose himselfe afterwards to 10 fleepe and repose, he shall soone supplie againe that which was voided, and replenish the vessels with a new afflux of fpirits, which were emptied by the faid evacuation. But of all things, efpeciall heed would be taken, not to play at this game of Venus in the day time; for feare left the body and minde both, being troubled already with the cares and travels of fundry affaires, be by this meanes more exasperat and inflamed, considering that nature hath not a sufficient and competent time betweene, to repose and refresh her selfe: for all men (my good friend) have not that great leafure which Epicurus had neither are they provided for their whole life time, of that rest and tranquillity, which he said, that he got by good letters and the study of philosophy: nay, there is not one in maner, but every day he finds himfelfe amufed and emploied about many affaires and businesses of this life, which holde him occupied; to which, it were neither good 20 nor expedient for a man to expose his body, so resolved, ensembled and weakened with the furious exploit of concupifcence. Leaving him therefore to his foolish opinion of the gods, that being immortall and happy, they have no care of our affaires, nor bufie themselves therewith, let us obey the lawes, maners and customes of our owne countrey, as every honest man ought to do; namely, to be fure in the morning to go into the temple, and to lay our hands upon the facrifice, if haply a little before, we have done such a deed. For in trueth, well it were, that interpoling the night and our fleepe betweene, after a fufficient time and competent space, we should come to present our selves pure and cleane, as if wee were risen new men with the new day, and purposing to leade a new life, as Democritus was woont to say.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that Must or new wine doth not inebriate or make solke drunke?

"He maner was in Athens, to give the affay, and to tafte new wines the eleventh day of the moneth [February] which day they named Pithagia: and verily in olde time, they observed this ceremonie, to powre out the first drawing thereof unto the gods, before they dranke of it, making their praiers devoutly, that the use of this medicinable drinke might be holsome and healthfull, not noisome nor hurtfull unto them. But in our countrey this moneth is called Hersunicus, the fixt day of which moneth, the manner was to pierce their veffell first, and talte 40 new wines, after they had facrificed to good Fortune, and good Damon, and that the westerne winde Zephyrus had done blowing; for of all windes, this is it that most troubleth, disquieteth, and turneth wine: and looke what wine may escape this season, great hope there is that it will hold and continue good all the yeere after: according to which custome my father upon a time facrificed as his maner was; and after supper finding that his wine was good & commendable, he proposed this question unto certeine young men that were students with mee in philosophic: Howit came to passe that new wine would not make a man drunke: the thing secmed at the first unto many a very strange and incredible paradox: But Agias said: That this new fweet wine was every way offenfive unto the stomacke, and quickly glutted it; by reason whereof a man could hardly drinke so much of Must, as were sufficient to overturne his braines: 50 for that the appetite is quickly dulled and wearied, for the small pleasure that it taketh, so some as it feeleth no more thirst. Now that there is a difference betweene fweet and pleafant, the poet Homer knew well enough and gave us fo much to understand when he said:

> With cheefe and hony that is fweet: With pleasant wine a drinke most meet.

For in truth wine at the first is to be counted sweet, but in the end it becommeth pleasant, namely, after it hath age, and by the meanes of working, chullition and concoction, paffed to a certeine harshnesse and austeritie. But Arist anet us of Nica said: That he well remembred how he had read in a certeine place in some books: That Must mingled with wine staieth & repressed trunkennesses, he added moreover and said: That there were physicians who ordeined for them that had overdrunke themselves; to take when they went to bed, a piece of bread dipped in hony that had overdrunke themselves; to take when they went to bed, a piece of bread dipped in hony and to eat it? If then it be so, that sweet things doe mittigate and dull the force of wine: good reason it is, that new wine should not inebriate, untill the sweetnesse thereof be turned into pleasantnesse. We approoved greatly the discourse of these two yoong men, for that they fell not upon triviall and common reason, but had devised new: for these be they that are alledged by every man, and ready at hand, to wit; the heavinesse of Must or new wine, as Institute said, which maketh the belly soluble, and so it breaketh thorow the quantitie of statient and muddy shirts that abide therein, together with the waterie substance, of which the ventosities directify get foorth, as expelled by force; but the aquositie by the ownenature enseableth the strength of the wine: like as contrariwise age augmenteth the power thereof, for that the watrie substance is now gone; by reason whereof, as the quantitie of the wine is diminished, so the qualitie and vertue is energased.

THE EIGHT QUESTION.

What the reason is, that they who be throughly drunke, are lesse brame-sicke than those who are but in the way of drunkennesse.

Ecing then (quoth my father) that we have begun already to disquiet the ghost of Aristotle, it shall not be amisse to trie what we can say of our selves, as touching those whom wee call eterflor ones, that is to fay, who are well heat with wine, but not yet starke drunk for how foever Ariflottle was ordinarily very quicke and fubtile in refolving fuch questions, yet in mine opinion he hath not fufficiently and exactly delivered the reason thereof; for as farre as I can gather out of his words (he faith) That the discourse of reason in a man who is sober, judgeth aright and according to the truth of things as they be: contrariwife, his fense and understanding who is cleane gone, & as they fay dead drunke, is done and oppreffed altogether: as for the apprehenfion and imagination of him who hath taken his wine well, and is but halfe drunke, is yet found, mary his reason and judgement is troubled already and crackt: and therefore such judge indeed, 30 but they judge amiffe, for that they follow their phantalies onely: but what thinke you of this? For mine owne part (quoth I) when I consider with my selfe his reason, it seemeth sufficiently to have rendred a cause of this effect; but if you would have us to search farther into the thing, and devile fome special newmatter? marke first, whether this difference which hee maketh betweene them, ought not to be referred to the bodie: for in the fe that have well drunke, there is nothing but the discourse of reason onely troubled; because the bodie being not yet thorowly drenched and drowned in wine, is able to doe service unto the will and appetite; but if it be once off the hookes, (as they fay) or utterly oppreffed, it for faketh and betraieth the appetites, and breaketh day with the affections, being fo farre shaken and out of joint, that it can serve no more, nor execute the will: whereas the other having the bodie still at commaund, and ready 40 to exorbitate together with the will, and to finne with it for companie, are more seene and discovered, not for that they be more foolith, and have leffe use of reason, but because they have greater meanes to flow their follie. But if we should reason from another principle, and go another way to worke (quoth 1) he that will confider well the force of wine, shall finde no let, but that in regard of the quantitie, it altereth and becommendivers, much like unto the fite, which if it be moderate, hardeneth and baketh the tile or pot of claie; but in case it bee very firing, & the heat exceffive, it melteth & diffolveth the fame: and on the otherfide; the fpring or fummer feafon at the beginning breedeth fevers and fetteth them on fire, which in the progresse and middes thereof being growen to their heights, decline and cease altogether. What should hinder then, but the minde and understanding which naturally is disquieted and troubled with 500 wine, after it is once off the wheeles, and cleane overturned by the excessive quantitie thereof should come into order * againe, and be fetlet as it was before? Much like therefore as Ellebore beginneth his operation to purge, by overturning the fromacke, and disquieting the whole malle of the body; and if it be given in a leffe dofe or quantitie than it should be; well it may trouble, but purge it will not also as wee see some, who take medicines for to provoke sleepe, under the just and full quantitie which is prescribed, in stead of sleepe and repose, finde themfelves more vexed and tormented than before; and others againe, if they take more, fleepe foundly; even so is standeth to good reason, that the brain-sicknesse of him who is halfe drunk, after it is growen once to the highest strength and vigour, doth diminish and decay; to which purpose now wine serveth very well, and helpeth much: for being powred into the body with great abundance, it butneth and consumert that spice of madnesse which troubleth the minute and use of reason; much after the maner of that dolefull song, together with the heavy sound of hautboies in the sunerals of dead solke, at the first mooveth compassion; and setteth the cice a weeping, but after it hath drawen the soule so to pittie and compassion, it proceedes that there; and by little and little it spendeth and riddeth away all sense of dolour and sorrow; semblably a man shal observe, that after the wine hath mightily troubled, disquieted the vigorous & courago gious part of the soule, men quickly come to themselves, & their minds be settled in such fort as they become quiet, and take their repose when wine and drunkennesse hat passed as farre as it can.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the meaning of the common proverbe: Drinke either five, or three, but not fower?

Hen I had thus faid; Ariston crying out aloud as his maner was: I see well now (quotit he) that there is opened a reentrance, and returne againe of measures into feaths and 20 banquets, by vertue of a most just and popular decree: which measures by meanes of (I wot not what) fober feafon, as by a tyrant have beene this long time banished from thence: for like as they who professe a canonicall harmonie in foundit. of the harpe, doe holde and say: That the proportion Hemiolios or Sesquialterall, produceth the symphonic or musicall accord Diapenta, of the duple proportion ariseth that Diapason: but as for the mucsike or accord called Diatessaron, which of all others is most obscure and dull, it consistes in the proportion Epitritos; even fo, they that make profession of skill in the harmonies of Bacchus, have observed, that three fymphonies or accords there are, betweene wine & water, namely, Diapenta, Diatrion, & Diatesfaron, singing and saying after this manner: Drinke five, or three, and not sowers for the fift standeth upon the proportion Hemiolios, or Sesquialterall to wit, when three parts or measures of water be mingled with two of wine; and the third conteine the duple proportion; namely when two parts of water be put to one of wine; but the fourth answereth to the proportion of three parts of water powred into one of wine; and verily this measure or proportion Epitritos, may fit some grave and wife senatours sitting in parliament; or the Archonres in the counsell chamber Prytaneum for to dispatch waightie affaires of great consequence: and it may befeeme well enough forme logicians that pull up their browes, when they are buffe in reducing, unfolding, and altering their Syllogismes; for surely it is a mixture or temperature fober and weake enough: as for the other twaine, that medley which carieth the proportion of two for one, bringeth in that turbulent tone of the Acrothoraces before faid; to wit, of fuch as are formewhat cup-shotten and halfe drunke:

Which stirs the strings and cords of secret hart,
That moved hould not be, but rest apart.

For it neither suffereth a man to bee fully sober, nor yet to drench himselfe so deepe in wine; that hee bee altogether witlesse and past his sense: but the other standing upon the proportion of two to three, is of all others the most musicall accord, causing a man to sleepe peaceablie, and to forget all cares, resembling that good and fertile corne-field which Hessaus speaketh of,

That doth from man all cares and surfes drive, And children cause to rest, to feed, and thrive.

It appeafeth and stilleth all proud, wiolent, and disordered passions arising within our heart, in50 ducing in the stead of them a peaceable calme and tranquillitie. These speeches of Ariston no man there, would crosse or contradict; for that it was well known he spake merily: but I willed him to take the cup in hand, and as if he held the harpe or lute, to tune and set the same, to that accord and consonance which he so highly praised, and thought so good. Then came a boy close unto him, and powred out strong wine; which herefused, saying, (and that with a laughter) That his musicke consisted in reason and speculation, and not in the practise of the instrument. But my father added thus much moreover to that which had beene said: That as hee thought, the auncient poets also had to great reason seigned; that whereas Jupiter had two nurses, to wit, Ida and Adrastia; Juno one, namely, Euboca; Apollo likewise twaine, that is to fay, Alethia, and Corythalia; Bacchus had many more; for that he was fuckled and nurfed by many nymphes, because this god forsooth had need of more measures of water, signified by the nymphs to make him more tame, gentle, wittie, and wife.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that any killed slesh will be naught and corrupt sooner under the raies of she moone, than in the sunne?

Nthydemus of Sumium, feasted us upon a time at his house, and set before us a wilde bore, of fuch bigneffe, that all wee at the table woondred thereat; but he told us that there was another brought unto him farre greater; mary naught it was, and corrupted in the cariage, by the beames of the moone-thine: whereof he made greatdoubt and question, how it should come to passe; for that he could not conceive, nor see any reason, but that the sunne should rather corrupt flesh, being as it was, farre hotter than the moone. Then Sayrus: This is not the thing (quoth he) whereat a man should marvell much in this case; but rather at that which hunters practife; for when they have strucken downe either a wilde bore, or a stagge, and are to fend it farre into the citie, they use to drive a spike or great naile of brasse into the body, as a preservative against putrefaction. Now when supper was done, Enthydemus calling to minde his 20 former question, was in hand withall againe, and set it now on foot: And then Mosehion the physician shewed unto them, that the puttrefaction of sless was a kinde of eliquation and running all to moisture; for that corruption bringeth it unto a certeine humiditie, fo as whatfoever is sappie or corrupted, becommeth more moist than it was before: Now it is well knowen (quoth he) that all heat which is mild and gentle, doth ftirre, dilate, and spred the humours in the flesh: but contrariwise, if the same be ardent, fierie, and burning, it doth attenuate and restreine them: by which appeareth evidently the cause of that which is in question; for the moone gently warming bodies, doth by confequence moisten the same; whereas the sunne by his extreme heat catcheth up and confumeth rather that humiditie which was in them: unto which Archilocus the poet alludeth like a naturall philosopher when he said:

I hope, the dogge starre Sirius, In firie heat fo furious With raics most ardent will them smite, And numbers of them dry up quite.

And Homer more plainly spake of Hellor, over whose body lying along dead: Apollo (quoth he) displaied and spreda darke and shadowy cloud:

For feare lest that the scorching beames, of sunnealoft in skie, Should on his corps have power, the flesh and nervesto parch and dry. Contrariwife, that the moone cafteth weaker and more feebler raies; the poet I'm the weth, faying:

The grapes doe finde no helpe by thee, to ripen on the vine, And never change their colour blacke, that they might make good wine. Thele words thus passed : And then all the rest (quoth I) is very well said, & I approove thereof; but that al the matter should lie in the quantity of heat, more or leffe cofidering the season, I see not how it should stand; for this we find, that the sunne doth heat lesse in winter, & corrupteth more in lummer: whereas we should see contrary effects, if putrefactions were occasioned by 50 the imbecillity of hear, but now it is far otherwise, for the more that the suns heat is augmented, the fooner doth it puttifie & corrupt any flesh killed: and therefore we may as wel inferresthat it is not for default of heat, nor by any imbecillitie thereof; that the moone causeth dead bodies to putrifie, but we are to referre that effect to some secret propertie of the influence proceeding from her: for that all kinds of heat have but one qualitie, and the fame differing onely in degree, according to more or leffe: that the very fire also hath many divers faculties, and those not resembling one another, appeareth by daily & ordinary experiences: for gold smiths mele and worke their gold with the flame of light straw and chaffe: physicians doe gently warme (as it were) in Balneo those drougues, and medicines which they are to boile together most all with a fire made of vine cuttings; for the melting, working, blowing, and forming of glaffe, it feemeth that a fire made of Tamarix is more meet than of any other matter what-foever; the heat caused by olive tree wood, serveth well in drie stouphs or hot houses, and disposeth mens bodies to sweat; but the same is most hurtfull to baines and baths; for if it bee burned under a furnace, it hurreth the boord floores and feelings; it matrethalfo the verie foundations and ground-workes: whereupon it commeth, that Aediles for the State, fuch as have any skill and understanding, when they let to ferme the publicke baines 10 unto Publicans and Fermers, except ordinarily olive-tree wood, forbidding exprelly, those that rent them at their hands, not to use the same; as also not to cast anto the surnace or fire with which they give an heat unto them, the feed of Darnella for that the finoaks and fumes which arifeth from fuch matters, ingender head-ach and heaviveffe of the braine, together with a dizzineffe and swimming in the head, in as many as wash or bathe in them, And therefore, no marvell it is, that there should be such a difference betweene the heat of the sunne and of the moone, confiderig that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other by her power dissolveth humors, and in some bodies (by that meanes) causeth rhewines: and therefore discreet and carefull nourfes take great heed how they expose their sucking babes against the raies of the moone, for that fuch infants (being full of moisture, like to sappy-greene wood) will (as it 20 were) warpe, twine, and cast at-one side by that meanes. And an ordinary thing it is to be seene, that who loever fleepe in the moone-fhine, be hardly awakened, as if their fenfes were flupefied, benummed, and attonied: for furely, the humors (being diffolved and dilated by the influence of the moone) doe make bodies heavie. Moreover, it is faid, that the "full-moone (by relaxing " drynlams, and refolving humors in this wife) helpeth women in travell of child-bearing, to easie delive- as some nucrrance. Whereupon, in my judgement, Diana, which is nothing els but the very moone, is cal-presis. led Lochia or Ilithria, as having a speciall hand in the birth of children; which Timotheus directly tellifieth in these verses:

Thorow azure skie, with farres befet, by moone that giveth freed Of child birth, and doth eafe the paine of women, in their need.

Moreover, the moone sheweth her power most evidently even in those bodies, which have neither sense nor lively breath; for carpenters reject the timber of trees fallen in the ful-moone, as being foft and tender, subject also to the worme and putrifaction, and that quickly, by reason of exceffive moisture; husbandmen likewife, make haste to gather up their wheat and other graine from the threshing sloore, in the wane of the moone, and toward the end of the moneth, that being hardened thus with drinesse, the heape in the garner may keepe the better from being fultie, and continue the longer; whereas corne which is inned and laied up at the full of the moone, by reason of the softmesse and over-much moisture, of all other, dothimost cracke and 40 burit. It is commonly faid also, that if a leaven be laied in the full-moone, the paste will rise and take leaven better; for although it have but a little leaven, & leffe in quantitie than ordinary, yet it faileth not by the sharpnesse thereof (by meanes of rarefaction) to make the whole masse and lumpe of dow to fwell and be leavened.

To returne now unto flesh that is caught, and beginneth to putrifie, it is occasioned by nothing els but this, that the spirit which mainteineth and knitteth the same fast, turneth into moiflure, and so by that meanes, it becommeth over-tender, loose, and apt to runne to water: an accident, which wee may observe in the very aire, which resolveth more in the full of the moone, than at any other time, yea, and yeeldeth greater flore of dewes: which the poet Aleman figurefieth anigmatically and covertly unto us, when he faith in one place, that dewis the daughter

50 of the aire and the moone; for these be his words:

What things on earth, the dew as nour se doth feed, Whom Jupiter and moone betwixt them breed.

Thus evident relitimonies we have from all parts, that the light of the moone is waterish, and hath a certeine propertie to liquifie, and by consequence, to corrupt and puttifie.

As for the brasen spike or naile above mentioned, if it be true (as some hold and say) that being driven into the body, it preserveth the flesh for a time from rottenhead and putrifaction: it feemeth to worke this effect, by a certeine aftrictive qualitie and vertue that it hath; for the

* I suppose Homer uled the words in a farre other fenfe, by Mof. chions leave be it fpoken, who was a better phyli-flower of braffe, called Ver-de gris, physicians doe use in their aftringent medicines : and by report, those that frequent mines, out of which brasse-ore is digged, finde much helpe thereby for bleered and rheumaticke eies; yea, and some thereby have recovered the haire of their eie-lids. after they were shed and fallen off: for the small scales or fine powder in maner of flowre, which commeth and falleth from the braffe-stone Chakitia, getting closely into the cie-lids, staieth the rhewme, and represses the flux of weeping and waterie eies : and thereupon it is faid, that the poet Homer hath given thefe attributes and epithites unto braffe, calling it * dinoga and rues me, Befides, Ariftothe faith, that the wounds inflicted by speares and lances with brasen heads . by fwords also made of braffe, are lesse painfull, and be sooner healed, than those which are given by the fame weapons of iron and fleele; for that braffe hath a kinde of medicinable vertue in it. 10 which the faid weapons doe leave behinde them immediatly in the wounds. Moreover, that aftringent things be contrary unto those that putrifie , and that preservatives or healing matters. have an opposit facultie to such as cause corruption, it is very plaine and evident; so that the reason is manifest of the said operation : unlesse haply some one will alledge, that the brasen folke or naile in piercing thorow the flesh, draweth unto it the humours thereof, considering that there is evermore a flux in that part which is hurt and wronged. Over and besides, it is said, that there appeareth alwaies some marke or spot, blacke and blew, about that very place of the flesh, bewraying (as it were) some mortification; a probable argument, that all the rest remaineth found and entire, when the corruption runneth and floweth thither as it doth.

The Proeme.

Olybins in times past (& Sossius Senecio) gave unto Scipio Africane this good advertisement : Never to depart out of the market or common place, where citizens daily affembled about their affaires, untill he had gotten one new friend or other, more than he had before: Where you must understand this name of friend, not precifely as the Stoicks doe, nor after the fubtile acceptation of the world, according to curious Sophysters; namely, for him that continueth firme, falt for ever and immutable; but after a civill and vulgarmaner, for a wel Willer, as Die archus meant, when he faid: That we ought to make all men our well-willers, but honest men onely our friends: for furely, this true triendflip and amitie can not be gotten and purchased, but in long time, and by vertue; where is that good will of tivill perforts may be gained by affaires and 20 dealings one with another, by conference and convertion, and other whiles; by playing and gaming together; mainely, when opportunities time and place meters therewith, which helpeth not a little to the winning of humane affection and favour among men. But confider now, whether that leffon and precept of Polybous may be fitted, not onely to the market and common place aforefaid, but alfo to a fealt or banquet; namely, Thara man ought never to rife from the table, nor to depart from the company met at a feast, before he know, that he hath acquired the love and good affection of fome one of those there affembled; and so much the rather, because men repaire ordinarie to the publike place of the citie about other negotiations and bufineffe; but to a feast, wife and discreet persons come as much to get new friends, as to do pleasure unto those whom they have already and therefore (as it were) a base, absurd and illiberall part, to 30 feeme to carry away from a feaft or banquet any thing whatfoever; fo to goe from thence with more friends than he brought thither at his entrance, is a delectable, honest and honourable thing: like as on the contrary fide; he that is negligent and careleffe in this behalfe, maketh that meeting and fellowship unpleafant and unprofitable unto himselfe, and so he goes his way as one that had supped with his bellie, and not with his minde and spirit; for he that commeth as a guest to supper among others; commeth not onely to take his part with them, of bread, wine, meats and junkets, but to communicate also in their discourses in their learning, yea, and their pleasant courtesie, tending all in the end, to good will and amitie. For wreftlers to catch and take fast hold one of another, had need of dust strewed upon their hands; but wine at the table, especially when it is accompanied with good talke, is that which giveth meanes to lay holde up-40 on friends, and to knit them together. For * speech doth transfuse and derive by discourse and * 2006, rather communication, as it were, by conduits and pipes, courtesse and humanity, from the bodie to dies, wine, the mind; for otherwise, dispersed it is, and wandreth all over the bodie, and doth no other good at all, but onely fill and fatisfic the faine. And like as marble taketh from iron red-hot, the fluxible moifture, by cooling it, and maketh that formerfe to become hard and fliffe, whereby it is more apt to receive the impression of any forme received; even so honest discourse and talke ac the table, fuffereth not the guests that are eating and drinking together, to run endlong still, and be carried away with the ftrength of wine; but ftaieth them; and caufeth their mirth and jollitie (proceeding from their liberall drinking) to be well tempered, lovely, well beforming, yea, and apt to be fealed (as it were) with the fignet of amity and friendship, if a manknow with 50 dexteritie, how to handle and manage men, when they are thus made foft and tender, yea, and capable of any impression, through kinde heat, by the meanes of wine and good cheere, whereof we went to the city Hyampolis. Philon the physician invited us, who (as it should seeme) had made great preparation of good cheere, to enterteine us magnificently; and seeing with Philinus a yoong lad his sonne, seeding heartily upon drie bread without calling for any other meat to it, tooke occasion to breake out into this admiration: O Hercules, now surely here is the common proverbe verified indeed!

and therewith he leapt forth, and ran into the kitchin to fetch some good victuals for them: and after he had staied a pretie while away, he came againe and brought nothing with him, but a few drie figs and some cheese; which when I saw : This is (quoth I) the ordinary fashion of those, 10 who having made provision of rare and exquisit things, which also be costly and sumptuous, do neglect those which be good and necessarie, whereof afterwards, they finde a misse and want. Inever remembred (quoth Philon) that our Philinus heere, feemeth to feed after the maner of * Softratus, who never (by report) did eat or drinke any thing, all his lifetime, but onely milke: but as for him, very like it is that upon some change of minde, he began this maner of dier, and that he had not alwaies lived fo; but this Philinus here, like another Chiron, feedeth his fonnet like as schilles was brought up from his very infancie) with fuch meats as have no bloud in them, that is to favor the fruits of the earth. And thinke you not, that by this certeine demonstration, he verifieth that which is written of the grashoppers; namely, that they live of the aire and dewe I never thought upon a supper (quoth Philinus) or a feast of an hudred beasts killed for facrifice, 20 as they were when Aristomenes feasted his friends; for otherwise, I would have come from home well provided before hand of fimple viands, which be holfome and healthfull, as prefervatives hanging about our necks, against these sumptuous, surfetous & feaverous feasts; for that I have heard many times physicians say: That simple viands are easier of digestion, than varietie of meats, like as they be also readier at hand, and sooner provided. Then Marcion directing his speech unto Philo: This Philinus heere (quoth he) marres all your provision of good cheere, frighting as he doth your guests, and (what lies in him) withdrawing them from eating thereof: but if you will request me, I shall answer in your behalfe, I will pawne my selfealso and be their warrant, yea and proove unto them afterwards, that the divertitie of meats is more eafie to bee concocted and digested, than their simplicitie and uniformitie, to the end that they may in the meane time be the bolder and better affured to fall unto their victuals, & make merry with that plentifull fare that you have ordeined for us: Then Philo entreated Marcion fo to doc.

Now after that we had supped, we called upon Philinus to set in hand with the accusation of this multiplicitie of fundry and divers viands: Why (quoth he againe) I am not the author of this position; neither is it I that have said so; but this good host of ours Philo heere, who evermore tellethus: First and formost, that those beasts which seede upon a simple kinde of meat, and the fame alwaies one, live more healthie than men; whereas they that be kept up and crammed in coupes, cages, mewes, & bartons, or otherwise franke-fed & fatted, are in greater danger to fall into diseases, & more subject to crudities, for that their meat is set before them mingled, compounded, and in some fort delicately condited. Secondly, there was never yet any physici-40 an so bold and venterous in making new experiments, who durst offer unto his patient sicke of an ague, any meat or nourishment so compounded of divers sorts; but ordefined there is for them alwaies the simplest that can be had, & least smelling of the kitchin and cooks crast; as that which is most easie to be concocted in the stomacke : for in truth our meats should suffer alteration, and be wrought by the naturall faculties within us: and like as the colours which are most fimple doe strike the deepest die, and give the best tincture; and among oiles that which hath no fent at all taketh best the aromaticall drougues and odors of the perfumes, and sooner turneth or chaungeth than any other; even so the simplest nourishment is that, which most easily is altered and concocted by the vertue digestive: whereas if there be many and fundry qualities, and those of a contrary operation, they corrupt soonest, for that they fight and runne one a- 50 gainst the other, and so hinder concoction; much like as in a citie, the confused multitude of many nations hudled together from all parts, hardly will ever grow to any agreement, & confiftence well united and accordant; for that ech partie leaneth to their owne rites, striveth to draw all to their owne commoditie, and followeth their private affections against others, hardly or never agreeing and framing well with strangers. Moreover, we may have a most evident and infallible argument of this by the familiar example of wine, for nothing there is that fo doth inebriate, as varietie and change of wines; and it feemeth that drunkennesse is nothing els

but the indigestion of wine: and therefore our great professed drinkers avoidall that ever they can, mixt and brewed wines; yea & they that are the brewers and minglers thereof, doe it as fecretly as it is possible; like to those that lie in ambush: for furely every change brings with it inequallity, and a kinde of extafie, putting all out of frame; which is the cause likewise that muficians are very wary how they stirre or strike many strings together, & yet there is no other harme at all to be suspected but the mixture and varietie. This I dare be bold to affirme, that a man will fooner believe &confent to a thing where contrary reasons be alledged, than make good concoction, and digettion of divers and fundry faculties: but because I would not bee thought to speake in jest, leaving these prooves, I will come to the reasons of Philo: for wee to have heard him oftentimes say: That it is the quality of the meat that causeth difficultie of digestion, and that the mixture of many things is pernicious, and engendreth strange accidents: and therefore we ought to take knowledge by experience, what is friendly and agreeable to nature, that we may use the same, and rest contented therein; and if peradventure there bee nothing of the owne nature hard to be concocted, but that it is the quantitie alone that troubleth and hurteth our stomacke, and there corrupteth, so much the rather in mine advice we ought to forbeare divers forts of viands, wherewith Philoes cooke exercising his art cleane contrarie to his mafters, hatheven now empoisoned and bewitched us, by diversifying our appetite and by novelties and change, not fuffring it to bee wearie, and to refuse any thing, feeding it still with one thing after another, and causing it by this varietie to passe the bonds of contentment 20 in reason; much like unto the foster-father of lady Hypspyle:

Who being set in meddow gay, Flower after slower did erop away: And yet his minde so childish was, And in de sive so for re did passe, That bootie none would him content, Vntill the slowers most part off went.

In this case therefore it were good withall to remember the wise instruction of Socrates, who giveth us counsell to take heed and beware of those viands which draw men on to ear, when they are not hungry, wherein his meaning was this and none other; that we should avoid and seare the diversitie and pluralitie of meats: for this is it that cause thus to exceed the bounds of suffifiance, farther than needfull is, and reteineth our pleasure in things that content the cie and the care, in venereous matters, in plaies, games, and all kindes of sport, being continually refreshed and renewed still with a singularitie and superfluitie that hash many heads: whereas in simple and uniforme pleasures, the attractive delight never exceedeth the necessitie of nature. To be short, of this minde I am: That a man would better endure a musician, who commended a confusion of many strings discordant; or a master of wrestlers who praised the annointing of bodies for exercise, with sweet oiles and persumed ointments; than a phystrian who recommended this multiplicitie and varietie of viands; for surely such alterations and changes from one dish to another, must needs force and drive us out of the right way to health.

After that Philinus had thus faid: I am of this minde (quoth Marcion) that not onely they who disjoine and fever profit from honestie, incurre the malediction of Socrates, but also those who diftinguish pleasure and health a funder, as if pleasure for sooth were repugnant, or an enimic unto it, and not rather a friend and companion thereof: for feldome and even against our wils (quoth he) doe we make any use of paine, as being an instrument too boisterous and violent, whereas no man, would he never so faine, can chase pleasures away, and banish them, but they will prefent themselves alwaies in our feeding, in sleeping, in washing, bathing, sweating, and annointing our bodies; they enterteine, foster, and cherish him that is over-travailed and wearie, putting away quite by a certeine familiar propertie, agreeable unto nature, whatfo-50 ever is strange and offensive: for what manner of paine, what want, what poison is there how ftrong foever it be, that riddeth or dispatcheth a maladie so soone or so presently, as the bath in due time; or wine given to those that have need, and when their heart doth faint? Our meat going downe into the stomacke merily, and with pleasure, dissolveth incontinently all wambles, reducing and restoring nature againe into her owne estate; as if faire weather and a calme season were come againe; whereas on the contrarie fide, the fuccors and remedies which are procured by dolorous and painful meanes, by little and little, hardly & with much adoo are brought about and effected, even with wrong and injurie offered unto nature: let not Philinus therefore set himselfe in opposition against us, in case we doe not hoise up and spred all our sailes to flie away from pleasures: but endevour and studie wee rather to draw delight and health together, for to make a marriage betweene them, for which we have more reason than some philofophers, to match pleasure with honesty. For first and formos (Philinu) mee thinks in the very entrance of your discourse, that you are greatly deceived; setting downe this supposall for a ground: That brute beafts feed more simply than men, and in that regard live more healthfully; for neither the one nor the other is true: and as for the former, disprooved plainly it is by the testimonic of the goates, of whom the poet Eupolis writeth, who highly commend and praise their pasture, as being mingled, and consisting of the varietie of all plants and herbes; who fing and fay in this manner:

Of Symposiaques.

We feed in plenty everie where upon the plants which earth doth beare; The statty Firre we bark and bruse The Holme likewife with mightie bowe hes; The tender crops of Arbute tree Which beares a frute like Strawberre; Do reeldus foode, andmany mo Which both on hilles and dales do grow; As namly sweet tree Trifolie On which we love to eatedaily; The Juniper with fragrant smell, The Yewghlay greene and leav'd as well; Wilde Olives and fruitfull Lentisk, Which yeelds the hollome gumme Mastick, Ash, Figge-tree, Okes that high doe grow, Ivie, Lings which creepes as low; Whins, Tamarix, Gorfe and Broome, Chaste-tree, Brambles, all and some, Mollein, Longwoort, Asphodell, Ladan shrub that sweet doth smell: Beechtrees, with triangled Mast, Thyme and Sav'ry, be our repalt,

For even these trees, shrubbes, and herbes, heere reckoned up, have no doubt infinit differences in taste, juice, favour, sent, & vertue; and yet there be a number more besides these lest out unnamed. And as for the second point, Homer refuteth it by an evident experience, shewing that murrens and pestilent contagions, seized first upon brute beasts: besides, their short life witneffeth furficiently how difeafed they be, and fubject to many accidents and infirmities; for there is not one of them to speake of, that liveth long, unlesse haply some man will give instance of the raven and the crow, which we know and see to eat much, and to feed of all forts of victuals. Moreover, mee thinks that reasoning from the diet of sicke-persons, you have not 40 gone by a right rule to discerne the meats which be of easie or heavie digestion; for labour and exercise, yea and to cut and chew the meat well, serve much for concoction; but for all that they agree not to those who are in a feaver: furthermore, I suppose, that you seare without just occasion, the repugnance and contrarietie of divers and fundry meats: for fet the case that either nature doth out of different and dislike meats, chuse and take that which is agreeable unto it; the divers nourishment transmitting many and fundry qualities, into the maffe and bulke of the body, distributeth unto every part that which is meet and fit for it: so as that commeth to passe which Empedocles delivered in these verses:

Sweet will to sweet, and therewith loves to joine; The bitter runnes to that which bitter is; Looke what is (harpe with fharpe doth well combine, With faltish parts falt forteth not amisse.

This goeth one way, and that another, ech one to that which is sutable thereto, after that the mixture by the heat which is feated in the spirits is dilated and spredabroad, the like alwaies follow their owne kinde: for a body mingled and compounded of fo many things affembled together as ours is, by all reason doth contract, enterreine and accomplish the temperature thereof by varietie of matter, rather than by a simple uniformitie thereof; or if it were not so, but that the conconction fo called, be it which hath force to alter and change our viands; yet the fame will both fooner and also better be performed in fundry and divers meats, than in that which is one and fimple: for never will the like receive any paffion or alteration by the like; but contrarietie and repugnancie is that, which fooner turneth and changeth the qualities being enfecbled by the mixture of their contrarie: and if you resolve once (ô Philinus) to condemne all that which is mixed and compounded; do not reproove and revile this Philo heere, for interteining onely his friends at the table with fo costly fare and varietie of deintie dishes? but also, yea and so much the rather, when soever he compoundeth and mixeth those roiall confections, and those cordiall electuaries that be counter-poisons, which Erafistrates was woont to cal: The 10 very hands of the gods; condemne them (I fay) of vanitie, curiofitie, and abfurditie, who confound and mixe together minerals, herbs, theriacall trochifts, made of the parts of venemous ferpents, for the composition of their treacles; yea and in one word, what soever land or sea affoordeth: for by your advice, good it were to abandon al these mixtures, and reduce all physick to plaine ptifans, thinne barley water, cucumber feeds, all fimple, or at the most to oile and water mingled together: yea, but this pluralitie and divertitie of yiands, doth by your faying, ravish, transport, and enchant our appetite as it were, besides it selfe, insomuch as it hath no more mastry of itselfe: I answer my good friend: That the same draweth after it puritie and neatneffe; it maketh a good stomacke; it causeth a sweet breath; and in one word, procureth cheerefulnesse in us, and a disposition both to eat more, and to drinke better: for otherwise 20 why take we not course branne in stead of the fine flower of meale to thicken our pots? or why dreffe wee not and prepare * cives and golden thiftles, as well as wee doe the tender crops and * heads of garden sperage? why reject wee northis odoriferous, fragrant, and delicate wine of ours, to drinke some savage and hedge drinke; ascyder made of apples, even out of the tubbe which refounds with the confort and muficke of gnats and flies round about? for you will fay (I am fure) that an healthfull diet is not the flying and avoiding of pleasure altogether; but rather a moderation and temperature of pleafures, making use of that appetite which is obedient to profit: for like as pilots and mafters of thips have many devices and meanes to escape a blufterous and violent winde when it is a loft, but when the fame is allaied and downe, there is no man able to raife and fet it up againe; even so to withstand the appetite, and to represse the same 30 when it doth exceed, is not so hard and difficult a matter; but to stirre up, to provoke, & corrobrate the same when it is lost, & decaied before due time; or to give an edge unto it, being dull, and faint, is a mastrie indeed, and a piece of worke (my friend, I may fay unto you) not so easily done: whereby it appeares, that the nouriture of divers viands, is better than the fimple food, and that which by reason is alwaies of one fort, doth soone satisfic and give one enough, by how much more easie it is to stay nature, when she is too speedie and hastie, than to set her forward, being weary and drawing behinde: and whereas fome haply there bee, who fay, that repletion and fulneffe is more to be feared and avoided than inanition and emptineffe, that is not true; but rather the contrary: indeed, if repletion and furfet grow to corruption or to fome maladie, it is hurtfull; but emptine ffe (if it bring and breed none other harme els) is of it felfe 4º adverse and contrary to nature. Let these reasons therefore be opposed, as it were, dissonant and founding of a contrary ftring, against those which you(Philinu) have phylosophically discourfed: as for others of you heere, that for faving money, and to spare cost, sticke to falt and *cumin; you are ignorant for want of experience, that varietie is more pleafant, and the *phones. more delectable that athing is, the more agreeable it is to the appetite, (provided alwaies that some reads you shunne excesse and gourmandise) for surely it cleaveth quickly to the body which is desi- water, that rous of it, going, as one would fay before, and ready to meet it halfe-way for to receive it, having beanes the eie-fight to prepare the way: whereas contrariwife, that which is lothfome or not pleafing to the appetite, floteth and wandereth up and downe in the bodie, and findeth no enterteinment, in such fort, as either nature rejecteth it quite, or if she receive it, the same goes against her 50 heart, & she doth it for pure need, and want of other sustenance: now when I speake of diversitie & variety of viands; note thus much and remember, that I meane not these curious works of pa ftry; these exquisit sawces, tarts, and cakes, which go under the name of Aburraca, Canduli,& Caryca; which are but superfluous toics and vanities; for otherwise Plato himselfe alloweth varietie of meats at the table, to these generous and noble-gentlemen his citizens, whom he defcribeth in his common-wealth, when hee fetteth before them, bulbs, fcalions, olives, falade herbes, cheefe, and al manner of deinties that woorth would affoord; and over & above al thefe, he would not defraud not cut feafts (hort of their junckets & banquetting difhes at the end of al-

THE SEGOND QUESTION.

What is the reason of this opinion so generally received, that Mushromes be engendred of thunder? and that those who lie assected are not thought to be smitten with lightning?

T a certeine supper, where we were in the city Elis, Agemachus set before us Mushromes A of an exceeding bigneffe; whereat when the companie feemed to woonder, one who was there present, smiled and said: Certes, these may be seeme well the great thunders that we have lately had within this few daies; by which words he feemed pleasantly to scoffe at this vulgar o- 10 pinion: That Mushromes should breed of thunder. Now some were there, who said: That thunder caused the earth to chinke and open, using the meanes of the aire, as it were a wedge to cleave it, and withall, that they who feeke for Mushromes, by those crevices guesse where they are to be found; whereupon arose this common opinion: That they were engendred of thunder, and not shewed thereby; as if a man should imagine that a showre of raine breedeth snailes, and not rather cause them to creeve foorth and be seene abroad. But Agemachus seemed then in good carnell to confirme the faid received opinion, by experience, praying the company, not to conclude by & by that a thing was incredible, because it was strange and wonderfull: For (quoth hee) there be many other effects of thunder, lightning, and other meteores or celeftial impreffions right admirable; whereof it were very hard, if not altogether impossible, to comprehend 20 the causes and the reasons. For this ridiculous round root called the Bulb, which maketh usso good sport, and is growen into a by-word, little though it be, escapeth not by that meanes from thunder, but because it hath a propertie cleane contrary unto it; like as the figge tree also, and the skin of the feale or fea calfe, and of the beaft Hyena, with whose skinnes, mariners and failers are wont to clothe the ends of their croffe-faile yards, whereupon they hang their failes: gardeners also and good husbandmen, call those showres that fall with thunder, duch that is to fay, good to water their grounds, and so they thinke them to be. In summe, it were great simplicity and meere folly to woonder heereat, confidering that we doe fee before our eies, things more admirable than this, and indeed of all other, most incredible; namely, out of moist clouds, fire to flash, and from the same (soft as they be) so great cracks and horrible claps of thunder: 30 Well, I am (quoth he) in these matters somewhat talkative and full of words, because I would follicit and move you to be more willing to fearch into the cause, for that I meane not to deale hardly otherwise with you, and seeme to presse you every one to lay downe your part toward the paiment for these my great Mushromes. Why (quoth I) Agemachus himselse seemeth in some fort to have pointed with his very finger to the reason hereof; for I assure you, at this present I can not thinke of any one, more probable than this; namely, that together with thunder, there falleth downe many times a certeine genitall water, apt to ingender; and the cause thereof, is heatmingled among: for, that pure, light, & piercing fubstance of the fire, being now converted into lightning, is gone and passed away; but the more weightie, groffe and flatilent part remaining behinde, enwrapped within the cloud, altereth and taketh quite the coldnesse away, and 40 drinketh up the moisture, making it more flateous and windie, in such fort, as by this meanes especially, these raines gently and mildly enter & pierce into plants, trees and herbs, upon which they fall, causing them within a while to thrive in bignesse, and infusing within them a particular temperature and a peculiar difference of juice. As we may observe otherwise, that the dew maketh the graffe to be better feafoned (as it were) and fitter to content the appetite of sheepe and other cattell: yea, and those clouds upon which that reflexion is made, which we call the rain-bow, fill those trees and wood upon which they fall, with a passing sweet and pleasant odor; wherof, the priests of our countrey be not ignorant, but acknowledge as much, calling the same Irissepta, as if the rain bow did rest or settle upon them. Much more probable it is, that when these waters and raines together with their ventosities & heats, occasioned by thunders & light- 50 nings, come to pierce deepe into the earth, it turneth and rolleth round, and by that meanes are ingendred therein fuch like nodolities and knobs, foft and apt to crumble, which we call Mushromes; like as in our bodies there breed and arise certeine flatuous tumors, named Kirnels or Glandules, formed by occasion of I wot not what bloudy humors and heats withal: for a Mushrome seemeth not to be a plant, neither without rain & moisture doth it breed, having no root at all, nor any sprout springing from it, it is wholly entire of it selfe round about, and holding upon nothing, as having the confiftence onely of the earth which hath bene a little altered & changed.

And if you thinke this reason to be but flender, I say unto you more, that the most part of those accidents which follow upon thunder and lightning, are of the like fort; and therefore it is efpecially, that in these effects there is thought to bee a certeine divinitie. Then Dorothew the oratour who was in the companie: Truthitis (quoth he) that you fay, for not onely the vulgar fort of simple and ignorant people are of that opinion, but some also of the philosophers; and for mine owne part I know as much by experience, that the lightning which of late fell upon our house, wrought many strange and woonderfull things: for it emptied our sellers of wine, and never did hurt unto the earthen vessell wherein it was; and whereas there lay a man a sleepe, it flew over him, yea, and flashed upon him, without any harme at all to his person, or sienging so to much as his clothes; but having a certeine belt or pouch wherein were certeine pieces of braffe money, it melted and defaced them all fo confuledly, that a man could not know by the forme or impression, one from another; the man went thereupon to a certeine Pythagorian philosopher, who as happe was fojourned there, and demanded of him what the reason might bee thereof, and what it did prefage & But the philosopher, when hee had cleered and affoiled his minde of scrupulous feare and religion, willed him to ponder and consider of the matter apart by himfelfe, and to pray unto the gods. Theare fay alfo, that not long fince there was a fouldiour at Rome, who keeping the Centinell, upon one of the temples of the citie, channed to have a flath of lightning to fall very neere unto him; which did him no hurt in the world in his body, buronely burnt the latchets of his shoes: and whereas there were certeine small boxes and cru-20 ets offilver within wooden cafes, the filver within was found all melted into a maffe in the bottome, and the wood had no injurie at all, but continued ftill entire and found. But thefe things a man may chuse whether he will believe or no. How beit; this passeth all other miracles, which we all; (Huppole) docknow very well; namely, that the dead bodies of those who have been ekilled by lightning, continue above ground and putrific not: for many there be who will neither burne nor enterre fuch corfes, but cast a trench or banke about, and so let them lie as within a rampar; fo as fuch dead bodies are to be feene alwaies above ground uncorrupt; convincing Clymene in Eurypides of untruth, who speaking of Phaethon said thus:

Beloved mine, but fee where dead be ties;

Invale below, and therewith purifies. 30 And heereupon it is, (as I take it,) that brimftone taketh the name in Greeke Beiov, for the resemblance of that smell which those things yeeld that have beene smitten with lightning, which no doubt have a fierie and piercing fent: and this may bee the reason likewise in my conceit, that dogges and fowles of the aire forbeare to touch any dead bodies, which in this fort are striken from heaven. Thus farre foorth have I laid the first stone for a ground-worke of this cause, as also of the Bay-tree: Now let us intreat him heere to finish and make out the rest, for that he is well acquainted with Mushromes, less haply that befall unto us which sometimes tothe painter Androey des did; for whe he painted the gulfe Seylla, he portraied more naturally & to the life, the fishes all about, than any thing else besides; whereby men judged that hee shewed more affection therein, than cunning of his art, for that naturally he loved to feed upon good fitnes; and even fo fome one might fay; that we have discourfed fo much of Mushromes, the breeding and generation whereof is so doubtfull, as you see, for the pleasure and delight that we take in eating of them. Confidering now that in these points our discourse seemed to carriesome probabilitie, and that everie man was perswaded well enough that the cause and reason thereof was elecresand withall my felfe began to speake and advise, that it was now time as the manner was in comedies, to fet up those engins devised for to counterfet thunder; so to inferre a disputation at the table of lightning; to which motion all the company condescended, but paffing over all other points, very defirous and earnest they were to heare a discourse as touching this one: What the reason might be that men a sleepe be never smitten or blasted with lightning. Now albeit I saw well well enough, that I should gaine no great praise, in touching 30 a cause, whereof the reason was common, yet I beganne to servo it and said: That the fire of lightning was fine and fubtill, as that which tookethe originall and beginning from a most pure, liquid, and facred substance; which if there had beene in it any moisture or terrestrials grosenesse mingled among, the celeritie of motion is such, that it would have purged and cast it foorth: Nothing is smitten with lightning (quoth Democritus) that cannot resist the fire from beaven; and therefore folide bodies, as iron, braffe, filver, and gold, becorrupted and melted therewith, by reason that they hold out, and withstand it: contrariwise, such as bee rare, full of holes, foungious, foft, and lux, lightning quickly pierceth through, and doth them no harme; as for example, clothes or garments, and drie wood; for fuch as is greene will burne, because the moisture within maketh refistance, and so catcheth fire withall. If then it be true, that those who lie afleepe be never ftricken dead with thunder and lightning, furely wee must fearch heere for the cause, and never goe farther; for the bodies of men awake, are stronger, more firme and compact, yea, and able to make more refissance, as having, all their parts full of sbirits, by which ruling, turning, and welding the natural fences and holding them together as it were with an engine, the living creature becommeth ftrong, faft, knit, and uniforme : whereas in fleepe it is flacke, loofe, rare, unequall, foft, and as it were all refolved, by reason that the pores be open, for that the spirit hath forsakon and abandoned them; which is the cause likewife that voices, odors, and favours, paffe through them, unheard and unimelled: for why? that 10 which should relift; and in resistance suffer and take impression, meeteth not with those objects. that are prefented unto it, and least of all, when they pierce with such swiftnesse and subtilities as the fire of lightning doth; for that which of it felfe is leffe firme & strong for to refult offentive things, nature doth defend, fortifie, and furnish with remedies against that which offendeth. by putting before them hard and folide munitions; but looke what things bee of incomparable force, and invincible, they leffe offend and flure that which woeldeth, than that which maketh head and refiftance: adde moreover heereunto, that they who lie a fleepe are leffe affraid, affrighted, or altonied, by occasion whereof and of northing elle, many have died; onely (I say) for feare of death, without any harme at all done unto them : and this is the very cause that shepheards teach their theepe to runne and gather round together, into a troupe when it thun- 20 dreth, for that they which are differred and feathered a funder; for very feate take harme, and cast their young ones in time of thunder: year and an infinit number have been a knowen to lie dead on the ground, by reason of thunder, without any marke or stroke, wound, scorch on burne feene upon them, whose life and soule for very feare hath flowen out of their bodies, like a birde out of a cage: for according as Euripides laith: 19 out 1

The very blast of some great thunder-clap, Hathmany a one strucke stone-dead with a slap.

And forasinuchas otherwise the sense of hearing, is of all others most subject to suffer violent passions, and the searchill frights occasioned by sounds and noises, worke greatest troubles in the minde: against it, the privation of sense is a sure bulwarke and ramparto a man that lieth'a- 30 sleepe; whereas they who are awake, be many times killed with seare of the thing before it commeth: for a fright (to say a trueth) knitting, closing, and compressing the body sast, giveth more strength a great deale to the stroake when it comes, for that it findeth more resistance.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

Why at a wedding or bride-supper, men use to invite more guests, than at other times?

T the wedding of my fonne Autobulus (ô Sossus Senecio) one who came fro Charonea, was with us to folemnize the fealt; & a great nuber there were befides of other honorable perfor ages; which gave unto him occasion for to demand this question: What the cause might be, 40 that ordinarily we invite more guests to such a marriage supper, than to any other feast?considering that even those law-givers who impugned most, the superfluitie and riot of feasts, have precifely & expresly fet downe the number of those persons, whom they would have to be biddenguells to a wedding: For of the ancient philosophers (quoth he) the man that treated of this argument and the cause thereof, to wit, Heeatam of Abdera, hath written nothing in my judgement worth ought, nor to the purpose; for thus he faith: That they who marry wives, bid many persons to their wedding, to the end that many may take knowledge and beare witnesse, that being free borne and of free condition, they take wives likewife of like free birth and condition. For the comicall poets, cleane contrary, mocke and laugh at those, who make proud and sumptuons fealts at their marriage, fetting out the fame with great pompe and magnificence, as if that 50 were no fure bond nor linke to be trufted unto, wherewith they would feeme to knit wedlocke; like as Menander faid to one, who willed the bridegrome to make a ftrong rampar all about, of pois, pannes and platters;

When that is done on every side,

What is all this to your new bride?

But left we inight not feeme to finde fault with others at our pleasure, for that we have nothing of our owne to say, which is the easiest matter in the world, I shewed first and formost, that there was no occasion of feasing, so publike nor so much divulged and celebrated, as marriage : for fay that we factifice unto the gods, or fealt a friend for his farewell when he is to goe a long voiage, or enterteine a traveller and stranger that passeth by our house, or commeth of purpose to vilit us, we may do all without the privitie of kinfefolke & friends: but a nuptiall feast (where the wedding-fong and caroll of Hymenam is chanted aloud; where the torches are to be feene lightburning; where the hauthoies and pipes play merrily and refound; where (as Hamer faith) the very women and maidens stand woondering at their doores, to see and heare) is notoriously knowen and proclaimed to the whole world; in regard whereof, because there is none ignorant of these espousals and festivall solemnities, men being ashamed to leave out any invite general-10 ly, all their kinsefolke, familiar friends and acquaintance, as whom in some fort it doth concerne, and who have an interest in the thing. When we all had approoved this, Theoretaking in hand the question: Surely all this (quoth he) may goe for current, for it carrieth great probabilitie therewith; but you may adde moreover (if you please) thus much: That these marriage feasts are not onely for friends, but also for kinsefolke and allies; for that a whole kindred, race and generation, come to have another new alliance to be incorporated into them: and that which more is, when two houses in this wife be joined together; both he who receiveth the woman, thinketh that hee ought to enterteine and feaft the kindred and friends of him that giveth her; and he who giveth her, likewife taketh himfelfe bound to doe as much reciprocally, by the kinfefolke and friends of the receiver; whereby the feaft and number of them who are bidden, grow-20 eth double. Now forasmuch as many marriage complements, and (to say a trueth) the most part in maner all, are performed at weddings by women, furely where the goodwives be, great reason there is, that of necessitie their husbands also should be welcome for their sakes, and so thereby the companie still doth increase.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether the viands which the fea affoordeth, be more delicate than those of the land?

Alepfor a town in Eubara, where there be baths naturally of hot waters, is a proper feat and I place fitted by nature, for fundry honest pleasures, beautified with many faire houses and lodgings, in such fort, as it is reputed the publike hostelrie of all Greece: and albeit there be great game there, of hunting and hawking, and woonderfull plentic aswell of fowle as other venilon, yet is the market no leffe ferved from the fea, nor their tables leffe furnished with daintie fish; for that indeed along the coast, the sea is very deepe, and the water faire, nourishing an infinit number of excellent fishes. This towne flourisheth more in the mids of Spring, than at any other feafon of the yeere; for much concourfe there is thither at that time, who converse familiarly one with another, feathing mutually, and taking the benefit of that great affluence of victuals, and abundance of all good things; where having nothing els to doe of great importance, they passe the most part of the time in devising and discoursing together of good letters and 40 matters of learning: but when foever Callifration the professiour of rhetoricke is at home, hardly may a man sup any where els but at his house; for, a man so sull of courtesie he is and hospitalitie, that there is no faying of him nay. Now for that willingly he used to bring those together who were learned and professed scholars, his company was so much more pleasant and delectable; for many times he would feeme among other ancient persons of olde time, to imitate Cimon, making his whole and onely pleasure, to feast many in his house, and those from all parts: but most of all, and in maner continually, he followed the example and steps of Celeus, of whom it is written, that he was the first who daily affembled to his house, a number of honourable perfons, and of good marke, which affembly he called Prytanium. The speeches ordinarily at these meetings in Calliftratus his house, was forting well and furable to fuch companie: but one day 50 above the rest, when the table stood furnished with all maner of dishes that a mans heart could with for, it ministred matter and occasion to enquire as touching viands, whether were better, those of the land or those of the sea? And when all others in maner with one accord and voice. commended them which the land did yeeld, as being of fo divers and fundry forts, yea and those innumerable; Polycrates calling Symmachus by name: You fir, (quoth hee) who are (as one would fay) a water-animall, bred and fed within fo many feas, environing round about your facred citie Nicopolis, will not you mainteine and defend your turelar god Neptune? Yes that I will (quoth Symmachue) I heartily pray and beleech you to joine with me in this cause, whom I take for mine adjoint and affiltant; confidering that you enjoy the benefit of the sweetest and most pleasant coast of all the sea. Beginne we then (quoth Polyerates) our discourse with our usuall custome and manner of speech: For like as among so many poets as there be, wee give but one by way of excellencie, simply the name of poet; to wit Homer, for that of all others he is the principall; fo there being in the world many daintie cates, and exquifit viands, yet use of speech hath caried it so, that fish alone, or especially is named by, that is to say, meat, for that indeed it is the chiefe and very best: heereupon it comes, that we call those gluttons that love belly cheere fo well, o to say, and on that they love beefe fo well as Hercules did: who as the poet faith:

Of Sympofiaques

When that he had fedde well of flesh, Dideas greene new figges gasheredfresh.

Neither doe weename fuch an one PIADOURDY, that is to fay, a lover of figges, as Plato was, or einoβοσείω, that is to fay, one that loveth grapes as well, like as Arcesilaus did; but fuch as haunt ordinarily the fifth stalles, and have a quicke eare, to heare the market bell, or listen to the clock, that giveth warning when the fish-market is open: And Demosthenes when hee objected unto Philocrates: That with the money that hee received for betraying his countrey, hee bought whoores, & fishes; reproched the man no doubt for his lecheric and gluttony: and it is pretily faid of Ctesiphon, when as one of these gluttons and bellie-gods, in the court or counsell house cried out: That he should cracke and burst in the middes: Doe not so (quoth hee) my good friend in any case, make us not a bait heere, for to be devoured of fishes: and he that made these little verses:

Thouliv ft of capers as thy meat,

* avbiav, if it

When as of *Sturgeon thou masse cat. What was his meaning thinke you? or what meaneth this common word of the people, when they speake one to another, for to be merry and make good cheere: Come, shall wee to the ftrond or shore to daie? Is it not as much as if they meant; that to suppe by the water side had no fellow for pleasure and delight, as in truth it hath not; for surely their purpose is norto goe unto the shore for the love that they have to see the billowes of the sea, or the gravell stones and fands cast up; why then? because they would eat some good pease potrage there, or make their meales with capers? no forfooth; for who goes thither for that purpose? but it is because they that dwell along the banke by the water-fide, are provided alwaies of foilon and store of good 30 fith, & the same fresh & sweet. Moreover, sea fith carieth an higher price beyond alreason, than other meat that commeth to the market: infomuch as Cato declaming and inveighing openly before the people against the superfluitie and excesse in Rome citie, brake out into this speech, not hyperbolically and over-reaching the truth, but as it was indeed: That a fish at Rome was deerer fold than a fatte oxe : for they fell a little barrell of fifh at fuch an high price, as an hundred oxen would not cost so much, at a solemne sacrifice, where they goe before bores, goates, and other beafts, yea and the strewing of sacred meale. Certes, the best judge of the vertue and strength of medicinable drougues and spices, is the most expert physician; likewise no man is able to well to judge of fong and harmonicall measures, as the best and most experienced musician; and consequently we may inferre, that the meetest judge as touching the goodnesse 40 and deintinesse of meats, is he who loveth them best: for we must not take to arbitrate and determine such a controversie and question as this, Pythagoras or Xenocrates; but rather Amagoras the poet, Philoxenus the sonne of Eryxis, and Androcydes the painter; who being to make a picture for to represent the gulfe Seylla, drew even the fishes about it most emphatically with a kinde of affectionate minde unto them; and in one word, more lively and naturally than all the rest, because he loved fish so well, and fedde upon them with such contentment. Antagoras the poet was upon a time in the campe of king Antigonus, who finding him verie buffe all untied & unbuttoned, in feething of congers in a pan, came close unto him, & rounding him in the care: Sirha, (quoth hee) thinkest thou that Homer thy master, when hee described the 50 noble acts of Agamemnon, was busic about boiling of congers: unto whom Antagoras turned againe, and replying in this wife presently: And thinke you sir (quoth he) that when Agamemnon exploited those brave seats of armes, he went up and downe in his campe spying, peeping, and prying into every corner so bufily as you doe, for to see if he could find one seething aconger? Thus much Polyerates: and to conclude and knit up his speech: For mine owne part (quoth he) this I thought good to fay in the behalfe of fithes, induced thereto as well by the proofe of testimonies as custome and usual speech.

But I (quoth Symmachus) will handle this matter foberly, and in good earnest, going more fubrilly and liker a logician to worke, in this manner: For if that be counted dainty and delicate which seasoneth meat, and give thit the most pleasant taste; we must need s confesse, that fimply to be the best, which mainteineth the appetite, and giveth an edge to the stomacke that continueth longest: like as therefore those philosophers furnamed Elpistiques affirme: That there was nothing that mainteined life, and held bodie and foule longer together than Hope; for that without hope which doth mittigate and allay all travels, it is unpossible to live; even so fowe must needs graunt and yeed, that to keepe and preserve appetite best, without which all other viands be lothfome and odious: but nothing shall you finde of that propertie and effect, To comming out of the earth; but fuch a thing the sea affoordeth, and that is falt, without which nothing to speake of is savorie, nothing toothsome nor to be eaten: for even our very bread is not pleafing to our tafte, if there be no falt within it : which is the reason that Neptune and Ceres be alwaies worshipped together in one temple: In summe, falt is as it were the sauce of sauces, and that which feafoneth all the dainties what loever. And hecreupon it was that those worthies and demi-god princes, who encamped before Troy, and made profession of sparie and fimple diet, as religious votaries, and who cut off all curious superfluitie and excesse, over and above necessarie food, infomuch as they did not eat once of fish; notwithstanding they had a standing legier, hard upon the straights of Hellespont, could not endure to beserved at the table without falt; witneffing thereby, that it is the onely viand which cannot be rejected or 20 left out: for like as colours of necessitie require light; even so all those sapours and juices within meats, have need of falt, to slirre up the fense of taste, and to provoke appetite, otherwise they are but flat, unpleafant to the tongue, and lothfome : for dead carrions (as Hercules faith) would be cast foorth, rather than dung and ordure: and what is the flesh that wee eat, but a dead thing, and part of a dead carcase? but when the strength of salt is put thereto, it is in stead of life. to give a grace and commendable tafte unto it: and this is the reason, that before other food, we take those things that be sharpe and saltish, and in one word, whatsoever do stand most of salts for fuch be allectives of the appetite, which being drawen on, and entifed as with a bait, by the meanes of these vantcurriers and preparatives, it commeth more fresh, and with a better edge. ready to fet upon other meats; whereas, if we should begin with them first, our stomacke would 30 quickely be done and gone: I will yet fay more than fo; namely, that all the kinds of falt, ferve not onely to give a good relish to our meats, but also draw on our drinks, and cause us to make a quarrel to the cup. As for that oinion which Homer talketh of and praifeth for a special dainty to commend drinke, it was more meet indeed for mariners & rowers at the oare, than kings and and princes: but in trueth, those meats that be powdred or corned a little with falt; for that they be favoury in the mouth, give all wines a pleasant verdure to please the taste, and to goe downe the throat merrily; the same make any water potable and delightsome, having besides, no fuch ranke and strong fent, as the onion leaves behinde it. That which more is, such meats doe rarefie other viands, and prepare them for concoction and digeftion, in fuch fort, as falt being eaten, imparteth unto the bodie the delight of a deintie viand, and the might of an holfome

40 medicine. To come now unto other meats, wherewith we are furnished from the sea: besides, that they are passing sweet, they be also of all others most harmlesse; for albeit they be of a stessly substance, yetthey lie not heavie upon the stomacke, they be easily concocted, and soone passe downward : witnesse hereof, our Zeno here, yea and beleeve me, Crato, who so soone as men be ficke or ill at eafe, before all other directions, betake them to fifth diet. Furthermore, it founds eth to good reason, that the sea breedeth and seedeth for us, living creatures, more holsome than any others, by how much they be more exercised, considering that the very aire which duth breathe and fend forth, for the purity and simplicitie thereof is most agreeable unto us. Well faid of you (quoth Lamprias) and fully to the point; howbeir, formewhat will I adde more out of 50 my phylosophicall learning: My grandfather (I remember) was woont ordinarily to say of the Jewes by way of mockerie, that they abiteined from the eating of that flesh, which of all others, deferved most justly to be eaten; even so may we say, that man hath not so great right and reafon to feed upon any viands whatfoever, as those that come out of the sea: for, say that there were no other communion and fellowship betweene us and these land-creatures; yearst least wife, thus much there is, that many of them eat of the fame food with us, draw in the fame aird, wash and drinke as we doe, yea, and otherwhiles we are abashed, and take pity of them, when we kill them for our food, making a lamentable crie as they do: and for that we have made fome of them familiar unto us, infomuch as they can do many things answerable to the education which they had; whereas the fishes in the sea and rivers, are altogether strangers unto us, as being bred, nourished and living in another world; no voice of theirs, no aspect of countenance, nor service at all which either they have done or can doefor us, can exempt them or crave mercy at our hands, for to have their lives saved. For what use should we make of those creatures which we can not keepe alive with us? or what charitable assection can we beare toward them? It he place where we live, is to them no lesse than hell; for no sooner come they into it, but dead they are immediatly.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

Whether it is upon any reverent and religious opinion of fivine, that the Jewes absteine from their stell, or because they detest and abborne them?

Fter these speeches thus passed, some there were, who prepared and addressed themselves A to dispute in opposition against that which had beene said: but Callistratus breaking off and puting by all further disputation of this argument: What thinke you (quoth he) of that byspeech, discharged against the Jewes by Lamprias; namely, that they forbeare to eat of that flesh which deferveth most justly of all others to be eaten? For my part (quoth Polycrates) I thinke it paffing well spoken; but this moreover and besides, troubleth my head, and maketh me doubt, 20 whether this nation, upon any honour or reverent regard of swine, or for meere abomination and hatred of the beaft, doth abiteine from their flesh? as for that which themselves alledge, it resembleth fables and devised tales; unlesse haply they have some other serious and secret reafons, which they are loth to deliver before the face of the world. To fay what I thinke (quoth Callistratus) I am verily perswaded, that the swine is in some honour among them: for admit that it be a foule and ilfavoured beaft, what then ? that it be filthie befides, what of that ? I can not fee that it is more ugly in shape to fee to, or more untoward of nature to be endured, than the bettill, the crocodile, or the cat; which notwithstanding, the Aegyptian priests do honour and reverence as most holy creatures, some in one place and some in others: and as for the hogge, it is faid, that they regard and honour it by way of thankfgiving, as gratefull persons, acknowled- 30 ging a benefit received from that beaft, in that it sheweth them the maner how to til and eare the ground, breaking up the earth, digging and rooting (as he doth) into it with his fnout: and withall, what fay you to this, that he hath shewed the making of a plough-share, which some thinke, thereupon tooke the name with, as derived of the word is, that is to fay, a fwine. And verily, the Aegyptians at this day, fuch as inhabit the low-countrey and the flats along the river Nilm, have no need of other plough than the fwines fnour; for when the river is returned againe within his banks, after he hath watered the plaines & champian field fufficiently, the peafants of the countrey doe no more but follow presently with their seed, and put in all their hogges after it, who partly trampling with their feet, and in part turning up the foft earth with their nofes, cover the feeds which the husbandmen have cast upon the ground. No marvell therefore, if there be 40 fome nations, who in this respect forbeare to eat swines flesh, considering there be other beasts, who for as small matters as these, yea, and some that be meere ridiculous and to be laughed at, have had right great honours done unto them, by barbarous nations: for it is faid, that the Aegyptians make a god of the filly blinde mouse Mygate: and why so ? because darkenesse was before light, and is of greater antiquitie: also they have an opinion, that this creature is ingendred of mice in the fifth generation, or at the fifth time that they breed, and that in the verie change of the moone; also, that the liver of it doth decrease, as the moone is in the wane, and doth decay with her light.

Moreover, they confecrate the lion unto the funne, for that it is the onely foure-footed beaft having crooked clawes, which bringeth forth whelps that can fee: alfo, for that the lion is verie 50 wakefull, and fleepeth paffing little, and whiles he fleepeth, his eies do fhine againe. Moreover, they fee lions heads gaping for the fpouts of their fountaines, because (for footh) the river Nitus bringeth new waters into their fields, and corne-grounds, when the sunne passeth thorow the signe Leoin the Zodiacke: and as for the blackes torke 1bis, which they likewise honor, they say, that when it is first hatched, the weigheth two drammes, that is to say; just as much as the heart of a yoong infant newly borne doth peise; also that of the two legs and the bill stretched foorth one from the other, and resting upon the ground, is made the true proportion of attiangle with three equall fides: And why fhould the Aegyptians be blamed and condemned for forgreat folly and abfurditie, feeing that by report, the very Pythagoreans themselves adored and worthipped a white cocke; and among other sea fitnes they abstenced from the barble and the nettle fish; considering also that the Magicians, who were of the sect of Zoroafires, but noted above all living creatures upon carti the trichin or hedghogge, but hated water-mice; faying: That he should doe best fervice, and most acceptable to the goods, yea and be right blefed and happie himselse, who could kill the greatest number of them.

This giveth me occasion to thinke, that if the Jewes had held twine hatefull, and abominable creatures, they would have killed them, like as the Magicians did the faid mice; whereas 10 contrariwife they are as well forbidden to kill them, as to eat them: and peradventure there is good reason, that as they honour the affe, for that sometime in a great drought he thewed them a place wherein was a fountaine of water; even fo they reverence the fwine, for teaching them how to fowe and till the ground. And verily fome man haply might fay, that this people abfterneth likewife from eating the hare, hating and abhorring the fame, as an impure and uncleane beaft: It is not without some cause (quoth Limprias, taking the word out of his mouth) that they forbcare eating of the hare, for the refemblance that it hath to the afle, whom they myftically doe worship; for the colour of them both is all one; the cares be long and bigge with all; their cies great and thining; in which respects there is a marvellous similitude betweene them, in such fort, that of a great and small beast, there is not to be found such a resemblance 20 againe in any other; unlesse peradventure among other similitudes, they imitate hecrein the Aegyptians, who efteeme the swiftnesse of this beast divine, yea, and the exquisit perfection of fome naturall fenfes, admirable: for the cies of hares be fo vigorous and indefatigable, that they will fleepe open cied, and their hearing fo quicke, that the Aegyptians having them in fuch admiration therefore, when they would figuifie in their Hieroglyphick characters, perfeet hearing, doe paint and pourtrey hares: as for fwines flesh, the Jewes have in great abhomination, for that barbarous nations do of all other difeates abhorre faint Magnus evill, or the white leprofie most, as well for that they suppose, that these maladies may be engendred, by feeding upon their flefh, as also because, looke what persons they do assaile, them they doe cat & confume in the end; and this we doe fee ordinarily, that a fwine under his belly is full of a kind 30 of leprofie, and covered all over with a white fourffe, called Pfora; which infection feemeth to proceed from fome evill habit, and inward corruption within the body, bewraying it felfe in the wife, which must needs impart some evill qualitie to the slesh; for there is not another beast againe, that taketh fuch pleafure in durt and ordure, loving to wallow and welter in the most mirie and stinking places that be, as it doth; unlesse they be such as breed and bee nourished in those places: furthermore, it is faid, that the fight of their cies is so bent and fixed downeward, that they can fee nothing on high, no, nor once fo much as looke up to the skie, unleffe they be cast upon their backs with their feet upward; so that the balles of their eies by this means be turned quite contrary to the course of nature: and verily this beast howsoever otherwise or-40 dinarily it be given to cry and grunt exceeding much, yet if the feet be turned upward (as is before faid) it will be filent and still; so much astonied and amazed it is to see the face of heaven, which it is not woont to doe, and so for feare of some greater harme, it is thought that it giveth over crying: Now if wee may come in with poeticall fables to make up our discourse; it is faid, that faire Adonis was killed by a wilde bore: and Adonis is thought to be no other than Bacehte himselfe; which opinion may be confirmed by many ceremoniall rices, in facrificing, both to the one and the other, which are the very fame : although fome hold that Adonis was the minion whom Bacchus loved, as appeareth by Phanocles the poet, a man well scene in lovematters, in these verses:

outfide of the skinne: to fay nothing of the filthineffe of this beaft, both in feeding and other-

Bacchus who tooke fo great delight The hilles and forrests for to range: Of faire Adonis had once a sight, and him to ravish made it not strange.

Symmachus marvelling at this last speech of his above the rest: How now (quoth he) will you Lamprius indeed insert and transcribe the tutelar god of your country:

Bacchus Imeane surnamed Evius, Who women doth to rage inche:

And

among the fecret ceremonies of the Hebrewes? Or doe you not thinke there is some reason that he is the very fame god whom they love. Then Meragenes: Let Lamprias alone (quoth he) as for my selfe who am an Athenian, I answer & say unto you affuredly, that he and Bacchus are both one: but the most part of the arguments and conjectures which proove it, may not be ut. tered and taught, but unto those who are professed in the absolute religion and confraternitie trietericall, of Bacches in our country: howbeit, that which we are not forbidden to speak among friends, and namely at the table, amidde our cuppes, and when we take pleafure in the gifts and See the blundhelle and benefits of this god, (if it pleafeth the copany) ready I am to deliver; and when they all willed & 10 requested him so to doe: * First and formost (quoth he) the season and whole manner of their these pagans: principall and greatest feast, is altogether proper and convenient unto Bacchus; for that which they call their falt, they celebrate in the very middes and heat of vintage, at what time as they bring tables abroad, and furnish them with all kinds of fruit: they fit under tents or boothes, which are made principally of vine branches and ivie, wrought, twifted, & interlaced one within another; and the even or day before it, they call the feath of tabernacles or pavilions: within a few dates after, they celebrate another feaft, and the fame is not under a figure, and covertly, but openly, and directly in the name of Bacchus: there is a third folemnitie yet among them, named Cradephoria, of carying vine braunches and Thyr fophoria, of bearing javelins dight with ivie, and in that manner enter they into their temple, but what they doe within we know not: 20 howbeit very probable it is, that they performe there certeine Bacchanales or rites in the honor of Bacchus; for they use little trumpets to invocate upon their god, such as the Argives have in their Bacchanale folemnitie; then come others playing upon harpes and lutes, whom they call in their language Levites, a denomination haply derived of Lyerus, the furname of Bacebus, or rather of Evim: It feemeth alfo to me, that their feafts of Sabbats is not altogether difagreeable with Bacchus; for there be many places yet in Greece even at this day, where they call the priests Bacchi, by the name of Sabbi: who in their Bacchanales and ceremoniall sports, estfoones reiterate these voices, Euoi and Sabboi, as appeareth in the oration of the crowne which Demost henes made against Aefelines; as also in the poet Menander. And this name, Sabbat, if a man should fay, it was imposed upon thus fealt of arteris, that is to fay, of the inordinate motion and turbulent agitation of the pricits of Bacchus, it were not altogether abfurd and without reason; for even they themselves tellifie no lesse; for they solemnize and honor the Sabbat with mutuall feathing and inviting one another to drinke wine, untill they be overfeene therewith, undeffe fome great occasion do occurre that hindereth them; and even then, they thinke yet that they must needs taste strong wine. Howbeit, some man may haply say, that these arguments be but bare conjectures and prefumptions, that cary with them fome little probablitie: but verily, that which is done among them, is a forcible & necessarie proofe. First and formost, their high prieft thewing himselfe abroad, and going before with a miter upon his head, at these feasts, arguerh no leffe; who also is clad in a vesture of Stags skinne, wrought richly with golde; arraied befide, in a long robe, downe to his feet, and wearing buskins; befides, there be many little belles pendant round about the border and skirt of his robe, which gingle and ring as he goeth, like 40 as also among us: this maner of resounding they use still in their facrifices, and they surname the nourses of their god, Cholcodryta: and besides, there is a Thyrse or favelet with tabours to be seene expresly printed aloft, against the walles of their temple; all which ceremonies, certeinly can agree to no other god, but unto Bacchus.

Moreover, in none of all their oblations do they offer honic, for that they thinke it marreth and corrupteth wine when it is mingled with it; and yet this was the liquor which they used in olde time, to serve God withall in their libaments; and whereof they dranke untill they were drunke, before the vine-tree was knowen: and even at this day, those barbarous nations, who drinke no wine, use a certeine drinke made of honie, correcting the exceeding sweetnesse there- 50 of with certains tart and auftere roots refembling (in fome fort) the verdure of wine: thefe oblations, the Greeks present unto their gods, and those they call Nephalia and Melesponda, as one would fay, Sober and confected with honie; for that honie hath a natural propertie adverse and contrary unto wine. To conclude, that this is the fame God which they worship, a man may collect by this one argument, which is of no fmall force; namely, that among many puminments which they have, this is the most shamefull and ignominious, when they are forbidden to drinke wine; wo are punished even so long as it pleaseth him to set downe, who is the judge, and hath power to impose the penaltie; and those who are thus punished, * * * *

The end of this discourse is wanting, as also the discussing and deciding of the other five questions proposed in the forefront of this fourth booke.

ding to the life of the bodie, laughing (as it were) and sporting with it in the pleasant affections thereof; and contrariwife, mourning at the heavie passions afflicting it: as if the soule were no other thing, but a very matter apt to take the impression of fundry formes, or a mirror to receive the images and refemblances of those objects which are presented unto the flesh and body for as by many reasons, a man may easily refute the blind and illiberall falsitie of this opinion; so, by this especially; that after the table is taken away, and supper done, men of learning and knowledge incontinently fall to discourse and devise together (as it were) at a banquet, delighting and folicing one another with pleasant talke, wherein the bodie hath no part at all, unleffe it be very little and a farre off: which experience beareth witnesse, that this is the provision of daintie cates, and delicate pleasures laid up peculiarly for the soule; and that these bethe onely de- 10 lights indeed of the minde, whereas those other be but bastards and strangers infected with the focietie of the bodie: like as therefore nurses whiles they give pappes and panades unto their little babes, have some small pleasure in feeding them, by tasting the same in their owne mouthes before; but after they have filled their infants bellies, and brought them a fleepe, fo as they crie no more, then they goe themselves to their owne resection, meet for them, they cate and drinke and make good cheere; even so the soule doth participate with the desires and appetites of the bodie, in manner of a nurse attending upon it, serving it, and framing herselse in some sort to do it pleasure, and satisfic the necessities thereof: but after that the body is sufficiently ferved, laied at reft and repose, then being delivered of her obsequious service and bufinesse about the bodie, the betaketh herselse from thencesorward unto her owne pleasures 20 and delights; making her repast, and taking her folace in discourses of learning, in good letters, in sciences and histories, and in seeking to heare somewhat, and know more still of that which is fingular. What should a man fay any more of this? confidering and feeing as he doth, that even base mechanicall and unlettered fellowes, after supper, ordinarily withdraw their minds, and employ the same upon other pleasures and recreations, farre removed from the body, proposing darke riddles ænigmaticall questions, and intricate propositions of names comprised under notes of certeine numbers, hardly to be associated or gested at? and after all this, come in banquets, which make way unto plaiers, jefters, counterfet pleafants, giving roome to Menander, and the actours of his comedies: all which sports and pastimes are not devised for to ease and take away any paine of the body, neyetto procure some gentle moti- 30 on and kinde contentment in the fleth; but onely for that the speculative and studious part of the minde, which naturally is in every one of us, doth demaund & call for some particular pleafure and recreation of her owne, when wee are once discharged of the businesse and offices whereabout we are emploied for the body.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

What is the cause that willingly we heare and see those who counterset them that be angrie, or sorrowfall; but love not to heare or see the parties themselves in those passions?

F fuch matters there passed many discourses, when you were present with us at Athens, at what time as the comedian actor Strato flourished; for hee was then in so great name and reputation, that there was no talke but of him. But one time above the rest, weewere invited and feasted by Boethus the Epicurean, and with us there supped many more of that sect: now after supper, the fresh remembrance of the comedie which we had seene acted, gave occafion unto us, being students and lovers of learning, to fall into a discourse and question about the cause, why we cannot abide but are greatly discotented, to heare the voices of those who are angrie, forrowful, timorous, or affrighted and contrariwife, what the reason is, that they who counterfet these passions, and represent their words, their jestures and behaviour, doe much delight and please us? And verily, all in manner there in place, opined the same, and were in one 50 fong; for they gave this reason and said: Inasmuch as he who counterfeiteth those pastimes, is better than he who suffereth them indeed; & in regard that he who is not affected himselfe, excelleth the other; we knowing so much, take pleasure and are delighted: but I, albeit, that I set foot (as men fay) in the daunce of another, faid thus much: That we being naturally framed for to discourse by reason, and to love things that savour of wit, and be artificially done, affect and esteeme those who have a dexteritie therein, if a thing succeed accordingly: for like as the Bee delighting in sweetnesse, flieth from flower to flower, seeking busily where shee may finde any matter that will affoord substance for hony 3 even so a man by nature ingenious, stirdious also of arts, and elegancie, is woont to cherish, love, and embrace every action, and worke, where he knoweth there was wit and understanding emploied in the finishing of it: if then one come and present unto a yoong childe, a little loase of bread indeed, and withall tender unto him a prety puppie or bulkin, or heighfer made of patte or dough; you shall see that he will run rather to these counterfet devices, than to the other: and even so it is also in other things; for if one offer him a piece of filver in the maffe unwrought; and another tender unto him a little beaft or a cup made of filver, he will much fooner make choife of that which he feeth to have some artificiall workmanship joined with it, and to savour of wit and cunning; and 10 therefore it is, that children at this age take more delight, both to heare fuch covert speeches as shew one thing and meane another; as also those plaies and pastimes which have some wittie matters contrived, or ambiguous difficulties interlaced therein: for that which is fmoothly polished and curiously wrought, draweth and allureth unto it mans nature of the owne accord, as being proper unto it, and familiar, although it be not taught to imbrace it. For a finuch as therefore, hee who is angry or grieved in good earnest, sheweth nothing else but common and ordinary passions; but in representing and counterseiting of the same, there is a certaine dexteritie and subtilitie of wit to be seene, especially if it speed well and take essect; therefore wedelight to behold the one, and are displeased to see the other. For the proofe heerof, marke how we are affected, semblaby in other objects, shewes, and fights, presented unto us: for 20 with griefe and forrow of heart we looke upon those who are either dying or lie grievously sick: contrariwife, with joy we behold, yea and admire either Philottetes painted in a table; or queene Joeasta portraied in brasse; upon whose visage it is said; that the workman tempered a little silver with the braffe, to the end that this mixture of mettals together, might reprefent naturally, and to the life indeed, the face and colour of one ready to faint, and yeeld up the ghoft: And this (quoth I) my masters, (to you I speake who are Epicureans) is an evident argument on the Cyrenaiques fide against you; to proove that in pastimes and sports, presented to the cie and the eare, the pleasure consistest not in seeing or hearing, but in the understanding: for an odious and unpleasant thing it is, to heare a henne keepe a creaking or cackling, and a crow untowardly and untunably crying; and yet hee that can well and naturally counterfet either the 30 cackling of an henne, or the crying of the crow, pleafeth and contenteth us woonderfull well: femblably, to looke upon those who are in prisicke or consumption, is but a lovelesse sight; and yet we joy and take delight to fee the pictures or images of fuch perfons; for that our understanding is pleased and contented with the imitation & resemblance of them, as a thing proper and peculiar unto it: for otherwise, what joy and contentment have men, or what outward occasion have they so much to admire and woonder at Parmenons sow infomuch as it is growen to be a common by-word: This Parmenon was by report, one that counterfeited paffing well, the grunting of an hogge; for which his fingular grace and gift therein, his concurrents upon an envious humour, would needs affay to doe as much in despight of him but men being already forestalled with a prejudicate opinion of him, would say thus: Well done; but 40 nothing to Parmenons hogge: and therefore, one of them having gotten a little porket indeed under his arme, made it for to fqueake and crie; but the people hearing the noise of a swine indeed : All this (fay they) is nothing to Parmenons hog; whereupon the partielet the faid live hog run among them all, for to convince them of their corrupt judgement, caried away with an opinion, and not grounded upon trueth and reason. Whereby it appeareth evidently, that one and the same motion of the sense, doth not affect the minde alike, when there is not an opinion, that the action was performed wittily and with artificiall dexterity.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

That there was inold time a game of prize for poets.

A T the folemnitie of the Pythicke games, there was fome question and talke upon a time, about the cutting off, and putting downe of certeine plaies and pastimes, foisted in, to the others that were ancient and of the first institution: for whereas at the first, there were but three onely that plaied their prizes; to wit, the Pythian plaier of flute or pipe, the harper, and the singer to the harpe: after they had once admitted the actour of tragedies, no sooner was this gare (as one would say) set open, but they were not able to resist and keepe out an infinit number of other plaies and sports, that rushed and thrust themselves in after him: by occasion whereof, there was much varietie and a frequent concourse at this solemnitie, which I must needs say, was no unpleasant sight to beholde: but surely it reteined not the ancient gravity and dignitie befeeming the Mules indeed; for by this meanes, the judges and umpires were much troubled; befides, there grew many quarrels and enmitties, which could not otherwife be 3 for where there are so many contending for the prize, there can not chuse but be a number of mal-contents, that missed the garland. But among all others, it was thought good by the judges, to remoove and banish from the solemnitie, a number of those who penned orations, and all the fort of poets that came thither to verifie for the best game; which they did not (I assure you) for any hatted unto learning and good letters, but for that they who present themselves to these learned com- 10 bats, be ordinarily the most notable persons of all others; the judges before said, reverenced them, and in some fort, pitted their case, esteeming them all worthy men, and well deserving of good letters, howbeit, not able all to gaine the victory. We therefore, being at this councell, labored to dehort those who went about to change and alter setled customes, and who blamed in any of thelefacred games, multiplicity and variety, as if they found fault with many flrings in an instrument, or a confort of voices in vocall musicke. Now, in supper time when we were in Petrem his house, who was the president and governour of the said solemnitie, and courteously had invited us, the question was revived and set on foot a fresh; and we tooke upon us to defend the cause of the Muses, shewing, that poetric was no moderne profession, nor entred but lately among the combats of facted games, but that of ancient time it had won the victorie, and gai- 20 ned the crowne. There were in the company, fome who thought by these words of mine, that I meant to alledge old testimonies, and to cite stale and triviall examples for proofe of the cause; to wit, the funerals of Ocolyeus the Theffalian, and of Amphidamas the Chalcidian, at which, Homer and Hestodus made verses one against another for the victorie, as stories make mention : but casting by and rejecting all these evidences so much tossed and divulged already by Grammarians; and namely, the funerall obsequies and honours done to Patroelus in Homer, where they read not ilustry, that is to fay, launcers of darts, but piluses, that is to fay, makers of orations and eloquent oratours, as if Achilles had proposed rewards and prizes for orations; leaving (Isay) these matters, I affirmed: That when Acastus celebrated the funerals for his father Pelias, he exhibited a combat of poets for the best game, wherein Sibylla went away with the victory, Hereat 30 many flood up, and opposed themselves against me, demanding a reall caution at my hands for to make good that which I had averred, for that it feemed unto them a very strange narration and incredible : but as good hap was, I called to remembrance, that I had read fo much in the Chronicle of Lybia, copiled by Acefander, where the story is put downe: And this booke (quoth I) is not in every mans hand to reade; howbeit, I thinke verily, that the most of you have beene carefull to peruse those records which Polemon the Athenian, a diligent writer and a learned antiquarie, who hath not beene idle and fleepie in feeking out the antiquities and fingularities of Greece, hath fet downe in writing, as concerning the treasures of the city Delphos: for there you shal find written, that in the treasurie of the Sicyonians, there was a golden booke, given and dedicated by Aristomache the poetresse of Erythran, after the had obteined the victorie, & gotten 40 the garland at the folemnitie of the Ishmicke games : Neither have you any reason (quoth I) to effective Olympia, and the games thereof, with fuch admiration above the rest, as if it were another fatall desteny immutable, and which can not be changed nor admit alteration in the plaies there exhibited: as for the Pythian folemnitie, three or foure extraordinarie games it had, respective unto good letters and the Muses, adjoined and admitted to the rest: the Gymnicke exercises and combats performed by men naked, as they were at first ordeined, so they continued for the most part still, and hold on at this day; but at the Olympian games, all, save onely running in the race, were taken up afterwards, and counted as acceffories: likewife, there have bene many of them which at first were instituted, since putdowne and abolished; namely, warm, that is to fay, an exercise and seat of activitie, when the concurrent mounted on horsebacke, in the 50 mids of his course leapeth downe to the ground, taketh his horse by the bridle, and runneth on foot with him a full gallop: as also another, called another, which was a course with a chariot drawen by two mules: moreover, there is taken away now, the coronet ordeined for children that atchieved the victorie in Pentathlus, that is to fay, five feverall feats: to be short, much innovation, change and altering there hath beene in this feltivall folemnitie, from the first institution; but I feate me, that you will call upon me againe for new pledges and cautions, to proove and justifie my words, if I should say, that in olde time at Pifa, there were combats of sword-fencers, fighting at the sharpe to the uttrance, man to man, where they that were vanquithed or yeelded themselves died for it; and if my memorie failed mee that I could not bring out mine author, and name him unto you; I doubt, you would laugh and make a game of mee, as it had overdrunke my felfe, and taken one cup to many.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the cause that the pitch-tree is held consecrated unto Neptune and Bacchus: And that in the beginning the wictours at the 1sthmian games were crowned with a garland of fine-taken in the tree branches, but afterwards with a chaplet of smallage or payley, and now of late, with processed in the forefaid puch-tree?

Here was a question propounded upon a time: Why the manner was to crowne those therm has with pine or pitch-tree branches, who gained the prize at the Isthmick games? For so it this be united was, that during the faid festivall solemnity, Lucanius the high priest made a support at Corinib, slood of the at his owne house, and seasted us: where Praxiteles the geometrician, a great discourser, told us pure a poeticall tale, and namely; that the body of Melicerta was found call up, & driven upon the body of a pine-tree, by the fea at a full tide; for that there was a place not farre from Megana, named Cales Dromos, that is to fay, the race of the faire lady; whereas the Megarians doc re-20 port, that dame Ino carrying her young babe within her armes, ranne and cast her selfe headlong into the lea: But it is a common received opinion (quoth he) that the pine is apropriat for the making of coronets, in the honour of Neptune: whereupon when as Lucanius the highpriest added moreover and said: That the said tree being confecrated unto Bacchus, it was no marvell nor abfurditie if it were dedicated also to the honour of Melicerta. Occasion was taken to fearch into the cause; wherefore the auncients in old time held the said tree facred unto B.cchus and Meptune both? For mine owne part I faw no incongruitie therein; for that thele two gods be the lords and rulers over one generall principle, or element, to wit, humidity or moiflure, confidering also that they generally in manner all, sacrifice unto Neptune, under the surname ευτάλμιος, as one would fay, protectour of plants; and unto Bacchus likewife, by the name 30 or addition Associates, that is to fay, the prefident over trees : and yet it may be faid, that the pine more particularly appertenenth not to Neptune; not as Apollodorus is of opinion, because it is a tree that loveth to grow by the fea-fide, or for that it delighteth in the windes as the fea doth: (for some there be of this minde) but especially in this regard; that it affoordeth good timber, and other stuffe for building of ships; for both it, and also other trees, which for their affinitie may goe for her fifters, to wit, pitch-trees, larike-trees, and cone-trees, furnish us with their wood, most proper to flote upon the lea, and with their rosin also and pitch, to calke and calfret; without which composition, be the joints never so good and close, they are to no purpose in the sea: as for Bacchus they consecrated the pitch-tree unto him, for that pitch doth give a pleafant feafoning unto wine: for looke where these trees doe naturally grow, the vinc 40 there by report yeeldeth pleafant wine; which Theophrastus imputeth to the heat of the foile; for commonly the pitch tree groweth in places of marle or white clay, which by nature is hot, and fo by confequence helpeth the concoction of wine; like as fuch kinds of clay yeeldeth water, of all others most light and sweet : besides, if the same be blended with wheat, it maketh the greater heape, for that the heat thereof doth cause it to swell, and become more full and tender: moreover the vine receiveth many commodities and pleafures more from the pitchtree, for that it, with those things which be, is good & necessarie, both to commend and also to preserve wines; for it is an ordinary thing with all men, to pitch those vessels into which they put up their wines, yea, and some there be who put rosin even into the wine: as for example, those of Eubaa in Greece, and Italy, the inhabitants by the Po fide; and that which more is, from out of 50 Gaule by Vienna, there is brought a certeine pitch wine, called Pifites, which the Romanes fet much store by, because it giveth it not onely a delectable sent, but also a better strength, taking from it in a small time the newnesse and the watery substance thereof, by the meanes of a milde and kinde heat. This being faied, there was an oratour there, a man of great reading a fingular scholar, and an excellent humanitian, who cried out in this manner: And is it so indeed? as who would fay, it were not very lately, and but the other day, that the pine tree yeelded garlands and chaplets at the Ishmian games? for heeretofore the victors there, were crowned with wreathes wreathes and coronets made of smalach leaves: and this appeareth by that which we may heare out of acerteine comedie, a covetous miser speake in this wise:

Thefe Isthmique games I gladly would part fro,

For price that (mallach wreaths in market go. And Timeus the historiographer writethy that when the Corinthians marched in battell ray under the conduct of Timoleon against the Carthaginians, for the defence of Sicily, they encountred in the way certeine folk, who carried bunches of finallach: now when many of the fouldiors tooke this occurrence for an ill prefage (because smallach is taken to be an unluckie herbe; infomuch as when we see one lie extreame sicke, & in danger of death, we say: That he hathneed of nothing elfe but finallach) Timoleon willed them to be of good cheere, and put them in minde 10 of the victorious chaplets of smallach at the Ishmian games, wherewith the Corinthians crowaed the winners, Moreover the admirall galley of king Antigonus was called Isthura, for that without any fowing or fetting, there grew imaliach of it felfe about the poupe thereof: and this obscure & anigmaticall epigram under darke and covert words, significth plainly, earthen veffeis stuffed and stopped with smallach: and in this manner it goeth:

This Argive earth which ere while was full foft, Now bakedhard with fire, the bloud deepe-red Of Bacchus hides within, but loe alofs, It Istmick branches beares in mouth and head.

Certes, they have not read thus much, who vaunt fo greatly of the Pitch-tree chaplet, asifit 20 were not a moderne stranger and new commer, but the ancient, proper, and naturall garland, belonging to the Ithmian games. Which words of his, mooved the yoonger fort not a little, as being delivered by a man who had feene and read much; and Lucanius the high-prieft himfelfe, calling his cic upon me, and imiling withall : Now by Neptune (quoth he) I fweare, what a deale of learning is heere! howbeit, others there were, who bearing themselves (as it should feeme) upon mine ignorance and want of reading, were perswaded of the contrary, and avouched, that the Pitch-tree branches were the ancient garlands in the Ishmicke folemnitie, as naturall unto that countrey; and on the other fide, the coronet of Smallach was a meere stranger, brought from Nemea thither upon an emulation, in regard of Hercules, whereby it had indeed the name, for a time; infomuch as it supplanted the other, and woon the credit from it, as being counted a facred herbe, and ordeined for this purpose; but afterwards, the Pine-garland flourifhed againe and recovered the ancient reputation, fo at this day it is in as great honour, as ever it was. Hecreupon I suffered my selse to be perswaded, and gave so good care, that many tostimonies for confirmation of this opinion I learned, yea, and some of them I bare away andremembred; and namely, that out of them, Euphorion the poet, who spake of Melicerta, much after this maner:

The young man dead, they did bewaile, and then his corps they laid Upone greene branches of Pine-tree, whereof the crownes were (and To have beene made, those to adorne with honour glorious, Who as the facred Isthmicke games were deem' d victorious: For why? as yet the murdering hand, fir Charon hadnot flaine, The sonne of Neme, wofull dame, where as with streame amaine Asopus runnes : since when, began the wreathe of Smalach greene, To binde the head of champions, all bravely to be feene.

Also out of Callimachus, who hath expressed this matter more plainly, where he bringeth Hercules in, speaking after this maner:

And it, though much inferiour, and more terrestriall,

Employ they hall in I fibricke games, when in memoriall Of god Acgaon they with crownes the victours brave de deske, According to I emean rises, and thereby give the checke To chaplets made of Pine-tree faire, wherewith the champion For victorie, sometime was dight at games Corinthian.

Over and befides, if I be not deceived, I have light upon a certeine commentarie of Procles, writing of the Isthmian folemnitie; namely, that at the very first institution thereof, ordeined it was: That the victorious coronet should be made of Pitch-tree branches; but afterwards, when these games were accounted facred, they translated thither from the Nemzam solemnities, the chaplet of Smallach: now this Procles was one of the scholars in the Academic, what time as Xenocrates taught and flourished.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What is the meaning of these words in Homer : \Sweetner 3 wegges?

Ome of the companie where I supped upon a time, thought Achilles ridiculous, in that he willed his friend Patroclus* to fill outpurer wine, and leffe delaied, giving a reason withall, *For so he interpreted for

For now are come to vifit me for love, My deerest friends, and whom I best approve.

But Niceratus the Macedonian, a familiar friend of ours, opposed himselfe directly, and said: That (we're, in this place of Homer, fignifieth not meere wine of it felfe, without water, but hot wine, as if the primitive word goedy, were derived sind ris Corner is of Charles, that is to fay, vitall heat 30 and ebullition: And therfore meet it was (quoth he) that (feeing his good friends were in place) there should be filled out for them, a cup of fresh wine, new drawen, and full of life and sparkling spirits; like as we our felves use to do, when as we powre out and offer unto the gods, our facred libations : but Soficles the poet, calling to minde, and alledging a fentence of Empedocles, whose words be these, speaking of the generall mutation of the universall world, faid: That the philosopher meant by the word (ver), as much as we carry, that is to fay, well tempered: Neither fee I (quoth he) any thing to the contrary, but that Achilles might bid Patroclus to prepare and dreffe a cuppe of wine, fo tempered as it should be drunke : neither must you 40 thinke it a strange phrase or maner of speech, if he said, so or ear for so is for we are wont likewife, to put and of sinh ; as also Agreed for Agion : for received now it is, by ordinatic custome, to use the comparatives of some words for the positives. Then Antipater, a friend of ours there present, said: That in olde time they were woont to call the yeere by the name of ages, and [(a] in composition with other words, fignifieth as much as the greatnesse of a thing, so that olde wine, that had lien many yeeres in this place, Achilles called Coefficer. As for my felte, I inferred thus much and put them in mind: That fome thinke Confregor fignfieth [hotter.] and by hotter, the meane quicker, fooner, or with more speed; for in that sense other-whiles we bid our fervants to bestirre themselves more horly about their worke, meaning they should make more hafte, and dispatch their businesse. But in the end, I declared unto them, that their disputation 50 and arguing about this point, was but childish, in case they were afraid to confesse, that Gueirreev betokened that which was more pure and of it felfe, without tempering or delaying; as if (forfooth) Achilles had committed here, fome incongruitie or abfurditie, as Zoilus the Amphipolitane would feeme to tax him; who confidered not first and formost: that Achilles law Phenix and tilyffes, two ancient personages, who tooke no great pleasure to have much water in their wine, no more than all other olde men, who love to drinke it meere and pure; in regard of whose age, he gave commandement to delay it leffe for them: againe, having beene (as he was) the scholar of Chiron, and learned of him, the regiment of health, as one not ignorant what dier was meet for mens bodies, he thought thus with himfelfe, that those bodies which are at repose and ease, having beforetime beene used to travell, required a more remisse, for and tender temperature, as that which is fitter and meeter for them; for so he caused among other forrage and provender, his horses to be served with smallach; for that seedes standing idle in the stable, and doing nothing, will be troubled with the paines in their feet; for which infirmitie this smallach is a sovereigner emedie: neither should yee find (and reade the this throughout) that smallach or any such kinde of fodder was given to other horses than to those who shood still, and laboured not. Achilles therefore being well seene in physicke, was both carefull about his horses to provide for them, as the time required, and also consider and respective to his owne body, for to ordeine the lightest diet, (as most holsome) for himselfe who tooke his ease, and was not emploied in bodily exercise; whereas he did not in that manner interteine those personages, who all the day had beene in the field, and performed martiall exploits, and was like service, but who all the day had beene in the field, and performed martiall exploits, and was like service, but who all the greatly loved not wine, stor that he was by nature sower and implacable, appeareth by these verses of the same poet:

For gentle nature he had none,
he was not foone appeas d,
But irefull, fierce, and volent, and once now dhardly pleas d.
And in one place, speaking liberally of himselse, he said:
That many nights he sup no winke,
Of sundry matters he did so thinke.

Now who knoweth not, that short sleepes agree not to those that drinke meere wine, neither will they serve their turne: also when as he contested with Agamemnon, and revised him, at the sirst word hee gave him the tearme Owobases, wine-bibber or drunkard; as if drunkennesse and wine-bibbing were the vice which his heart abhorted most: And therefore to conclude, considering all these circumstances, great reason he had, that seeing right honourable personages were come unto him, and those of good yeeres, he should be well advised to take order, not to temper wine for them, as his manner was for himselfe; because the same had beene too small, and not agreeable for their persons.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

Of those who invite many guests to supper.

Pon my returne from Alexandria, all my friends one after another feafted me, for my welcome home, and to beare me company, they invited with me, as many as they thought, in regard of kindred or friendship, were any way toward me; in such fort, as by reason of the multitude of guests, our meetings were ordinarily more tumultuous, and sooner dissolved than they had woont to be: the disorder therefore of sitting at such feasts, gave us occasion to dis-40 course much of that matter. But Onesserates the physician when hee feasted me in his turne, as others did; bad not very many, but those onely whom he knew to be my speciall friends, and most familiar with me: whereupon I called to minde a sentence written by Plato, as touching a citic, and thought with my felfe, that it might very well be applied unto a feast: for like as a citie which still groweth and augmenteth, in the end becomes no more a citie; for that there is a certeine bigneffe prefixed & limited unto it, which it must not outgrow; even so there is a just, proportion in the greatnesse of a feast, within the which it is still a feast; but if it passe and exceed the fame, (I meane) in the number and multitude of guests, so as they cannot salute and fpeake one to another conveniently, they have no meanes to cheere up and drinke one to another reciprocally, nor exercise their mutuall knowledge kindly; surely it is no more to becal-50 led a feath: for there should not be at a feast, as in a campe, messengers and curriers betweene; nor after the manner of a great galley, speciall servitors, going from one to another, to cheere them up, and bidde them be merie; but the guests ought to speake and talke one with anothers for that a feathmust be disposed after the maner of a daunce, fo as he who fits lowest may heare him that is highest. After I had thus much faid, my grandfather Lamprias began to speake, and that with fo loud a voice and fo strong, that all the companie might heare him: There is then (quoth he) a kinde of meane and moderation, whereof we had need, not onely in eating and drinking at a feat, but also in the bidding and inviting of guefts; for furely there may be an excesse in unmeasurable curtesse and humanitie, when it cannot omit nor leave out any of those with whom a man hecretofore hath seasted or made merrie, but draweth all of them, as if the case were to goe for to see a plate, behold solemne sights, or to heare musicke: and for mine owne part I thinke that the good man of the house, or master of a seast, is not for much woorthy to be blamed or laughed at, for being at a sault of bread or drinke for his guests; as when hee hath not roome enough to place them; of which he ought to make provision with the largest, not onely for those who are formally invited, but also for commers in, and such as bid themselves; for strangers also that passe by :moreover, if there chaunce to be some want of bread or to wine, the sault may be laid upon the servants, as if they had made it away, or plaied the theeves; but if there be no roome lest, it cannot chuse but be imputed to the negligence and indiscretion of him who invited the guests: Hessaue is woonderfully much commended for writing thus:

At first no doubt it was so east, That there might be a Chaos wast.

For in the beginning of the world, requifit is was that thereshould bee a void place for to receive and comprehend all those things that were to be created : Not (quoth hee) as my sonne yesterday made a supper, according to that which Anaxagaras said . All things were hudled and jumbled together pell-mell, confusedly: and admit that there bee place and rooms 20 enough, yea, and provision of meat sufficient, yet neverthelesse, a multitude would be avoided, as a thing that bringeth confusion, and which maketh a focietic unfociable, and a meeting unmeet and not affable: certes, leffe harme it were, and more tolerable a great deale, to take from them who are bidden to our table, their wine, than their communication and felowship of talk; and therefore Theophrastus called (merrily) barbars shops, dry banquets without wine; for the good talke that is betweene a number of persons sitting there one by another: but they who bring a forttogether into one place, thrumbling them one upon another, deprive them of all conference, and discoursing reciprocally, or rather indeed they bring it so to passe, that but verie few can commune & converse together; for by that meanes they for themselves apart, two by two, or three by three, for to have some talke: as for those who are set farder of, hardly they 30 can not differene, no nor know them, being diffant and remooved a funder, as a man would fay the length of an horse race:

Some, where Achilles tents are pight close for to make their stay: And some, where Ajax quarter is, as sarre another way.

Thus you shall see how some richmen heereby, otherwhiles shew their soolish magnificence to no purpose, in building halles, and dyning chambers, conteining thirtie tables a piece in them, yea, and some of greater capacitie than so: and verily this manner of preparation for to make suppers and dinners, is for folke that have no amitte nor societie one with another, when 40 there is more need of some provost of a field to marshal the, than an other of an hall to see good order among them: but these men may in some fort well bee pardoned for doing so; because they thinke their riches no riches, but that it is blinde, deafe, lame also, or shut up, that it cannot get forth, unleffe it have a number of witneffes, like as a tragedie, many spectators; but as for us, this remedie we have of not affembling fo many at once together; namely to bidde often, and to make divers suppers; to invite (Isay) our friends and well-willers at sundrie times, by few at once, and so by this meanes wee may make amends for all, and bring both ends together: for they that feast but seldome, and as they say si appears, that is to say, by the cart loades, areforced to put in the roll all those that any way belong unto them, either by kinred, friendship or acquaintance whatsoever: whereas they who ordinarily picke out three or fower at a 50 time, and doe fo oft, make their feafts as it were little barks, to discharge their great hulkes, and the same to goe light and nimble: moreover, when a man considereth continually with himselfe the cause why he inviteth his friends; it maketh bim to observe a difference and choise in that great multitude of them: for like as for every occasion & businesse that we have, we assemble not all forts of people, but fuch onely as be meet for ech purpofe; for if we should have need of good counfell, we call for those who be wife; if we would have a matter pleaded, we fend for eloquent orarours; if a voiage or journey performed; wee feeke for fuch as will take up with short meales, and who have little else to doe, and be best at leisure; even so in our invitations one to another: for when we facrifice unto some one god, we make not our praiers to all others, although they be worthipped in the fame temples, & upon the fame altars; but if there be three 10 cups or boules brought full unto us, we powre libations out of the first to some, the second we offer to others, and the last we bestow likewise upon a third fort: for there is no envie abideth in the quire ordaunce of the gods: femblably, thedaunce and quire of friends is divine, in fomefort, if fo be a man know how to distribute and deale his courtesseand kindnesse decently among them, and as it were to goe round about with them all.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that guests at the beginning of a supper sit close together at the table, but asterwards more at libertie?

Hele words thus passed, and then immediately a new question was mooved; namely, What the cause might be, that men commonly at the beginning of dinner or supper, sit at the table very streight and close, but toward the end more at large; whereas it should seeme by all reason, that they should doe cleane contrary, for that then their bellies be full? Some of the company attributed this unto the forme and positure of their bodies, as they sit; for that ordinarily men fit to their meat, directly at their full breadth, groveling forward, and put their right hands streight foorth upon the table; but after they have well supped, they turne themselves more to a side, & sit edge-wise, taking up no place now, according to the superficies of the body, not fitting (as a man would fay) by the fquire, but rather by the line and the plumb: 30 like as therefore the cockal bones occupie leffe roome when they fall upon one of their fides, than if they be couched flat; even so every one of us at the first fitteth bending forward, and fronteth the table with his mouth and cies directly upon it; but afterwards hee chaungeth that forme, from front to flanke, and turneth fidelong to the boord. Many there were who alcribed the reason of this, to the yeelding of the couch or bed, whereon men sit at their meat; for being preffed downe with fitting, is stretched broader and wider, like as our shooes with wearing and going in them, grow more flacke and easie for us by little and little, untill in the end they be so large, that we may turne our feet in them. Then the good old man spake merrily and said: That one and the same feast had alwaies two presidents and governors different one from another: at the beginning hunger, which cannot skill of keeping any good order; toward the end, Bacchus, 40 and him all men know very well, and confesse to have beene a very sufficient captaine, and an excellent leader of an armie: like as therefore Epaminondas (when as other captaines by their ignorance and unskilfulnesse had brought the armie of the Thebanes into a place so narrow that all was thrust together, and the ranks and files came one upon another, and crushed themfelves) tooke upon him the place of a commaunder, and not onely delivered it out of those ftreights, but alforeduced it into good order of battell; even fo god Bacchus firnamed Lyeus, and Choreus, that is to fay, a deliverer, and mafter of daunces, finding us at the beginning of Supper thrusting one another, and having no elbow roome, by reason of hunger that throumbleth us together like a fort of dogges, bringeth us againe into a decent order, whereby wee fit at ease and libertie enough like good fellowes.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION. Of those who are said to be with their cie.

Here grew some question upon a time, at the table, as touching those who are reported to be cie-biters, orto bewitch with their cies; and when others (inmaner all) paffed it over with laughing, as a frivolous and ridiculous thing: Metrius Florus, who had invited us to his house, tooke the matter in hand, and said: That the effects or events rather, which daily we doc observe, do make marvellous much to the brute and voice that goeth of the thing; but for want of yeelding a good reason thereof, and setting downe the true cause, the report many times of fuch matters wanteth credit: But unjuftly (quoth he) and wrongfully in mice opinion; for an infinit number therebe of other matters, that have a reall effence, and are notoriously knowen tobefo, although we are ignorant of their cause; and in one word, who sever tecketh in each thing for a probable reason, overthroweth miracles and woonders in all; for where wee faile to give reason of a cause, there begin we to doubt & make question, & that is as much to say, as to To play the philosophers: fo as we may inferre confequently: They that differed things admirable, do in fome fort, take away and abolish all philosophie; but we ought (quoth he) in such things as thefe, to fearch * Why they are fo, by reason; and learne * That they are so, by hillorie and relation; for histories do report unto us many narrations of like examples. Thus we know, that there be men, who by looking wiftly and with fixed eies upon little infants, doe hurt them most of all; for that the habit and temperature of their bodies which is moift, tender, and weake, foone receiveth alteration by them, and changeth to the woorfe; whereas leffe subject they be to fuch accidents, when their bodies are better knit, more strong and compett. And yet Philarchus writeth in his historie of a certeine nation and people inhabiting the realine of Pontus in times palt, called Thybiens, who were by that meanes pelliferous and deadly, not 20 onely to young babes, but also to men growen; for looke how many either their eie, their breath or their speech could reach unto, they were sure to fall sicke, and pine away: and this harme was felt and perceived (as it thould feeme) by merchants, who reforted into those parts, and brought from thence, flaves to be folde. But as for thele, the example peradventure is not fo strange and wonderfull, because the touching, contagion, and familiar conversing together, may yeeld a manifest reason and cause of such accidents: and like as the wings of other fowles, if they be laied together with those of the eagle, perith, confume, and come to nothing, for that the plume and downe of the feathers fall off and putrifie; even fo, there is no reason to the contrary, but that the touching of a man thould be partly good & profitable, and in part hurtful and prejudiciall: mary, that folke should take harme by being seene onely, and looked on, is an acci-30 dent which (as I faid before) we know to be; but for that the cause thereof is so difficult & hard to be hunted out, the report of it is incredible: Howbeit (quoth I then) you wind the cause already; you have met (in fome fort I fay) with the tracts and footing thereof, and are in the very way of finding it out, being come already to those defluxions that passe from bodies; for the sent, the the voice, the speech and breath, be certeine defluxions and streames (as it were) flowing from the bodies of living creatures, yea, and certeine parcels thereof, which move and affect the fenfes, when as they fuffer by the fame, lighting and falling upon them: and much more probable it is, that fuch defluxions, proceed from the bodies of living creatures, by the meanes of heat & motion; namely, when they be enchafed and flirred; as also that the vitall spirits then doe beat ftrongly, and the pulses worke apace, whereby the body being thaken, casteth from it continu-40 ally, certeine defluxions, as is before faid; and great likelihood there is alfo, that the fame fhould paffe from the eies, more than from any other conduit of the bodie: for the fight being a lenfe very lwift, active and nimble, doth fend forth and disperse from it, a wonderfull fierie puissance, together with a spirit that carrieth and directethit; in such fort, that a man by the meanes of this cie-light, both fuffereth and doth many notable effects, yea, and receiveth by the objects which hefeeth, no fmall pleafures or displeasures; for love (one of the greatest and most vehement pasfions of the minde) hath the fource and originall beginning at the * cie; infomuch, as he or the that is furprifed therewith, doth even refolve and melt with beholding the beautie of those perfons whom they love, as if they would run and enter into them; and therefore, a man may verice well marvell at those, who confessing that we suffer and receive hurt by the cic, thinke it a strange 50 matter to doe harme by the fame; for the very afpect and regard of fuch persons as are in the flower of their beautie, and that which paffeth from their cies, whether it be light or flowing of of the spirits, doth liquesie and consume those who be enamoured on them, with a certeine pleasure mingled with paine, which they themselves call Bitter-sweet: for nothing so much are they wounded or affected, either by hearing or feeling, as by feeing and being feene, so deepe is the penetration, and fo ftrong the inflamation by the cie; which maketh mee other-whiles to thinke, that no experience and proofe they have ever had what love is, who wonder at the Median A aphtha neere to Babylon, that it should burne and catch a flame, being a great way off from Ppp 2 the fire; for even fo, the eies of faire and beautifull creatures, kindle fire within the very hearts and foules of poore lovers, yea, though they looke not upon them but a farre off: but we know full well, and have often feene the remedy of those who are troubled with the jaundice; namely, * Sometakeit that if they can have a fight of the bird * Charadrios, they are prefently cured; for this bird hath for the Larior, fluch a nature and temperature, that it draweth to it felfe, and receiveth the maladie paffing from the patient, as it were a fluxion, and that by the conduit of the eies; which is the reason that these buds are never willing to fee a person who hath the jaundice, neither can they endure so to doe. but turne afide and avoid it all that ever they can, by clofing their elestogether, not envying (as fome thinke) the cure of that difease by them, but fearing to be burt and wounded themselves: and of all other maladies, it is well knowen, that they who converte with them whose eies be inflamed and bleered, are foonest and most of all infected therewith, so quicke a power and so readie, hath the fight to fet upon another, and inflict the contagion of that infirmitie. Then Patrocleas: True it is that you say (quoth he) in bodily passions and diseases; but as for those which be more spirituall, and concerne the soule, among which I reckon this kind of witching, howcan it be, and how is it possible, that the only cast and regard of the eie should transmit any noisance or hurt into the bodic of another? Why? know you not (quoth I) that the foule (according as it is disposed) doth likewise affect and alter the bodie ? the very congitation of Venus, causeth the flesh to rife; the ardent heat in couragious maftives and band-dogges, which are put upon wilde bealts for to encounter them when they are baited, dimmeth their cie-fight, and oftentimes makes them flarke blinde, forrow, avarice, and jealousie, alter the colour and complexion 20 of the face, drie up the habit and constitution of the bodie; and envie no leffe sublile than the rest, and piercing directly to the very soule, filleth the body also with an untoward and badde disposition, which painters lively doe represent in those tables which conteine the picture of envies face: when as therefore they who be infected with envie, doecast their cies upon others, which because they are seated necre unto the soule, doe catch and draw unto them verie cassile this vice, and so shoot their venemous raies, like unto poisoned darts upon them; if such chance to be wounded and hurt thereby, whom they looke upon, and wiftly behold: I fee no strange thing, nor a matter incredible; for verilie the biting of dogges is much more hartfull and danderous when they be angry than otherwise; and the sperme or naturall feed of men doth sooner take effect, and is more apt for generation, when they meddle with women whom they love; 20 and generally the passions and affections of the soule, doe fortific and corroborat the powers, and faculties of the bodie: and hecreupon it is, that those preservatives against witcherast called research, are then thought to do good against envie, when the eie-fight of the envious person is withdrawen and turned away by some filthie and absurd object, that it cannot make so ftrong an impression upon the patient whom he would hurt: Lo seigneur Florus (quoth I) heere is mine efect for our good cheere at this meeting, in ready coine paid downe upon the natle head: Well done (quoth Sociarus) but first before you goe, we must allow the money for good and currant; for I affure you, there be some pieces that seeme counterfet; for if we suppose that to be a truth, which is commonly reported, as touching those who are thus bewitched and eie bitten; it is not I am fure unknowen to you, that many are of opinion, that there be of their 40 friends and kinsfolke, yea, and fome of their fathers also, who carrie about them witching cies; in fuch fort as their very wives will not fo much as fhew unto them their owne babes, nor fuffer fuch to looke upon them any while together: how then should this effect of witcheric proceed from envie? Nay what will you fay to those (I pray you) who are named for to eiebite and bewitch their owne felves? You have heard I am fure thus much; or at leastwife you have read this Epigram.

Of Symposiaques

Faire was fometime Eutelidas,
His face and haire full lovely was;
But fee, one day when needs he would (Unhappy man)himfelfe behold
In river fireamethat foftly ran,
His beauties han he foome began
So to admire, that for envie Bewitch's he was by his own eie;
And fell anon by malady,
To pine away and foto dy.

For it is reported of this Eutelidas, that looking upon himselfe in the river water, he was so farre in love with his owne beautie, and so deepely affected with the fight thereof, that he fell ficke, and so both beautie and the good plight of his bodie went away at once: but see now what shift you can make to falve these abfurdities? or what answer you will devise to avoid them? As for that (quoth he) I shall doe it at some other time sufficiently: but now drinking thus as you see me, out of fo great and large a boule, I dare be bold to averre, and that confidently, that all perturbations and passions of the minde, if they settle and continue long in the soule, doe ingenerate therein evill habitudes; & these, after they have in processe of time gotten the strength and become another nature, upon every small occasion, are stirred, and oftentimes drive men perforce, and even against their willes to those familiar and accustomed passions : for doe but 10 marke timorous and fearefull cowards, how they be affrighted even with fuch things as be fafe, and doe preserve them 3 cholericke persons are angrie many times, and fall out with their best friends; lascivious wantons can not conteine, but in the end they will offer abuse and vilanie to the most holy & facred bodies that be for: cultome hath a wonderfull power to conduct & cary the habit unto that vice which is familiar unto it; & looke who is apt to take a fall, will flumble at every small hob that lies in his way: and therefore it is not a matter to make a woonder of, if they who have gotten in themselves habit of envie, and bewitching, bee incited and mooved according to the particular propertie of their passion, even against those who are most deare unto them; and being once mooved and stirred, they doe not that which they will themselves, but that whereunto they are so inclined and disposed; for like as a round bowle or ball runneth. 20 like it felfe; and femblablic a roller or cylender moveth as a roller or cylender, both of them after the different figure thereof; even fo, who foever they be that have thus contracted an habitude of this cie-biting envic, their difposition mooveth and driveth them enviously upon all things; howbeit it carieth a great likelihood that they should hurt them, who are most familiar unto them, and best beloved than any other; and therefore that good Eutelidas and all other fuch as he, who are faid to charme and bewitch themselves, incurre this hard extremity, not without great appearance of reason: for as Hippocrates faith in his aphorismes: The good habit or plight when it is at the height is dangerous; and bodies when they are come to the highest point, they can not hold and stand so, but presently must incline and bend to the contrarie: when as men therefore are growen suddenly all at once, and see themselves in a better 30 state than they hoped for; infomuch as they wonder & behold themselves with admiration, then befure the body is neere unto some change, and then being caried according to their habitude to the woorle, they bewitch themselves: and this is wrought the rather, by meanes of those fluxions which reft upon waters, looking-glaffes, or any fuch mirrors by way of repercussion; for that they rebound backe, & breath as it were againe upon those who looke in them, so, that the hurt & damage which they have done to others, lighteth upon themselves: this haply befalling many times to little children, doth impute (though falfly and unjuftly) the cause to these that looke upon them. When I had finished my speech, Caim the sonne in law of Florm, began to fpeake in this wife: Why then belike the images that Democritus speaketh of are of no reckoning nor account, no more than the idols of Megina and Megara, as the proverbe goes; for 40 this philosopher faith: That there goe foorth certeine images out of the eies of envious perfons, and those not altogether without a kinde of sense and inclination, but rather full of their malice and envious witcherie who fend them forth; with which, when the faid images come to fettle, remaine, and reft upon those who are envied, they trouble and offend the bodie, soule and understanding: for this I take to be the meaning of that great philosopher, and that hee hath delivered his opinion to this effect, under those divine and magnificent words: So he doth no doubt (quoth I) but I marvell much, how you perceived not that I have taken nothing from those defluxions, but onely life and will; which I did, for feare left if now (being farre within night, and very late) I had talked of spirits, idols, and apparitions, having sense and understanding, I should have put you into some fright, and scared you with them: and therefore, if you 50 thinke it fo good, let us referre and put off the confideration of these thing untill to morrow morning.

THE EIGHT QUESTION.

What is the resson that the poet Homer salled the Apple-tree, a produceron, that is to say, bearing fruit; and Empedocles named Apples, wife proventhat is to say, flourishing.

A Swewere merry together at a feaft one day, in our citie Charonea, we were ferved with all forts of fruits in great abundance; by occasion whereof, it tooke one of the companie in his head to pronounce these verses out of Homer:

σύχαι τε γλυκεραί κ) μηλέαι άγλαδημερτιι
..... Και κλαΐαι τηλεθόω σει.

That is to fay:

The sweet Fig-trees and apple-trees that beare a fruit so faire,

The Olive-trees likewife all greene ---- whereupon arose some question, why the poet gave unto apple-trees the attribute of bearing faire struit? and Tryphon verily the physician, answered: That it might be spoken of the said tree, by way of comparison; which being but small to speake of, and making as little shew, bringeth forth so saire, so great, and so goodly fruit. Another said: That compounding (as he did) beautie or goodnesse, of all parts and in every respect, he could not see the same in any other sruits covered with a rinde, but onely in this for to touch and feele, it is as smooth and net as the violet, so as it doth not staine or so lie the skin, filling with a sweet sent, him that handleth it; in talte, it is pleasant; to sincell unto, most delectable; and to the cie, as lovely; so as contenting it doth, all the senses in a maner, by good right it is so praised and commended. We liked well of this discourse; and said, it was sufficient to solve the question. But whereas Empedaeles hath written thus:

นังเหม อำไภภาคีระ ต่องินมี วัลร์คุดภอเล แล้วล. Why pomgranates fo late doe grow, And apples beare a lovely show?

I understand well (said I) this epithite of poros, given unto of but, that is to say, pomgranats, because the fruit commeth not to maturitie or ripenelle, untill it be about the end of Autumne, when as 30 now the extreame heats be decaied and gone; for their moisture, so thin, seeble and waterish as it is, the funne will not fuffer it to thicken, or grow to any confiftence, unleffe the aire begin to change and incline unto coldnesse; and therefore Theophrass w faith, that it is the onely tree that doth ripen and concoct her fruit, best & soonest, in the shade, But I doubt in what sense this wife philosophicall poet giveth this addition of & popolar, unto apples? considering that the man is not woont to imbelifh and adorne the matters and things whereof he treateth, with the gaiest and most glorious adjectives, as with fresh and lively colours, to enrich and beautifie his stile, or to fet out his verses; for there is not an epithite that he useth, but serves for to represent and expresse either the substance or els some facultie and vertue of the thing. Thus he calleth our bodie environing the foule, روانه طبية الموادووية, that is to fay, earth circummortall; the aire he tearm-40 eth, repeating that is to fay, gathering clouds; as also, the liver, παλυαίματαν, that is to fay, full of bloud. When I had thus put this doubt to question, there were certeine Grammarians in place, who faid: That Empedocles called apples, & 492000, in regard of their vigor: for poets by this verbe and invertigated thus much maniely, to be growen apace to the vigour, flower, and full ftrength. And the poet Antimachus in this sense, tearmed the city of the Cadmeans, philusus imigus, that is to fay, flourishing with store of fruits. Semblably, Aratus speaketh of the Canicular-starre, Sirim, in this wife:

και πα μερ έρρασεν, Αυ 5 φλών ώλεσε παίτα.

That is to fay:

In some he did confirme their vigour,

Andmarr dinothers all their verdeur.

In which place, he calleth the viriditie or greennesse, and the verie slower or beautie of fruits, excor. They added moreover, and said: That among the Greeks, some there were, who sacrifice to Bacehus, surnamed excise. For asmuch as therefore, the apple mainteineth it selfe longest in viriditie and vigour, of all other sruits, therefore the philosopher named it, whipperson. But Lamprus my grandfather said: That this adjection or preposition with, signifieth not only, much, see the price of the greatly, but also, above, or with-out-foorth: for in this acception, the head or lintell of a doore, we name καίρδηση. that is to say, above the doore; and likewise, an upper-toome, chamber, or lost, καράσι: and Homer the poet, meaneth the outward sless he beast factificed, by the word στηντίες; like as the inward, by the wocable ἐρισσα. Consider then (quoth he) whether Empedeeles had not a respect heereunto, by attributing this said epithite usto an apple; that whereas other fruits are inclosed & covered within a certaine barke as it were, which in Greeke is called ρλοίω, and have without forth, those that we tearme λεσθέραν, καλόφι, ψιδύνοις χλοιδώς, that is to say, sholte, rindes, cods and pannicles to cover them, that barke or shell (if I may fo say) which the apple hath, lieth within; namely, a glutinous and smooth tunicle or coat, which we call the core or the corque, wherein the pepins or feeds lie conteined; but the sless hich we call the core for to be eaten, is all without the saidcore, in which respect, it may by good right be named στηρελούν.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that the Figge-tree, being of all other trees most bitter and sharpe in taste, yeeldeth as suit most sweet?

Fter this, demaunded it was, why the figge, so fat and sweet a fruit as it is, groweth upon at tree most bitter? for the very lease of a figge-tree by the reason of the asperitie and roughnesse that it hath, is called Thrien, and the wood is full of juice; so that when it burneth, you shall see it cast up a most eager and bitter smoke, and when it is burnt, the ashes make a leic very ftrong, and marvellous deterfive, because of the acrimonie and sharpenesse thereof: yea, and (that which is most admirable) whereas all other trees and plants clad with leaves and bearing fruit, put foorth a flower before, onely the figge-tree never sheweth bloffome: and if it be true which is moreover faid; that it is never blatted, or fmitten with lightning, a man may attribute and ascribe it to the bitternesse and evill habitude of the stocke; for it should seeme that lightning and thunder never touch any fuch things, no more than the skinne of a fea-calfe, or of the beatt Hyena. Heere the good old man (our grandfire) taking occasion to speake, said: 30 No marvell then, if all the sweetnetse bee found in the fruit, the rest of the tree be harsh and bitter: for like as when the cholericke humour is cast into the bagge or bladder of the gall, the proper fubfrance of the liver it felfe remaineth very fweet, even to the figge-tree having fent all the sweetnesse and fatnesse it had into the fruit, remaineth it selfe disfurnished of it; for that within the trunke of the faid tree there is otherwise some sweetnesse and good juice, though it bebut a little; I make an argument from the herbe rue; which they say: If it grow under or neere a figge-tree; becommeth more pleafant in smell, and in taste more milde, by receiving and enjoying some small sweetnesse from it; whereby that excessive, strong and odious qualitie of rue is abated and extinct; unleffe peradventure a man will reason cleane contrary, and faic, that the figge-treedrawing somewhat from rue, for the owne nouriture, taketh from that herbe 40 some part of the bitternesse and acrimonie thereof.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Who be they who according to the common proverbe, are faid, med a have winner, that is to fay, about the fait and commin? and so by the way, why the poet Horner nameth sait divine.

Lorsa asked us one day when we were at supper in his house, who they were whom we tearmed by an usuall by-word, to be about the sale and cumin: Apollophanes the grammarian, one of our companie, solved the question readily in this manner: They (quoth he) who are such so friends and so familiar that they suppe together, with salt and cumin, are meant by this common speech. But then we mooved a new question, namely: How it came to passe, that salt was so highly honoured? for that Homer directly saith:

And then anon when this was done,

He strewed salt divine upon.

And Plate affirmeth, that the bodie and substance of faltby mans lawes, is most facred and holie: The difficultie of this question he enforced still, and augmented the more; for that the Acquerian

Acgyptian priefts who live chafte, absteine altogether from falt, infomuch as their verie bread which they eat is not feafoned with falt: And if it were (quoth he) fo divine and holy, why have they it in so great detestation? Then Florus willed us to let the Aegyptians goe with their superstitious fashions; and to alledge somewhat of the Greeks as touching this subject argument: Whereupon I began and faid: That the Aegyptians themselves were not heerein contrarie to the Greekes; for the fanctimonie and profession of chastitie, forbiddeth procreation of children, laughing, wine, and fuch like things; which otherwife be good, and not to be rejected: and as for falt, haply those who have vowed to live a chaste and pure life, doe for beare it, for that by the heat which it hath, (as some thinke) it provoketh those who use it, unto lecherie: and probable it is besides, that such votaries doe refuse salt, because of all other meats, it is most to delicate; & a man may well fay: That it is the viand of viands, & the fauce as it were to feafon all others; and therefore some there be who attribute unto these falts, the very tearme of Charites or the Graces; for that they make that which is necessarie for our food, to be pleasant & acceptable unto us: Shall wee fay then (quoth Florus) that falt was called divine in this respect? And if we did fo (quoth I) wee have no flender reason to induce us thereunto; for men are wont to attribute a kinde of divinty unto things which are passing common, and the commoditie whereof reacheth farre (as for example) to water, light, & the feafons of the yeere; as for the earth, her above the rest, they repute not onely divine, but also to be a goddesse: & there is none of all these things rehearsed, that falt giveth place unto, one jot, in regard of use and profit; being as it is a fortification to our meats within the bodie, and that which commended the them unto 20 our appetite: but yet confider moreover, if this benot a divine propertie that it hath, namely, to preserve and keepe dead bodies free from putrifaction a long while, and by that meanes to refill death in some fort, for that it suffereth not a mortall bodie wholly to perish, and come to nothing: but like as the foule being the most divine part of us, is that which mainteineth all the rest alive, and suffereth not the masse and substance of the bodie to be dissolved, and suffer colliquation; even so, the nature of salt, taking hold of dead bodies, and imitating heerein the action of the foule, preserveth the same, holding and staying them that they runne not headlong to corruption, giving unto all the parts an amitie, accord & agreement one with the other: and therefore it was elegantly faid by some of the Stoicks: That the flesh of an hoggewas even from the beginning no better than a dead carion, but that life being diffused within it, as if salt 30 were strewed throughout, kept it sweet, and so preserved it for to last long. Moreover you see, that wee esteeme lightning, or the fire that commets by thunder, celestiall and divine, for that those bodies which have beene smitten therewith, are observed by us to continue a great while unputrified and without corruption: What marvell is it then, if our auncients have efteemed falt, divine, having the fame vertue and nature, that this divine and celestials fire hath? Heere I ftated my speech, and kept silence. With that, Philmus followed on and pursued the same argument : And what thinke you (quoth he) is not that to be held divine, which is generative, and hath power to ingender, confidering that God is thought to be the original authour, creatour, and father of all things? I avowed no leffe, and faid it was fo: And it is (quoth he) an opinion generally received, that falt availethnot a little in the matter of generation, as you your 40 felfe touched ere while, speaking of Aegyptian priests: they also, who keepe and nourish dogs for the race, when they fee them dull to performe that act, and to doe their kinde, do excite and awaken their lust and vertue generative, that lieth (as it were) asleepe, by giving them aswell as other hot meats, falt flesh, and fish both, that have lien in brine & pickle : also, those ships & velfels at fea, which ordinarily are fraight with falt, breed commonly an infinit number of mice and rats; for that (as fome hold) the females or does of that kinde, by licking of falt onely, will conceive and be bagged without the company of the males or bucks: but more probable it is, that falmeffedoth procure a certeine itching in the naturall parts of living creatures, and by that means provoketh males & females both, to couple together: and peradventure this may be the reason that the beauty of a woman which is not dull and unlovely, but full of favor, attractive, and 50 able to move concupifcence, menufe to name drawer val deput, that is to fay, faltifn or well feafoned: And I suppose that the poets have fained Venus to have beene engendred of the sea, not without fome reason; and that this tale, that she should come of falt, was devised for the nonce, to signifie and make knowen under those covert tearmes, that there is in falt a generative power: certes, this is an ordinarie and generall thing among those poets, to make all the sea gods, fathers of many children, and very full of issue. To conclude, you shall not finde any land-creature, or flying fowle, for fruitfulneffe, comparable to any kinde of fifthes bred in the fea; which no doubt this verfe of Empedacles had respect unto:

Leading a troupe, which senselesse were and rude, Even of sea-fish, a breeding multitude.

The Proeme.

Late being minded to draw Timothem the sonne of Conon (ô Sossius Senecio) from sumptuous seasts and superfluous banquets, which great captaines commonly make, invited him one day to a supper in the Academie, which was philosophicall indeed and frugall, where the table was not furnished with those viands which night distemper the bodie with seaverous heats and inflamations, as lon the poet was wont to say; but such a supper I say, upon which ordinarily therefollow kinde and quiet sleeps, such fansies also, and imaginations as ingender sew dreames, and those short; and in one word, where the sleeps do testifie a great calmnesse and tranquillitie of the bodie. The morrow after, Timotheus perceiving the difference betweene these suppers and the other, said: That they who supped with Plato over-night, found the pleasure and comfort thereof the next day; and to say attructh, a great helpe and ready meanes to a pleasant and blessed life, is the good temperature of the body, not drenched in wine, nor loaden with viands, but light, nimble, and ready, without any seare or distrust to performe all actions and functions of the day-time. But there was another commodity no leffe than this, which they had, who fupped with Plate, namely, the discussing and handling of good and learned questions, which were held at the table in supper time : for the remembrance of the pleasures in eating and drinking is illiberall and unbefeening men of worth, transitoric besides, and toone at an end; like unto the odor of a perfume and sweet ointment, or the smell of rost in a kitchin a day after; whereas difcourfes philosophicall, and disputations of learning, when they be remembred afterwards, yeeld alwaies new pleafure and fresh delight unto those that were at them, yea, and cause them who were abfent and left out, in hearing the relation thereof, to have no leffe part of learning and crudition, than they who were present: for thus we see, that even at this day, students and profellours of icarning, have the fruition, and enjoy the benefit of Socrates his banquets, no leffe than they themselves who were personally present, and had their reall part of them at the time: and verily, if corporall matter, as dainty diffies and exquifit fare, had to greatly affected and delighted their minds with pleafure; Plato and Xenophon should have put downe in writing, and left unto us the memoriall, not of the discourses there held, nor of the talke which then passed, but rather of the furniture of the table, & have made a note of the delicate viands, pastric works, comfitures and junkers ferved up in Callias or Agathus houses: whereas now of all fuch matters there is no mention at all, as if they were of no account, nor worth the naming, not with flanding very like it is, there was no want of provision, no spare of cost, nor defect of diligence in that behalfe: but on the otherfide penned they have most exactly, and with great diligence the difcouries of good letters and philosophy, which then and there passed merrily; and those they have commended unto posterities, to give us example, that we ought not onely to devise and 20 reason together when we are at the boord, but also to call to minde afterwards, what good talke had paffed and to keepe the fame in memorie.

Of Symposiaques

THE FIRST QUESTION.

What is the reason, that those who be fasting are more thirsy than hungry?

Now fend I unto you Softing Senecio, this fixth booke of banquet discourses, whereof the first question is: Why those who be long suffing, are more thirstie than hungry? For it may seeme contrary unto all reason; that thirst rather than hunger should ensue much sattings for that the want of dry food, would feeme by courfe of nature to require a supplie of nutriment by the like. Then began I in this manner to argue, before the companie there in place: That of all things within us, and whereof we confift, our naturall heat either alone or principally, had need of nouriture and maintenance: for thus verily wee doe observe in outward elements, that neither aire, water, nor earth, defire nutriment; neither doe they confume whatfoever is neere unto them; but it is fire onely that requireth the one, and doth the other; which is the reafon that all yoong folke doe cat more than elder persons; for that they be hotter; yea and old men and women can endure to fall better, because their naturall heat is already decaied and feeble in them; like as it is in those living creatures which have but little bloud; for small need have 40 they of nouriture, for default of naturall heat. Moreover, thus much we may observe in everie one of our felves, that our bodily exercifes, our loud outcries and fuch like matters, as by motion doe augment heat, make us to take more pleasure in our meat, and to have a better appetite to eat: now the principall, most familiar and naturall food of heat, in mine opinion, is moiflure, as we may fee by daily experience, that burning flames of fire increase by powring oile thereto; & of all things in the world, ashes are the drieft, because the whole humiditie is burnt up and confumed; but the terrestrial substance destitute of all liquor, remaineth alone: semblably, the nature of fire is to separate and divide bodies, by taking away the moisture which held them fodered and bound together: when as therefore wee fastlong, our naturall heat draweth forcibly unto it; fust, all the humours out of the reliques of our nourishment; which 50 done, the inflammation thereof paffeth farther, and fetteth upon the very radical humour within our flesh, searching every corner for moisture to feed and nourish it: there being caused therefore a woonderfull drineffe in our bodie, like as in earth or clay that is parched with heat; our feeliby confequence commeth to fland more in need of drinke than of meat, untill fuch time as we have taken a good draught; by meanes whereof our heat being well refreshed and fortified, worketh and procureth appetite to folide and dry nourifhment.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether it be want of food that causeth hunger and thirst, or rather the transformation and change of the conduits and passages within our bodies?

His discourse being thus ended, Philo the physician went about to impugne and overthrow the first polition; mainteining, that thirst proceeded not from default of any nourishment, but was to be imputed unto the change of the forme in certaine passages of the body: 10 and for demonstration heereof, hee alledged of the one fide this experience: That they who be a thirst in the night, if they sleepe upon it, lose their thirstinesse, although they drinke never a drop : on the other fide, that they who have the ague, if their fit decline, or be off them, or in case the seaver be cleane past and gone, presently they are eased of their drought: likewise there be many, who after they have beene bathed, yea, and beleeve me, others when they have vomited, are ridde of thirstinesse; and yet they get moisture neither by the one nor the other; but they are the pores and petie conduits of the body that fuffer mutation, because they be altered and transformed into another state and disposition; and this appeareth more evidently in hunger: for many ficke folke there be, who at one time have need of nourishment, and yet want appetite to their meat; some there are againe, who let them eat and fill themselves 20 never so much, have never the leffe appetite to meat, nay, their greedie hunger encreaseth the more: semblablie, you shall have many of those who lothed their meat, to recover their stomacke and appetite quickly, by tafting a few olives or capres, condite with falt pickle: whereby it appeareth plainly sthat hunger is not occasioned by default of nourishment, but through the faid alteration or paffion of the potes and conduits of the body: for furely fuch meats as those, although they diminish the want of nourishment, by addition of more food, yet neverthelesse cause hunger; and even so the poinant acrimonic of these falt viands, contenting the talte and pleasant to the mouth, by knitting, binding, and strengthening the stomacke; or contrativise, by relaxing or opening the same, do procure unto it, and breed therein a certeine gnawing and a disposition to the liking of their meat, which we call appetite. The reason of their arguments 30 feemed unto me very wittily devised, and framed pretily, for to carrie a good snew of probabilitie; howbeit, to be contrary unto the principall end of nature, to which the appetite doth leade and conduct every living creature, defirous to supplie that which is wanting, to fill that which is emptie, and purfuing alwaies that which is meet for it and familiar, but yet defectuous : for to fay, that the thing wherein principally a living creature differeth from a liveleffe bodie, was not given unto us for the tuition, maintenance and prefervation of our health and fafetie, even as it were of our cies that be so proper and familiar to the body, and to seare such occurrents as be adverse thereto; but to thinke that the same is onely a passion, change, and alteration of the pores occasioned according as the same be made either bigger or smaller; is (to speake plainly) the fashion and part of those who make no reckoning at all of nature. Moreover, to confesse, that 40 to quake for colde, hapneth unto our bodie for want of heat familiar and naturall unto it, and with one breath to denie, that hunger and thirst proceed not from defect of moisture and nourishment, is very about and yet, more unreasonable and monstrous it were to affirme, that nature defireth evacuation, when the feeleth her felfe charged with fulneffe, and with all, hath a defire to repletion; not because she findeth her selse over-emptie, but upon some other passion comming I know not how, not which way. Certes, these needs and repletions in the bodies of living creatures, resemble properly the accidents that fall out in agriculture and husbandry; for the earth suffereth many such defects, and requireth as many helpes and remedies : against drought, we feeke to moisten by watering; for burning with heat, to coole moderately; when things are frozen, to heat them againe, and keepe them warme, by laying (as it were) many co-30 verings over; and looke what is not in our power to doe, we pray unto the gods for to helpe and furnish us therewith; namely, sweet and milde dewes, pleasant and comfortable windes; so that nature alwas seeketh supplie of that which is desective, for to preserve her state and temperature. And in my conceit, this word & which fignifieth nourithment, feemeth to import as much as கூல் ரம் ஸ்ஸ, that is to fay, preserving nature; & preserved it is in plants verily, & trees infensibly (as Empedocles said) by the aire about them, when they are refreshed and watered thereby in convenient maner, as need requireth ; but as for us , our appetite causeth us to seeke and procure that, for default whereof, we have not our kinde temperature. But let us confider better, ech one of those reasons by it selfe, which have bene delivered, and how untrue they be: for first and formost, those viands which have a quicke, sharpe and pleasing taste, by reason of their acrimonie, procure no appetite at all in those parts, which be capable of nouriture, but only a certeine biting or gnawing in them, much like unto that itching, when fomething is applied unto the skin, that doth plucke and fret it : and fay, that this passion or affection (whatfoever it is) procureth appetite, it standeth to great reason, that by such sharpe and quicke viands, those matters which caused fulnesse, comming to be attenuated and made more subtill, are discussed diffolved, and so diffipated as they ought to be; by which meanes, consequently there followeth a want and defect; not for that the pores and passages be altered or changed into another 10 forme, but rather, because they be now voided, cleere and purged; considering that those juices which be sharpe, eager, quicke, piercing and saltish, by attenuating and making tender the matter that they meet with and worke upon, do discusse, disgregate and scatter the same, in such fort. as they ingender and procure a new appetite. To come now unto those who sleepe upon their thirstinesse, they be not the pores which by their transformation allay thirst, but by reason that they receive humiditie from the fleshie parts, and are filled with a vapourous moisture from thence : and as for vomits, in casting up one thing which is adverse to nature, they give her meanes to enjoy another which is friendly and familiar thereto: for thirst is not a desire so much of an exceeding great quantitie of moisture, as of that which is kinde and familiar; and therefore, although a man have within him great abundance of that moisture which is unnaturall, yet nevertheleffe, he wanteth still; for that his thirst giveth place to no other humiditie, but unto that which is proper and naturall, and whereof it is defirous: neither commeth mans bodie into a good temper againe, before such time as that humiditie be removed and gone, which was enemie to nature; and then the waies and paffages receive willingly that moisture which is friendly and familiar unto her: as to the ague before faid, it driveth indeed the moisture inwardly into the center (as it were) of the bodie; for when the middle thereof is all on a fire, thither runneth and retireth all the humiditie, where it is thrust together and reteined; and by reason that there is such store thereof, pressed and pent in, it falleth out often times, that many being ficke of the ague, do cast and vomit it up, for to be discharged thereof, and be exceeding thirstie withall, for want of moisture, and for the drinesse that is in other parts of the bodic, which call for humiditie: when as then the fever either declineth or hath intermission, so as the ardent heat 30 within, is gone from those interior parts in the center and middle of the bodie, the moisture returneth againe into the outward habit, it fpreadeth (I fay) and is difperfed thorowout, according to the naturall course thereof; so as at once it bringeth ease to the parts within, and withall, caufeth the flesh and skin without, to be smoothe, soft and moist, whereas before it was rough, hard and drie; yea, and many times it mooveth sweats; whereby it commeth to passe, that the want which before caused thirst, now ceaseth and is gone, while the moisture is returned from the place wherein before it was streightly pressed and kept in, unto that which is desirous and hath need of it, and where it is at large and more at libertie: for like as in an orchard or garden, although there be a pit conteining plentie of water, unlesse a man draw some out of it, and there-40 with water the ground, it can not chuse but the herbs, plants and trees will be as one would fay, athirst, and at a fault for nourishment; even so it fareth in our bodies; if all the moisture be gotten to one place, no marvell if the rest do want and become exceeding drie, untill such time as it run againe, and that there be a new diffusion thereof; like as it falleth out with those who are ficke of an ague, when the fit is past, or the fever hath left them, and to those who sleepe upon thirst; for in these, sleepe bringeth backe the moisture from the center and middle of the bodie, distributing it to all the members and parts thereof, and so maketh an equall distribution and supply thorowout.

But this transformation and change of the pores from which it is faid that hunger and thirst doth proceed; whatkinde of thing is it I would gladly know? For mine owne part, none o- 50 ther differences fee I, but of more and leffe, and according as they be either stopped or opened; when they bee obstructed or stopped, receive they cannot either drinke or meat; when they be opened and unftopped, they make a voide and free place; and forely that is nothing els but the want of that which is proper and naturall: For the reason (my good friend Philo) why clothes which are to be died, be dipped first in alome water, is because that such water hath a piercing, scouring, and abstersive vertue, by meanes whereof, when all the superstuous filth in them is confirmed and rid away, the pores being opened, reteine more furely the tincture which is given unto the clothes, onely because they receive the same better, by reason of the emptinefle occasioned by want.

Congress on THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the cause that when men be hungry, if they drinke, are delivered from their hunger: but contrarrwife, when they be athirft, if they eate, are more thir sty than before?

WHen those discourses were thus passed; he who invited us to supper, began in this wise: It seemeth unto me (my masters) that this scason as touching the voidance and repletion of pores, carieth with it a great apparence of truth, and namely in the foliution of another question besides, to wit: VV hy in them who be hungry, if they drinke, their hunger ceaseth immediately? and contrariwife, they who are a thirst, if they cat, are still more thirstie? I am of opinion (quoth he) that those who alledge and urge these pores and their effects, doe render the reason and cause of this accident, very easilie, and with exceeding great probabilitie however in many points, they enforce the fame not fo much as probably: for whereas all bodies have pores, fome of one measure, and symmetry, others of another; those which be larger than the rest, receive food solid as well as liquid both together; such as been arrower and more ftreight admit drinke; the avoidance and evacuation of which, caufeth thirft, like as of the other, 20 hunger: and therefore if they who be a thirst doe cat, they finde no succour and benefit thereby, because the pores by reason of their streightnesse, are not able to receive drie and solid nutriment, but continue still indigent and destitute of that which is their due, and fit for them: whereas they who be hungry, in case they drinke, finde comfort thereby, for that the liquid nouriture entring into those large pores, and filling those concavities of theirs, doe flake and diminish mightily the force of their hunger.

As touching the event and effect (quoth I) true it is (as I thinke) but I cannot accord and give my consent to the supposition of the cause pretended: For if (quoth I) a man should hold, that with these pores and conduits (upon which some stand so much, so greatly embrace and mainteine fo floutly) the flesh is pierced, and by meanes thereof full of holes; furely he would 30 make it very loofe, quavering, flaggie, and fo rotten, that it would not hang together: moreover, to fay that the same parts of the body doe not receive meat and drinke together, but that they doe passe and runne (as it were) thorough a threiner or canvase bolter, some one way and fome another; methinks is a very strange position, & a meere devised siction: for this verie mixture of humiditie, tempering and making tender the meats received, together with the cooperative helpe of the inward naturall heat, and the spirits, doth cut, subtiliate, and mince the foode, with all manner of incitions, threddings, and divitions, no tooles, no knives, nor inftru-· ments in the world fo fine and fmall; infomuch as every part and parcell of the faid nourishment is familiar, meet & convenient for ech part & member of the bodie; not applied & fitted as it were to certeine veffels and holes to be filled thereby; but united & perfectly concorporate 40 to the whole, and every part thereof: but if this were not fo, yet the maine point of the question is not affoiled for all that; for they who ear, unlesse they also drinke to it, are so farre off from allaying their thirst, that contrariwise they increase the same; and to this point there is not yet a word faid. Confider now (faid I) whether the politions & reasons which we set downe, are not probable & apparent? first we suppose, that moisture being consumed by drinesse, is cleane perifhed & gone; & that drineffe being tempered & full cined by moilture hath certaine diffusions, & exhalations: fecondly we hold, that neither hunger is a general & universal want of dry food, nor thirst, of moisture, but a certeine scantnesse and defect of the one and the other, when there is not enough and sufficient; for those who altogether doe want the same, bee neither hungrie northirstie, but die presently: Let these supposals be laid for grounds, it will not be from hence-50 foorth hard, to know the cause of that which is in question: for thirst increaseth upon them that eat, because meats by their drinesse doe gather together, sucke and drinke up the humidity dispersed, and which is left but small and seeble, in all the bodie, causing the same to evaporate away; like as we may observe without our bodies, how dry earth and dust, do quickly snatch, dispatch, and consume quite the liquor or moisture that is mingled therewith : contrariwise, drinke necessarily slaketh hunger; for by reason that moisture drenching and soking that little meat which it finderh dry and hard, raileth from it certeine vapors and moist exhalations, and those it doth elevate and carrie up into all the body, applying the same to the parts that stand in need: and therefore Erassistratus not unproperly tearmed moisture, the wagon of the viands: for being mixed and tempered with such things as otherwise of themselves by reason of their drinesse or other evill disposition, be idle, and heavy, it raiseth and listeth up: and hecreupon it commeth, that many men who have been exceeding hungry, onely by bathing or washing themselves, without any drinke at all, have woonderfully aswaged and aliaed their hunger: for the moisture from without, entring into the body, causeth them to be more succeeding hungry of the moisture from without, entring into the body, causeth them to be more succeeding hungry of the moisture from without, on the body, causeth them to be more succeeding hungry for the moisture from the resident of the fell mood, and better plights for that it doth enlarge the parts within, so that it doth mitigate the fell mood, and better plights for that it doth enlarge the parts within, so that it doth mitigate the fell mood, and appeale the critell rage of hunger. To conclude, this is the reason that they who are determined to pine themselves to death by utter abstinence from all solid meats; live and continue a long time if they receive but water onely, even untill the time that all be quite evaporate, spent 10 and dried up, which might nourish and be united unto the bodie.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

. What is the raufe that pit or well-water being drawen, if it be left all night within the aire of the pit, becommeth colder than it was ?

E had a certeine guest who lived delicatly, and loved to drinke cold water; for to please and content whole appetite, our fervants drew up a bucket of water out of the pit or wel. and fo let it hang within the fame (fo that it touched northe top of the water) all the night long; 20 wherewith he was ferved the morrow after at his supper, and he found it to be much colder than that which was newly drawen: now this stranger, being a professed scholar and indifferently well learned, told us, that he had found this in Aristotle among other points, grounded upon good teason, which he delivered unto us in this wise: All water (quoth he) which is first heat, becommethafterwards more colde than it was before; like to that which is provided and prepared for kings: first, they set it on the fire untill it boile againe; which done, they buriethe pan or vessell wherein it is, within fnow; and by this device it proves exceeding colde: no otherwise than our bodies, after that we have bene in the stouph or baines, be cooled much more by that meanes: for relaxation occasioned by heat, maketh the bodie more rare, and causeth the pores to open, and fo by consequence, it receiveth more aire from without, which environeth the bodie, and 30 bringeth a more fudden and violent change: when as therefore water is first chased (as it were) 3 and let in an heat by agitation and stirring within the bucket whiles it was in drawing, it groweth to be the colder by the aire which environeth the faid veffell round about. This stranger and guest of ours, we commended for his confident resolution and perfect memory; but as touching the reason that he alledged, we made some doubt: for if the aire in which the vessell hangeth be colde, how doth it inchafe the water? and if it be hot, how cooleth it afterwards? for befide all reason it is, that a thing should be affected or suffer contrarily from one and the same cause, unleffe some difference come betweene. And when the other held his peace a good space, and flood musting what to say againe: Why (quoth I) there is no doubt to be made of the aire; for our very senses teach us, that colde it is, and especially that which is in the bottome of pits; and 40 therefore impossible it is, that water should be heat by the cold aire : but the trueth is this rather, although this cold aire can not alter all the water of the spring in the bottome of the well, yet if a man draw the same in a little quantitie, it will do the deed, and be so much predominant as to coole it exceedingly.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that little stones and small plates or pellets of lead, being cast into water, make it colder?

YOu remember I am fure (doe you not, faid I) what Ariffotle hath written, as touching pibble ftones and flints, which if they be cast into water; cause the same to be much colder and more aftringent: And you remember (quoth he) aswell, that the philosopher in his Problemes hath onely said it is so; but let us assay to finde out the cause, for it seemeth very difficult to be conceived and imagined: You say true indeed (quoth I); and a marvell it were if we could hit upon it: howbeit, marke and consider what I will say unto it: First to begin with all; doe you not thinke that water is sooner made colde by the aire without, if the same may come to enter into it? also, that the aire is of more force and efficacie, when it beateth against hard flints, pubbles of whethones for they will not fuffer it to patte thorow, as veffels either of braffe or earth; but by their compact foliditie, refifting and flanding out against it, they put it by from themselves, and turne it upon the water; whereby the coldnesse may be the stronger, and the water thorowout be fully affected therewith: and this is the reason, that in Winter time, running rivers be much colder than the fea; for that the cold aire hath greater power upon them, as being driven backe againe from the bottome of the water; whereas in the fea it is diffolved; and paffeth away, by reafon of the great depth thereof encountring there nothing at all, upon which it may frike and beat : but it feemeth there is another reason, that waters, the thinner and electer they be, futher to themore from the colde aire; for fooner they be changed and overcome, fo weake and feeble they are : now hard whetstones and little pibbles, doe subtiliat and make the water more thin, in drawing to the bottome where they be, all the groffe and terrestriall substance that trouble it; in fuch fort, as the water by that meanes, being more fine, and confequently weaker, fooner is vanquithed and furmounted by the refrigeration of the aire. To come now unto lead : cold of nature it is, and if it be loaked in vineger, and wrought with it, maketh cerule of all deadly poisons, the coldest. As for the stones aforesaid, by reason of their soliditie, they have an inward coldneffe conceived deeply within them; for as every stone is a piece of earth gathered together and congealed (as it were) by exceeding colde, fo the more compact and matthe that it is, the harder is it congealed, and confequently, so much the colder : no marvell therefore it is, if 20 both plummets of lead and these little hard pibbles aforesaid, by repercussion from themselves, inforce the colductie of water.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that men use to keepe snowe within chasse, light straw, and clothes?

Pon thesewords, that stranger and guest of ours, after hee had paused a while: Lovers (quoth he) above all things, are desirous to talke with their paramours; or if they can not so doe, yet at least wife they will be talking of them; and even so it fareth at this time betweene me and showe; for, because there is none heere in place, nor to be had, I will speake of it; and namely, I would gladly know the reason why it is wont to be kept in such things as be very hot; for we use to cover and swaddle it (as itwere) with straw and chaffe, yea, and to lap it within soft clothes, unshome rugges, and shaggie frize and so preserve it a long time in the owne kinde, without running to water: A woonderfull matter, that the hottest things should preserve those which are extreame colde! And so will I say too (quoth 1) if that were true: but it is farre otherwise, and we greatly deceive our selves, in taking that by and by to be hot it selse, which doth heat another; and namely, considering that we our selves use to say, that one and the selse sament in Vinter keeps us warme, and in Summer cooleth us; like as that nourse in the tragedy, which gave sucked unto 20 interest children:

With mantles course, and little blanquets worne,

She warm's and cool's her pretie babes, new borne. The Almaigns verily put on garments oncly for to defend their bodies against the rigour of cold: the Aethiopians weare them not, but to fave themselves from soultrie heat: wee in Greece use them for the one purpose and the other; and therefore why should wee count them to be hot, because they warme us, rather than cold, for that they coole us? yet of the twaine, if wee would be judged by the outward fense, wee might repute them rather cold than hot: for when we put on our shirts or inner garments first, our naked skinne findes them cold; and so when we goe into our beds, wee feele the sheetes and other clothes of themselves as cold; but afterwards they helpe to heat us; but how? being themselves full of heat, which commeth from us, 50 they hold in our heat, and withall, keepe off the cold aire from our bodies. Thus you fee how they that be licke of the ague, or otherwise, burne with heat, change continually their linnens and other clothes about them, because ever as any fresh thing is laid upon them, they feele it cold and take comfort therein; no fooner is it cast over them, & lien a while, but it becommeth hot, by reason of the ardent heat of their bodies: like as therefore a garment being warmed once by us, doth warme us againe; even so, if it be made cold by fnow, it keepeth it cold reciprocally; but made cold it is by frow, for that there arrieth from it a fubrill spirit, or vapour which doth it; & the fame fo long as it abideth within, holdeth it together concrete and folid in the ownernature; contrariwife, when it is gone, snowe melteth and turneth to water; then that white fresh colour vanisheth away, which came by the mixture of the said spirit & humiditie together, caufing a kinde of froth: when as snowe therefore is lapped within clothes, both the cold is held in thereby, and the outward aire kept out, that it cannot enter in, to thaw and melt the substance of the fnow thus gathered and congealed together; now to this purpose they use such clothes as have not yet come under the fullers hand, nor beene dreffed, burled, thorne, and preffed; and that for the length and drineffe of the shagge haire and flocks, which will not suffer the cloth to lie heavie and preffe downe the fnow, and cruth it being fo fpungious and light as it is: and even fo the straw and chaffe, lying lightly upon it, and fortly touching it, breaketh not the congealed substance thereof; and otherwise besides, the same lieth close and fast together, whereby it 10 is a cause that neither the coldnesse of the snow within, can breath foorth, nor the heat of the aire without enter in. To conclude that the excretion and iffuing out of that fpirit, is the thing that canfeth the snowe to fore-give, to fret, and to melt in the end, is apparent to our outward fenfes, for that the fnow when it thaweth engendreth winde.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Whether wine is to runne thorough a streiner before it be drunke?

Mexical entrandrenowmed philosopher; yet so long, as in that time he had not learned any good thing at his hands, but stollen from him ere he was aware, that, whereby he was offensive and odious unto others; and namely, this bad cultome he had gotten of his mafter, boldly to reproove and correct in all things, those who were in his company: when as therefore we were upon a time with Artifon in his house at supper together, he found fault generally with all the provision, as being too fumptuous, curious, and superfluous; and among other things, hee flatly denied: That wine ought to paffe through a streiner before it be powred foorth and filled to the table; but he faid: It thould be drunke as it came out of the tunne, as Hefodus faid, whiles it hath the strength and natural sforce, and as nature hath given it unto us; for this manner of depuration and clarifying of it by a streiner, first doth enervate and cut as it were the sinewes of 20 the vigour and vertue, yea and quench the native heat that it hath; for it cannot chuse, but the fame will exhale, evaporate, and flie away with the spirit and life thereof being so often filled and powred out of one veffell into another: Againe, (quoth he) it bewraieth a certeine curiofitie, delicacie, and waltfull wantonnesse, thus to consume and spend the good and profitable, for that which is pleafant onely and delectable: for like as to cut cocks for to make them capons, or to gold fowes and make them gualts, that their fleth may be tender, deintie, & (against the nature of it) effeminate, was never furely the invention of men, found in judgement, and of honest behaviour, but of wastfull gluttons, and such as were given over to belly cheere; even so verily they that thus streine wine, doe geld it, they cut the spurres and pare the nailes thereof; if I may be allowed to to speake by way of Metaphor, yea and doc effeminate the same; whiles 40 they are not able either to beare it by reason of their infirmitie and weakenesse, nor drinke it in measure, as they should because of their intemperance: but furely this is a sophisticall device of theirs, and an artificiall tricke to helpe them for to drinke more, and excuse them for powring it downe to merrily; for by this meanes the force of wine they take away, leaving nothing but bare wine; much like unto those who give water boiled unto sicke & weak folke, who cannot endure to drinke it cold, & yet beyond measure defire it; for the very edge of wine they take off, & looke what firength & vertue was in it, the same they rid away and expell quite: that in so doing they marre it, for ever: this may bee a sufficient argument, that wine thus misused, will not last nor continue long in the owne nature, but turne quickly to be very dregs; it lofeth (I fay) the verdure thereof presently, as if it were cut by the roote, from the owne mother, which are the lees thereof. Certes in old time they were wont directly to call wine it felfe wha, that is to faic, Lees: like as we use to tearme a man by a diminutive speech, a soule or an head, giving unto him the denomination of those principall parts onely; and even at this day wee expresse the gathering of the vine fruit, by the verbe revyar: Also in one place Homer called wine Atanguyior, and as for wine it selfe, it was an ordinary thing with him, to call it allow xed in offer, that is to say, blackith and redde, not pale and wanne, by often streining and clenting, such as drifton heere ferwith its with: heerent Ariston laughing at the matter: Not so my good friend (quoth he) not pale, bloudleffe and discoloured: but that which at the very first fight sheweth it selfe pleasant, milde, and lovely, where as you would have us to ingurgitate and drench our felves with a wine as blacke as the night, thicke, groffe, and duskifh, like a datke cloud: the clarifying and purification thereof you condemne, which in truth is nothing elfe, but the calling up as it were by vomit of all the choler that it had, and the discharging it of that which is heavy, heady in it, able to make men ficke and drunken, to the end that being more light, cheerefull, and leffecholerick, it might go into our bodies for to be intermingled with us, even fuch as Homer faith: those worthies and demi-gods, at the warre of Troy, used to drinke: for Homer when he named wine adoona, meant not blackish and thicke, but transparent, neat and bright; for having before attri-10 buted unto braffe, these epithites, επιώρ, and τώροψ, that is to fay, meet for men, & relplendent, he would not have called it ai304 afterwards, if hee had not meant blacke and duskish by that attribute. Like as therefore, the fage Anachar sis, when he reproved some other fashions among the Greeks, commended yet their char-coales, for that leaving the smoake without doores, they brought the fire into the house; even so you my masters, that are wise men and great scholars, may haply blame us in other respects, if you list : but in case when we have rejected and dispatchedaway that which was turbulent, cholericke and furious in wine, we make it then looke clere, and tafte pleafant of it felfe, without any fophilitication; if we do not (I fay) turne or take off the edge quite, and grinde out all the steele (as it were) but rather scouring away rust and canker, fourbith and glaze it, and so present it unto you for to drinke; what hainous fault (I pray you) 20 have we committed ? but you will fay (for footh) it hath more frength in it when it is not thus clarified with freining: and fo (by your leave, good fir) hath a franticke, lunaticke, and madde man, when he is in his fits; but after that he is well purged with Ellebor, or by good regiment in diet, brought to be staied, and reduced into his right minde and senses againe, that violent and extraordinary force is gone, but the true naturall itrength of his owne, and his fetled temperature remaine still in his bodie, together with his right wits; even so this cleansing and clarifying of wine, by ridding away that headinesse which troubleth the braine, and causeth rage, bringeth it to a mildehabit and holfome constitution. Cettes, for mine owne part, I holde there is a great difference betweene affected curiofitie; and fimple neatneffe or elegancie: for those women that paint themselves, perfume and beforecretheir bodies with costly odours, and balmes, 30 or otherwife glitter in their ornaments of golde, and go in their rich purple robes, are by good right thought to be curious, costly, and wanton dames; but if a woman use the bath, wath her skin, annoint her felfe with ordinary oile, yea, and weare the treffes of her owne haire, difoofed and laied in order decently, no man will finde fault with her for it. This distinction in womens dreffing and attire, the poet Homer hath elegantly and properly expressed, in the person of Juno, when the dreffed and trimmed her felfe, in this wife:

With pure Ambrofia fir ft, her corps immortall, from all foile And filth, she cleans' d, then it she did anoim with glibber oile.

40 Thus farre foorth, there is nothing to be seene in her, but carefull diligence and marronlike cleanlinesse; mariewhen the comes to carquans, chaines, borders, and buttons of gold, when the hangs on herpendant earerings most curiously and artificially wroughe, and not staying there, proceeds in the end to take in her hand that enchanting tiffue and girdle of Penus; believe me, heere was superfluous sumptuositie, heere was vanitie and wantonnesse in deed, not befeeming a wife or dame of honour; femblably, they that colour their wine with the sweet wood of aloeor cinomon, and otherwife give it a tincture and pleasant aromatization with saffron, doc even as much as those who curiously tricke up and set out a woman, for to bring her to a banquet, and to profittute her as a courtifan; whereas they that do no more but purge out of it, the groffe filthineffe, and that which is good for nothing, make it by that meanes, pure, holfome and 50 medicinable: for otherwife, if you admit not this, you may aswell say, that all things that you see heere, is nothing but needleffe superfluitie, and affected curiositie, beginning even at the verie house and the furniture thereof: for why is it (will you say) thus pargetted and laied over with a coat of plaifter? why is it open and built with windowes on that fide especially, where it may receive the purest aire and freshest windes, or where it may enjoy the light of the sunne tending Westward toward his setting? why are these pots and drinking cups, every one of them rubbed and feoured on every fide, fo near and cleane, that they glitter and finne againe, so as a man may feehimfelfe in them? And ought (good fir) thefe boules and goblets to be kept cleane without all fifth, or sweet without evill sent; and must the wine which we drinke out of them, be full of filthie dregges, or otherwife stained with any ordure and corruption? but what need I runne thorow all the rest? the very workemanship and painefull labour about the wheat whereof our bread heere is made, what is it els (I befeech you) but cleanfing and purging ? fee you not what a doe there is about it before it be brought to this passe? for there must be not onely threshing, fanning, winnowing, riddling, grinding, fifting, ferling and boulting out the branne from the flowre, while it is in the nature of come and meale; but also it requireth to bekned and wrought, that no roughnessermaine behind in the dough; so that being thus united and concorporatinto a lumpe of paste, it may be made bread fit for our eating: what absurditie then is there in this. if straining and cleanling of wine riddeth it from that feculent and dreggie matter, as if it were 10 course brannes or grosse grounds, especially seeing the doing of it, is not any wife chargeable nor laborious?

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What is the cause of that extraordinarie hunger, called Buriu ?

"Here is a folemne facrifice used among us, received by tradition from our ancestors, which the provoit or chiefe governour of the city for the time being, performeth at publicke the altar, but other private citizens befides, in their own houses: and this solemnity is called, The ba. 20 nishment of Bulimos, that is to say, of hunger or famine: and the maner is at such a time, for eyerie mafter of an house, to take one of his flaves, and when he hath swinged him well with weeds of the withie called Chast-tree, to thrust him out of the doores by the head and shoulders, faving withall: Out with * Bulimos , but come in wealth and health. Now that yeere wherein I was provoft, many there were at my facrifice, invited to the feaft; and after we had performed all ceit feemeth by remonies and complements there o belonging, and were fet at the table, fome question there was moved, first, as touching the vocable it selfe swips, what it should signific, and afterwards of the words uttered unto the flave when he is driven out; but most of all, of that maladie so called, and of the accidents and circumstances thereof. As for the tearme Bulimos, every man in maner, was of opinion, that it betokened a great and publike famine, but especially we Greeks of Aco. 30 lia, who in our dialect use the letter $*\pi$ for β , for we commonly do not say, Bulimos, but Pulimos, as if it were Polylimos or Polilimos, that is to fay, a great famine, or a generall famine thorowout the citie : and it feemed unto us, that Babroftis was another thing different from it; and namely, by a found argument which we had from the Chronicles penned by Metrodorus, as touching the acts of Ionia, wherein thus much he writeth: That the Smyrneans who in old time were Acolians, use to facrifice unto Bubrostis, a blackebull, as an holocaust or burnt offering, which they cut into pieces with the hide, and so burne it all together. But forasmuch as all maner of hunger refembleth a maladie (and principally, this called Basing) which commeth upon a man when his bodie is affected with some unkind and unnaturall indisposition, it seemeth that by great reason, as they oppose wealth to povertie, so they set health against sicknesse: & like as 40 the heaving and overturning of the stomacke, a disease when as men are said Naurian, tooke that name first upon occasion of those who are in a ship, & when they saile or row, sal to be stomack ficke, and are apt to cast: but afterwards by custome of speech, who so ever feele the like passion of the Homacke, and a disposition to vomit, are said round, that is to saie, to be sea sicke; even fo the verbe βάλιμαϊν, and the noune βίλιμας, taking the beginning as is before faid, there is come unto us, and fignifieth a dogs-appetite or extraordinary hunger. And to this purpose wee all spake, and made a contribution as it were of all our reasons, to make out a common supper or collation: but when we came to touch the cause of this disease; the first doubt that arose among us was this; that they should most be surprized with this maladie, who travell in great snowes: like as Brutus did of late daies; who when he marched with his army from Dyrrhachium to Apol- 50 lonia, was in danger of his life, by occasion of this infirmitie: it was a time when the snowe lay very deepe ; in which march he went fuch a pace, that none of those who had the carriage of victuals overtooke him, or came neere unto him: now when as he fainted fo for feeblenesse of ftomacke, that he now fwo oned and was ready to give up the ghost; the souldiers were forced to runne in haste unto the walles of the city, and to call for a loase of bread, unto their very enemies, warding and keeping the watch upon the walles, which when they had prefently gotten, therewith they recovered Brutus: whereupon afterwards, when he was mafter of the towne, hee grievoully intreated all the inhabitants, for the courtefie which he had received from thence. This dileafe hapneth likewise to horses and asses, especially when they have either figges or apples a load: but that which of all the rest is most woonderfull, there is no manner of food or sustenance in the world, that in such a case so some recovereth the strength, not of men onely, but of labouring beafts also, as to give them bread, so that if they eat a morfell thereof, bee it never so little, they will presently finde their feet, and be able to walke.

Hereupon enfued filence for a while; and then I (knowing well enough, how much the arguments of ancient writers are able to content and fatisfie fuch as are but dull and flow of conceit; but contrarywife unto those that be studious, ripe of wit and diligent, the same make an overto ture and give courage and heart to fearch and inquire further into the truth) called to minde and delivered before them all a fentence out of Aristotle, who affirmeth: That the stronger the cold is without, the more is the heat within our bodies, and so consequently, causeth the greater colliquation of the humours in the interior parts. Now if these humours thus resolved, take a course unto the legges, they cause lassitudes and heavinesse; if the rheume fall upon the principall fountaines and organs of motion and respiration, it bringeth faintings and seeblenesse. I had no sooner said, but as it is wont in such cases to fall out, some tooke in hand to oppugne these reasons; and others againe to defend and mainteine the same: and Soclarus, for his part: The words (quoth he) in the beginning of your speech were very well placed, and the ground furely laid; for in truth the bodies of those who walke in snow, are evidently cold without, and 20 exceedingly closed fast and knit together; but that the inward heat occasioned thereby, should make fuch a colliquation of humors, and that the same should possesse and seize upon the principall parts and inflruments of respiration, is a bold and rash conceit, and I cannot see how it should fland: Yet rather would I thinke, that the heat being thus kept in, and united together, and fo by that meanes fortified, confumeth all the nourishment; which being spent, it cannot chuse, but the said heat also must needs languish even as a fire without sewell; and hecreupon it is, that fuch have an exceeding hunger upon them, and when they have eaten never folittle, they come prefently to themselves againe; for that food is the maintenance of naturall heat: Then Cleamenes the physician: This word Aquis, that is to fay, hunger (quoth hee) in the compound Bushines, fignifieth nothing elfe, but is crept into the composition of it I know 30 not how, without any reason at all; like as in the verbe (), which betokeneth to devoure, or fwallow downe folid meat, with that is to fay, to drinke, hath no fense or congruitie at all; no more than words, that is to fay, to bend downward, or fall groveling, hath any thing to doe in the verbe arasin his, that fignifieth to rife aloft, or to hold up the head as birds doe in drinking; for furely 6 exigues or 6 exigues, feemeth not unto me to be any hunger, as many have taken it; but it is a passion of the stomacke, which concurring indeed with hunger, engendreth a fainting of the heart, and an aptneffe to fwoone: and even as odors and fmels doe fetch againe and helpe those that be in a swoone; so bread doth remedie and recover those who are feeble and faint, by this Bulimia, not for that fuch have need of fustenance; (for let it be never so little that they take, they are revived and refreshed thereby) but because it setcheth the spirits againe, 40 and recalleth the power and strength of nature that was going away. Now that this Bulimos or Bulimia, is a faintnesse of the heart, and no hunger at all, appearethevidently by an accident that we observe in those draught beasts, whereof we spake before, subject to this infirmitie; for the fmell of figges and apples worketh not in them any defect or want of nourishment; but causeth rather a gnawing in the mouth of the maw, a plucking (I fay) and contention in the brim of the stomacke. As for me, on the otherside, although I thought these reasons indifferently well alledged; yet I was of opinion, that if I went another way to worke, and argued from a contratie principle, I could mainteine a probabilitie, and uphold, that all this might proceed rather by way of condensation, than rarefaction: for the spirit of breath that passeth from the fnowe in manner of fubtile aire, is the most cutting edge, and finest decision or scale, comming 50 from the concretion of that meteor or congealed substance, which I wot not how, is of so keene and piercing a nature, that it will strike thorough, not flesh onely, but vessels also of silver and braffe: for we fee that they are not able to conteine and hold fnowe in them, but when it commeth to mele, it confumeth away, and covereth the outfide of fuch veffels, glazed over with a most subtill moisture, as cleere as ife, which no doubt the said spirit, breath, aire, or edge, (call it what you will) left behinde it, when it passed through those insensible pores of the said veffels; this spirit then thus penetrative and quicke as a flame, when it smiteth upon their bodies who goe in fnowe, feemeth to fcorch and findge the superficiall outside of the skinne, in cutting and making way thorough into the flesh in manner of fire; whereupon ensuetha great rarefaction of the body, by meanes whereof, the inward heat flying foorth, meeteth with the coldspirit or aire without in the superficies which doth extinguish and quench it quite, and thereby yeeldeth a kinde of small sweat or dew, standing with drops upon the outside, and so the naturall strength of the bodie is resolved and consumed: now if a man at such a time stirre not, but restsfill, there is not much naturall heat of the bodie that passeth thus away; but when motion by walking or otherwise doth quickly turne the nutriment of the bodie into heat, and withall the faid hear flieth outward thorough the skinne thus rarefied; how can it otherwife be, but all at once there should ensue a great ecclipse (as it were) and generall defect of the naturall powers? And that true it is, that the fame doth not alwaies close, knit, and binde together 10 the bodie, but otherwise melt and rarefie the same, it appeareth manifestly by this experience; that in tharpe and nipping winters, many times plates or plummets of leade are knowen to five at and melt: this observation also, that many do fall into this infirmitie called Bulimia, who are not hungrie, doth argue rather a defluxion and dilatation, than a constipation of the bodie; which no doubt in Winter is rarefied by that fubtiltie of the spirit, whereof I spake, and especially, when travell and ftirring, doth sharpen and subtiliat the heat within the body: for being thus made thin, and wearied befides, it flieth forth in great abundance, and fo is differfed thorowout the body. As for those figs and apples, it is like, that they do exhale and evaporate such a spirit, as doth subtiliate and diffipate the naturall heat of labouring beasts that carrie them: for it standeth by good reason in nature, that as some be revived and refreshed with one thing, and some 20 with another; so contrariwise, some things do diffipate the spirits in one, and others in another,

THE NINTH QUESTION.

Why the poet Homer to other liquors giveth proper epithites and attributes, and oile onely be callethmoist?

Here was a great question also another time: What might the reason be, that there being fo many liquors as there are, the poet Homer is wont to adorne every one of the with their feverall and proper epithits, and namely, to call milke, white; hony, yellow; and wine, red; but 20 oile alone he ordinarily noteth by an accident common unto them all, and tearmeth it moift? to which, this answere was made: That as a thing is named, Most sweet, which is altogether fweet; and Most white, which is altogether white; (now you must understand, that a thing is said to be fuch and fuch altogether, when there is nothing mixed with it of a contrary nature) even fowe are to call that Moift, which hath not one jot of drineffe mingled among, and fuch a qualitie doth properly agree unto oile: for first and formost, the polithed smoothnesse that it hath, doth shew that the parts thereof be all uniforme and even thorowout; and feele it wherefoever you will, you shall finde it equall in every respect, and one part accordeth with another so, as the whole agreeth to withstand both mixture and colde: besides, to the cie sight it yeeldeth a most pure and cleere mirror to behold the face in ; for why? there is no roughnesse nor ruggednesse 40 in it, to diffipate the reflexion of the light; but by reason of the humiditie or moisture thereof, all the light (how little foever it be) doth rebound and returne againe upon the fight: whereas contrariwife, milke alone, of all other liquots, fendeth backe none of these images and resemblances, like as a mirror or looking-glaffe doth, for that it hath a great deale of terrestrial subftance in it: moreover, of all liquid matters, oile onely maketh the least noise when it is stirred or shaken, for that it is so moist thorowout; whereas in other liquors, the parts which be hard and carthy, in running, flowing, and moving, do encounter, fruite and hit one another, and fo confequently make a noife, by reason of their weight and soliditie: and that which more is, it remaineth simple of it selfe, without admitting any mixture or composition with any other liquor whatfoever, for that it is fo firme, compact, or fast; and good reason, for it hath no wandering 50 holes here and there, betweene terrene and hard parts, which might receive any other fibstance within: moreover, all the parts of oile, for that they be so like one unto the other in a continued union, do joine paffing well together, however they will not fort with other liquors; and by reafon of this tenuitie and continuitie, when oile doth froth or fome, it suffereth no winde or spirit to enter in : furthermore, this humiditie of oile, is the cause that it feedeth and nourisheth fire, for mainteined it is with nothing that is not moift, and this is the onely liquor that may be burned, as we may see evidently in the wood which we dayly butne; namely, that the airie sub-flance therein, flieth up in smoake; that which is terrestriall, turneth into ashes; and there is nothing but that, which is moift or liquid, that flameth out, burneth light, and is confumed cleaner for why? fire hath no other fuftenance to feed upon; and therefore, water, wine, and other liquors, stand much upon a feculent, muddie & earthly matter, which is the cause that if a man do cast them upon a fire or flame, by their asperitie, they difgregate, and by their weight, choke & quench it; but oile, (for that most properly and fineerely it is mosst, and by reason also that it is to fubtile) foone receiveth alteration, and being overcome by the fire, is quickly inflamed; but the greatest argument to prove the moisture of oile, is this, that a little thereof will spread and go a great way; for neither honie, nor water, nor any other liquid thing whatfocver, in fo finall a to quantitie can be dilated and drawen fo far as oile, but for the most part, they are spent and gone by occasion of their ficeity: and verily, oile being so pliable and ready to be drawen every way, foft also and glib, is apt to run all over the body, when it is anointed, it floweth and spreadeth a great way, by meanes of the humiditie of all parts which are fo moveable, in fuch fort, as it continueth a long time, and hardly will be rid away, it sticketh and cleaveth so fast: for a garment, if it be dipped and drenched all over in water, will foone be drie againe; but the spots and staines with oile, require no finall adoe to be scoured out and cleanfed, for that it taketh so deepe an impreffion; and all because it is so fine, subtile and exceeding moist and Aristotle himselfe faith, that even wine also being delaied with water, if it be gotten into a cloth, is hardly fetched out, for that now it is more fubtile than before, and pierceth farther within the pores thereof.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause, that the sless of beasts killed for sacrifice, if it be hung upon a fig-tree, becommeth more tender within a while?

Rifton had a cooke commended highly by those who used to sup with his master, for sin-A gular skill in his art; and namely, for that among all other viands which he handled and dreffed paffing well, hee ferved up a cocke unto the table before us, newly killed and facrificed unto Hercules, the fleth whereof did eat as short and tender as if he had hung by the heeles a day 30 or two before : and when Ariston faid that it was an easie matter so to doe; and that there needed no more, but prefently when his throat was cut, to hang him upon a fig-tree, we tooke occasion thereby to fearch into the cause of this effect: Certes, that there passeth from the figge-tree a tharpe aire and ftrong spirit, our verice eielight will testifie; as also the common speech that goeth of a bull, who if he be tied to a fig-tree, how wilde, favage and fell foever he was before, will foone be mecke and quiet, abide to be handled, and in one word, lay downe his furious rage, as ifit were cleane daunted: But the principall cause hecreof was attributed to the acrimonie and sharpe qualitie of the wood, for the tree is more succulent than any other; infomuch as the verie figge it felfe, the wood also and the lease, be all full of juice; also whiles it burneth in the fire, there ariseth from it a bitter bitting smoake, very hurtfull to the cies; and when it is burnt, 40 there is made of the aftes a strong leie, very deterfive and scouring, which bee all signes of heat: and moreover, whereas the milkie juice of the fig-tree will cause milke to turne and cruddle, (fomefay,) it is not by the inequality of the figures of milke, which are comprehended and glewed as it were therewith, namely, when the united and round parts thereof are cast up to the superficies, but for that the foresaid juice by meanes of heat, doth resolve the waterie substance of the liquor, which is not apt to gather confistence and be thickned: moreover, this is another figne thereof, that notwithstanding the juice be in some fortsweet, yet it is good for nothing, and maketh the woorst and most unpleasant drinke in the world; for it is not the inequalitie therof, that causeth the smooth parts to gather a crud, but the heat which maketh the cold and cruddie partes to coagilate. A good proofe of this we have from falt, which ferveth to 50 this purpose, because it is hot; but it impeacheth this interlacing and glutinous binding pretended, for that by nature it doth rather diffolve and unbinde. To come against herefore unto the question in hand; the fig-tree sendeth from it a sharpe piercing and incisive spirit; and this is it, that doth make tender, and as it were concoct the fleih of the faide foule: and as great an effect should one see, if he had put him in a heape of wheat or such corne, or covered him all over with falt nitre; and all by reason of heat: and that this is true that wheat is hot, may be gathered by the veffels full of wine, which are hidden within a heape of wheat; for a man thall foone finde that the wine will be all gone.

The Proeme.

He Romans have commonly in their mouthes, ô Sostus Senecio, the speech of a pleasant conceited man and a curteous, who she he had supped alone at any time, was wont thus to say: Eaten I have this day, but not supped; shewing thereby, that meales would never be without mirth and good companie, to seafon the same, and to give a pleasant taste unto the viands. Euenus verily used to say: That sire was the best sauce in the world: and as for salt, Homer called it divine; and most men gave it the name of the Graces; for that being mingled or otherwise taken with most of our meates, it gives a kinde of grace, and commendeth them as pleafant and agreeable to the stomacke. But to fay a truth, the most divine sauce of a table or a supper, is the presence of a friend, a familiar, and one whom a man knoweth well; not so much for that he eateth and drinketh with us, but rather because as he is partaker of our speeches, so he doth participate his owne unto us, especially if in such reciprocal talke there be any good discourses, and those which be profitable, fit, and pertinent to the purpose; for much babling indeed and lavish speech that many men use at the boord; and in their cuppes, bewrateth their vame folly, driving them oftentimes into inconsiderate and passionate fits, and to perverse lewdnesses; and therefore no lesse requisite it is, and needfull, to make choise of speeches, than or friends to be admitted to our table: and in this case we ought both to thinke, and also to say, contrary unto the auncient Lacedamonians, who when they received any yoong man or firanger into their guild-halles, called Phiditia, where they used to dine and suppe in publicke together, would show unto them the dores of the place and say: Out at these there never goeth word: but we acquainting our selves with good words, and pertinent speeches at the table, in our discourse, are wilking and content, that the same should go forth all, and be set abroad to all persons what soever; for that the matters and arguments of our talke are void of lastivious wantonnesse, without backbiting, staundering, malice, and illiberall seurisitie, not be seeming men of good education: as a man may well judge by these examples following in the Decade of this seventh booke.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Magainst those who reproove Plato, for laying: That our drinke passeth by the lungs.

Thapned one day in fummer time, that one of the company where I was at fupper; came out with this verie of Aleam, which every man hath readily in his mouth, and pronounced it with a loud voice:

That is to fay:

Now drinke and wet thy langs with wine,

For why? the hot Dogge-flarre doth shine.

No marvell (quoth Niciau) then, (a phyfician of the city Nicopoliu): if a poet as Alexan was, were ignorant in that, which Plate a great philosopher knew not: and yet Alexan in some for may be borne our infaying so, and relieved in this wise; namely, that the lungs being so necre as they are unto the stomacke, enjoy the benefit of the liquid drinke, and therefor it was not improperly said: That they be wette and soked therewith: but this samous philosopher by expresse words hath left in writing, that our drinke directly passen for the most patt, thorow the lungs: so that he hath given us no meanes of any probabilitie in the world, to excuse and defend him, would wenever so faine, so grossless his errour, and ignorance so palpable for in the first place, (considering it is necessary, that the drie nourithment should be mingled with the liquid) plaine it is, that there ought to be one common vessel, which is the stomacke, for to receive them both together; to the end, that it might transmit and send into the bellie and panch beneath, the meat well foaked and made foft: besides, seeing that the lungs be smooth and every way compact and solide, how is it possible, that is a man drinke a supping or grewell, wherein there is a little meale or slower, it should get thorow, and not stay there? for this is the doubt that Erassistant wobjected very well against Plato. Moreover, this philosopher having considered most parts of the bodie, and searched by reason, wherefore they were made; and being desirous to know (as became a man of his profession) for what use nature had framed every one, he might have thought thus much: That the we zill of the throat, otherwise called Epiglottis, was not made for nothing and to no purpose; but ordeined for this, that when we swallow any food, it might keepe downe and close the conduit of the winde-pipe, for seare that nothing might and that way upon the lights; which part no doubt, is woonderfully troubled, tormented, and torne (as it were) with the cough, when any little thing is gotten thirter, where the breath doth passie to and fro: Now this wezill abovesaid, being placed just in the middes, and indifferent to serve both passages, when we speake, doth shut the mouth of that conduit or wezand that leadeth to by way of respiration. Furthermore, thus much we know by experience: That those who take their drinke leasurely, letting it go downe by little and little, have moister bellies than those who so power their liquor downe at once; for by this meanes the drinke is caried directly into the bladder, passing away apace and with violence, making no stay; whereas otherwise, it restet honger with the meat, which it soaketh gently, and is better mingled and incorporate into it; but wee should never see the one or the other; if at the first, our drinke and meat went apart, and had their severall waies by themselves, when wee swallow them downe; for wee conjoine our meat and drinke together, sending them both one after another, to the end that the liquor might serve in stead of a waggon, according as Erasistratus was woont to say, for to carrie and convey the meat and the nourillment into all parts.

the stomacke; and as we either eat or drinke, falleth likewise upon the winde-pipe that goeth to the lungs, keeping that passage pure and cleere, for the winde and breath to go and come at case,

After that Nicias had made this discourse, Protogenes the Grammatian added moreover, and feconded him in this wise, saying: That the poet Homer, first of all other, saw well enough; and observed, that the stomacke was the proper receptacle and vessell to receive our food, as the winde-pipe, which they called in olde time, as degrees, to admit the winde and the breath: and hereupon it came, that they used to call those who had big and loud voices, it considered the state is to say, wide-throated, meaning by the throat, the winde-pipe, and not the gullet, wezand or gorge: and therefore when he had said of Achilles, charging Hetter with his launce:

A speeding wound and deadly thrust.

A little after he added, and faid:

upon these words, all was husht for a time, untill Floras tooke upon him to speake in the behalfe of Plato: And shall we thus indeed suffer this philosopher (quoth he) to be condemned, when he is not heere in place to answere for himsels? No (said I) that we will not; but we will joine unto Plato, the poet Homer also, and put them both together; who is so farre off from averting and turning away the liquor from the wind-pipe, that he sendeth both drinke and meat 20 together out of it; for these be his words to that effect:

tinlesse peradventure some one will dare to say, that this Cyclops Polyphemua, as he had but one eie in his head, so likewise he had no more but one conduit for his meat, drinke, and voice; or els mainteine that in this place the poet, by eap, meaneth the stomacke, and not the windepipe or wezill pipe, which hath bene named so, by all men generally, aswell ancient as moderne writers: and this cite I not for want of testimonies, but as induced thereto for the truethsake: for there be witnesses enough to depose on Plates side, and those of good credit and authority: for let Euposis the comicall poet goby, if you please, who in his comedie named Colaces, that is 30 to say, Flatterers or Parasites, thus saith:

For why? this rule and precept streightly gave Protagoras: To drinke; that men migh have Their lungs well wet and drencht with liguor cleere, Erethat in skie the Dog-starre doth appeere.

And passe-by, if you will, that elegant and sweet conceited poet Eratostkenes, whose words be these:

With good meere-wine do not forges The bottome of thy lungs to wet.

Euripides verily, who in expresse tearmes writeth thus in one tragedie,

The wine sought all the conduits round about,

And so did passe the lung-pipes cleane throughout. sheweth evidently, that he was quicker sighted than Eristratus, and saw further into the thing than he did; for well he knew that the lungs have many pipes in them, and be (as it were) bored thorow with many holes, by which the liquor passeth: for our winde or breath had no need of fuch conduits and small pipes to send it out; but the lungs were made spungeous and full of cavernosities or holes, in maner of a colander or strainer, for liquors, yea, and other matters that go downe together with the liquors: neither is it more unmeet (my good Nicias) for the lungs to transmit and give passage unto meale, or any good thicke grewell, than for the stomackes for our stomacke or gullet is not, as some thinke, smooth and slipperie, but hath a kinde of roughnesse and certeine rugged wrinkles, of which by all likelihood, some small crummes and parcels of our meat doe take holde, and flicking thereto, are not at once swallowed downe, and caried away: but a man is not able indeed to affirme Categorically, either the one or the other; for nature is so wittie and industrious in all her operations, that no eloquence will serve to expresse the same; neither is it possible to explicate and declare sufficiently the exquisit workmanship and perfection of those principall instruments which she useth, I meane those that serve for the spirit or breath and the heat: howbeit, in the favour of Plato I am willing to citemore wit-neffes, to wit, Philistion the Locrien, a very auncient writer, and renowmed for his excellencie in your arte of phylicke; and Hippocrates of Cos: for these men have allowed no other way nor paffage for our drinke than Plate hath: and as for the wezill that you ftand fo much upon, and have in fuch reputation, Dioxippus was not ignorant of it: but he faith, that about it, the humiditie or liquor in swallowing is divided and severed, and so glideth or slippeth into the winderpipe; but the meat rolleth into the stomacke, and within the said winde-pipe, there falleth no patt of the meat; howbeit the ftomacke receiveth together with the dry food some partals of the drinke or liquor mingled among ; and this feemeth to ftand well with reason : for the wezill is set before the winde-pipe as a fence or lidde, to the end that by little and little, the drinke 10 might gently runne as by a fireiner into it, not fuddenly and at once with a violence, for feare that if it were in that manner powred in, it would either stop or else fore trouble and impeach the breath; which is the reason that birds have no such slappe or wezill, and nature hath ordeined none for them, for they neither draw in by gulpes, nor lappe their drinke, but dipping their bils let it downe foftly, and fo wet their throat: And thus much may ferve for witneffes in the behalfe of Plate. To come now unto reason: First and foremost our very sense doth confirme the fame that he hath faid : for letthe faid wezill-pipe be wounded, no liquor will goe downe, but as if a conduit pipe were cut in funder, we may fee all of it to breake foorth and run out at the wound, notwithstanding the wefand or stomacke be found and whole: moreover we all know by experience, that upon the malady called Perippeumonia, that is to fay, the inflamma-20 tion of the lungs, there followeth a most ardent thirst, by occasion of drought or heat, or else fome other cause, which with the said inflammation engendreth also an appetite to drinke: furthermore, there is another argument, stronger and more evident than this, namely; that those creatures which have either no lights or verie smal, have no need of drink, nor desire it; for every part of the body hath a certeine naturall appetite to doe that worke or function, unto which it is ordeined; and looke what creatures so ever have no such parts, neither have they use for them, nor any defire to that operation which is performed by them: In fum, if it were not so as Plato faith; it may feeme that the bladder was made in vaine; for if the stomacke receive drinke as wel as meat, & fende it downe into the belly, what needed the superfluitie or excrement of the liquid food, that is to fay drinke, any peculiar receptacle or paffage by it felfe; for sufficient it 30 had beene to have had one common, as well for the one as the other, to discharge the excrements of both, by one spout as it were into the same draught: but now it is otherwise: the bladderis by it felfe, and the guts apart by themselves; for that the one nutriment goeth from the lungs; the other from the stomacke, parting immediatly, and taking their severall waies at the very swallowing. And heereupon it is that in the liquid superfluitie which is wine, there appear reth nothing of the drie, refembling it either in colour or fent; and yet naturall reason would, that if it were mixed and tempered with it in the belly and the guttes, it should bee filled with the qualities thereof, and could not possibly be excluded out of the body so pure and voide of ordure. * Againe, it was never knowen, that a stone hath been eingendred in the paunch or "Untrue. guts; and yet good reason it were, that moisture there should congeale or gather to a stone as 40 it doth within the bladder; if true it were that all our drinke descended into the belly and the guts, by paffing thorough the stomacke onely: but it seemeth that the stomacke incontinently when we begin to drinke, fucketh and draweth out of that liquor which paffeth along by it in the wezill pipe, as much onely as is needfull and requifit for it, to mollifie and to convert into anutritive pap or juice the folid meat; and so it leaveth no liquid excrement at all: whereas the lungs, so some as they have distributed both spirit and liquor from thence, unto those parts that have need thereof, expell and fend out the rest into the bladder: Well, to conclude, more likelihood there is of truth by farre, in this, than in the other: and yet peradventure the truth in deed of these matters lieth hidden still and incomprehensible; in regard whereof, it is not meet to proceed so rashly and insolently to pronounce sentence against a man, who as well for his

THE SECOND QUESTION.

What is meant in Placo by this word x segro flows, and why those seeds which in sowing light upon oxe hornes, besome hard and not easie to be concocted.

Here hath been calwaies much question and controversie about Kegga Bissos, and Arreduss, not who or what is so called (for certeine it is, that feeds falling upon ox hornes, according to the common opinion, yeeld ffute, hard and not eafily concocted; whereupon by waie of Metaphor, a stubborne and stiffe-necked person, men use to tearme Keega stoor, and arreduced but 10 as touching the cause, why such graine or feeds hitting against the hornes of an ox, should come to be so untoward: And many times refused I have, yea, and denied my friends to search into the thing; the rather for that Theophrastus hath rendred so darke and obscure a reason. raunging it among thany other examples which he hath gathered and put downe in writing of ftrange and wonderfull effects, whereof the cause is hard to be found; namely: That an henne after that the hath laid an egge, turneth round about, and with a fefture or straw seemeth to purific and halow her-felfe, and the egge also; that the sea-calse or seale * consumeth the pine, and yet swalloweth it not downe; semblably, that stagges hide their hornes within the ground and burie them; likewife, that if one goat hold the herbe Eryngium, that is to fay, fea-holly, in his oxoulin Some mouth, all the rest of the slocke will stand still: Among these miraculous effects, Theophranu 20 (I fay) hath put downe the feeds falling upon the hornes of an ox; a thing knowen for certeine to be so, but whereof, the cause is most difficult, if not impossible to be delivered. But at a supper in the citie Delphi, as I fat one day, certeine of my familiar friends came upon me in this maner, that feeing not onely, according to the common faying:

From hellie full best counsell doth arise, And fureft plots men in that cafe devise.

fhould feeme, but also we are more ready with our questions, and lesse to seeke for answeres, when as wine is in our heads, caufing us to be forward in the one, and resolute in the other; they would request me therefore to fay formewhat unto the forefaid matter in question: howbeit, I held off still, as being well backed with no bad advocates, who tooke my part, and were ready to defend my cause; 20 and by name, Euthydemus my colleague or companion with me in the facerdotall dignitie, and nall to be cor- Patrocless my fonne in law, who brought foorth and alledged many fuch things, observed aswell in agriculture, as by hunters; of which fort is that which is practifed by those who take upon them skill in the forefight and prevention of haile; namely, that it may be averted and turned afide, by the bloud of a mould warpe, or linnen ragges, stained with the monethly purgations of women: Item, that if a man take the figs of a wilde fig tree, and tie them to a tame fig-tree of the orchard, it is a meanes that the fruit of the faid fig-tree shall not fall, but tarrie on, and ripen kindly: also that stags weepe falt teares, but wilde bores shed sweet drops from their eies, when they be taken: For if you will fet in hand to feeke out the cause hereof (quoth Euthydemus) then presently you must render a reason also, of smallach and cumin; of which, the former, if it be 40 troden under foot and trampled on in the comming up, men have an opinion it will grow and prosper the better; and as for the other, they sow it with curses and all the sowless words that can be devised, and so it will spring and thrive best. Tush (quoth Florus) these be but to ics and ridiculous mockeries, to make sport with: but as touching the cause of the other matters above specified, I would not have you to reject the inquisition thereof, as if it were incomprehensible. Well (quoth I) now I have found a medicine and remedie, which if you do use, you shall bring this man with reason to our opinion, that you also your selfe may solve some of these questions propounded. It seemeth unto me therefore, that it is colde, that causeth this rebellious hardneffe aswell in wheat and other corne, as also in pulse; namely, by preffing and driving in, their folid substance, untill it be hard againe; for heat maketh things soft and easie to be dissolved: 50 and therefore they do not well and truely, in alledging against Homer, this versicle:

šτος φέρς κχι άρουρα.

The yeere, not field, Doth beare and yeeld.

For furely those fields and grounds which are by nature hot, if the aire with all affoord a kinde and seasonable temperature of the weather, bring forth more tender fruits: and therefore such corne or feed which prefently and directly from the husbandmans hands, lighteth upon the ground, ground, entring into it, and there covered, finde the benefit both of the heat and moilture of the foile, whereby they foone fourt and come up; whereas those which as they be call, do hit upon the hornes of the bealts, they meet not with that direct positure or rectitude called Eugeneraum, which Hefindus commendeth for the best, but falling downe(I wot not how) and missing of their right place, feem rather to have bene flung at a venture, than orderly fowen; & therfore the cold comming upon them, either marreth and killeth them outright, or els lighting upon their naked husks, cauteth them to bring fruit that proveth bard and churlifh, as drie as chips, and fuch as will not be made tender & fidow, without they be freeped in some liquor, as having not bene covered but with their owne bare coats: for this you may observe ordinarily in ftones, that 10 those parts and sides which lie covered deeper within the ground, as if they were of the nature of plants, be more frim and tender, as being preserved by heat, than those outward faces which lie ebbe or above the earth; and therefore skilfull masons digge deeper into the ground for stones which they meane to fquare, worke and cut, as being melowed by the heat of the earth; whereas those which lie bare aloft and exposed to the aire, by reason of the cold, prove hard and not easie to be wrought or put to any use in building : femblably, even come, if it continue long in the openaire, and cocked upon the flacks or threshing floores, is more hard and rebellious, than that which is foone taken away and laid up in garners; yea, and oftentimes the very winde which bloweth whiles it is fanned or winnowed, maketh it more fough and stubburne, and all by reason of cold : whereof the experience, by report, is to be seene about Philippi a citie in Micedonie, 20 wherethe remedie is, to let come lie in the chaffe: and therefore you must not thinke it strange, if you heare husbandmen report; that of two lands or ridges, running directly one by the fide of another, the one should yeeld corne tough and hard; the other, fort and tender; and that which more is, beanes lying in one cod, some be of one fort, and some of another, according as they have felt (more or leffe) either of cold or of winde.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the cause, that the mids of wine, the top of oile, and the bottome of honie, is best?

Y wives father Alexion, one day laughed at Hesiodus, for giving counsell to drinke wine Instille, when the vessell is either newly pierced or runneth low; but to forbeare, when it is halfe drawen; his words are thefe:

When tierce is full, or when it draweth low, Drinke hard; but fare, to mids when it doth grow.

For that the wine there, is most excellent : For who knoweth not (quoth he) that wine is best in themiddle, oile in the top, and honic in the bottome of the vessel? but Hesiodaus (for sooth) adviseth us to let the mids alone, and to stay untill it change to the woorse and be sowre; namely, when it runneth low and little is left in the veffell. Which words being paffed, the companie there present, bad Hesiodus farewell, and betooke themselves into searching out the cause of this 40 difference and divertitie in these liquors. And first, as touching the reason of honie, we were not very much troubled about it, because there is none in maner, but knoweth that a thing, the more rare or hollow the substance of it is, the lighter it is said to be; as also, that folid, massie, and compact things, by reason of their weight, do settle downward; in such fort, that although youturne a veffell up-fide-downe; yet within a while after, each part returneth into the owne place againe; the heavie finks downe, the light flores above; and even fo, there wanted no arguments, to yeeld a found reason for the wine also : for first and formost, the vertue and strength of wine, which is the heat thereof, by good right gathereth about the middes of the veffell, and keepeth that part of all others best; then the bottome for the vicinitie unto the lees is naught: lastly, the upper region, for that it is next to the aire, is likewise corrupt; for this we all know, 50 that the winde or the aire is most dangerous unto wine, for that it altereth the nature thereof; and therefore we use to set wine vessels within the ground, yea, and to stop and cover them with all care and diligence, that the least aire in the world come not to the wine; and that which more is, wine will nothing to foone corrupt when the veffels be full, as when it hath beene much drawen and groweth low, for the aircentreth in apace proportionably to the place that is void; the wine taketh windethereby and to much the fooner chaungeth; whereas if the veffels be full, the wine is able to mainteine it felfe, not admitting from without much of that which is adverte unto it, or can hurr it greatly. Rrr 2

But

But the confideration of oile put us not to a little debate in arguing: One of the companie faid: That the bottome of oile was the woorst, because it was troubled and muddy with the leis or mother thereof: and as for that which is above, he faid: It was nothing better than the rest, but feeined onely fo, because it was farthest remooved from that which might hurt it: Others attributed the cause unto the soliditie thereof, in which regard, it will not well be mingled or incorporate with any other liquor, unleffe it be broken or divided by force and violence; for fo compact it is, that it will not admit the very aire to enter in it, or to be mingled with it, but keepeth it felle a part, and rejecteth it by reason of the fine smoothnesse, and contemptie of all the parts, so that lesse altered it is by the aire, as being not predominant over it : neverthelesse, it feemeth that Arifotle doth contradict and gainfay this reason, who had observed (as he saith himselfe) that the oile is sweeter, more odoriferous, and in all respects better, which is kept in veffels not filled up to the brim; and afterwards afcribeth the cause of this meliority or betternesse unto the aire: For that (faith he) there entereth more aire into a vessell that is halfe emptie, and hath the more power: Then I wot not well (faid I) but what and if in regard of one and the fame facultie and power, the aire bettereth oile, and impaireth the goodnesse of wine? for we know that age is hurtfull to oile, and good for wine; which age the aire taketh from oile, becanfe that which is cooled continueth still yoong and fresh; contrariwise that which is pent in and fluffed up, as having no aire, foone ageth and waxeth old: great apparence there is therefore of truth, that the aircapproching neere unto oile, and touching the superficies thereof, keepeth it fresh and yoong still: And this is the reason, that of wine the upmost part is woorst, 20 but of oile the best, because that age worketh in that, a very good disposition, but in this, as badde:

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What was the reason that the auncient Romans were very precise, not to suffer the table to be cleane voided and all taken away 3 or the lampe and candle to be put out?

Lorms a great lover of antiquitie, would never abide, that a table should be taken away emptic, but alwaies left some meat or other standing upon it: And I know full well (quoth he) that both my father and my grandfather before him, not onely observed this most carefully, but also would not in any case permit the lampe after supper to be put out, because for sparing of oile, and that thereby none should be wasted vainly. But Eustrophus the Athenian being upon a time a time at supper with us, hearing Florus making this relation: And what good gat they by this (quoth he) unlesse they had learned the cunning cast of Epicharmus our fellow-citizen; who as he faid himfelfe, having studied a long time how he might keepe his boies and servants about him, from filching and stealing away his oile, hardly, and with much adoe at the last, found this meanes: for prefently after that the lampes were put out, he filled them full againe with oile; and then the next morning, he would come and see whether they were still full. This speech made Florus to laugh: But seeing (quoth he) this question is so well solved, let us search I prayyou 40 into the reason: Why in old time, as it should seeme, our * auncients were so religious and precise, as touching their tables and lampes: first therefore they began with lampes and lights: And Cafernius his fonne in law faid: That those auncients as he thought, tooke it to be an ominous matter, and a very abomination indeed; that any fire whatfoever should be put out, for the likeneffe and kinred that it had with that facred fire which is alwaies kept inextinguible: for two waies there be(as I take it) whereby fire (like as we men) may die; the one violent, when it is quenched and put out by force, the other natural when it goeth out & dieth of it selse:as for that facred fire, they remedied both the one & the other, in mainteining and looking to it continually with great care and diligence; the other which is common, they neglected and fuffred to goe out of it felfe, without any more adoe; for fo they themselves quenched it not perforce, 50 nor caused it to die, grudging and envying that it should live, as a beast that doth no good, they passed for it no more, nor made any further reckoning. Then Lucius the sonne of Florus said: That he liked well of all the rest which was faid; but as concerning the sacred fire, he supposed, that our anneeffours chofe it not to reverence and adore, because they thought it more holy or better than other: but like as among the Aegyptians, some worshipped the whole kind of dogs; others, woolves likewife or crocodiles; but they nourished (with any especiall respect) but one of every kinde; to w.t., some, one dogge, others, one woolfe, and others againe, one crocodile; for that impossible it was to keepe them all; even so heere in this case, the vigilant care and devotion which they emploied in faving and keeping the facred fire, was a figne and folemne testimoniall of the religious observance which they carried respectively to the whole element of fire; the reason was, because there is nothing in the world that more resembleth a living creature, cofidering that it mooveth, stirreth, and feedeth it felfer, yea and by the shining light that it giveth, (in maner of the foule) laieth all things open, and maketh them to bee feeme; but most of all it sheweth and prooveth the power that it hath, not to be without some vitall seed, or principle, in the extinguishing and violent death thereof; for when it is either quenched, suffocated, or killed by force, it feemeth to give a cry or fericke, strugling as it were with death, like unto a lito ving creature when the life is taken away by violence. And in uttring these words a casting his cies upon me: What fay you (quoth hee) unto me, can you alledge any thing better of your owne? I cannot (faid I) finde any fault with you, in all that you have delivered; but I would willingly adde thus much moreovers that this fallion and cultome of mainteining fire, is a very exercise and discipline training us togreat humanitie: for surely I hold it not lawfull to spoile our meats and viands after we have eaten thereof fufficiently, no more than I doe for to flop or choke up a foring or fountaine after we have drunke our fill of the pure water thereof, or to take downe and dimolifit the markes that guid men in navigation, or wait aring, upon the land, when we have once ferved our owne turne with them: but thefe and fuch like things we ought to leave behinde us unto posteritie, as meanes to do them good that shall come after us, & have need of 20 them when we are gone: and therefore I hold it neither feemely nor honeft, to put out a lampe for mechanicall miferie, fo foone as a man himfelfe hath done with all; but he ought to mainteine & keepe it burning stil, that what need soever there should be of fire, it may be found there ready, and thining light out; for a bleffed thing it were in us, if possibly we so could, to impart the use of our owneede-sight, our hearing, yea and of our wisedome, strength and valour unto others for the while, when we are to fleepe or otherwife to take our repole : confider moreover, whether our forefathers have not permitted excellive ceremonies and observations in these cases, even for an exercise and studious meditation of thankfulnesse, as namely; when they reverenced so highly the oakes bearing acornes as they did. Certes the Athenians had one fig. tree which they honored by the name of the holy and facred Fig. tree; and expresly forbad to 30 cut downe the * mulberietree: for these ceremonies I assure you, doe not make men inclined . uacatar, unto superstition as some thinke, but frame & traine us to gratitude & sociable humanitie one to-lesseday ut ward another, when as we are thus reverently affected to fuch things as thefe, that have no fould be nor sense. And therefore Hespatas did very well, when he would not permit any sless or meats to to say, the betaken out of the pots or cauldrons for to be fet upon the table, unleffe fome thing before had olive tree, as gone out of them, for an affay to the gods; but gave order that some portion thereof should the French be offred as first fruits unto the fire; as it were a reward and farisfaction for the ministery and seemeth to good service that it hath done: The Romans also did as well, who would not when they had read it. done with their lampes take from them that nourifhment which they had once allowed, but fuffred them to enjoy the fame, still burning and living, by the meanes thereof. After I had thus 40 faid: Now I affureyou (quoth Eustrophus) hath northis speech of yours made the overture and given way to passe forward to a discourse of the table? for that our auncients thought there Thould be alwaies somewhat left standing upon it after dinner and supper, for their hoshold serwants and children; for furely glad they be, nor fo much to get wherewith to eat, as to have it in this order communicated from us and our table unto them: and therefore the Persian kings by report, were wont alwaies to fend from their owne boord certeine diffies, as a liuraifon not onely to their friends and minions, to their great captaines and lieutenants under them, to their chiefe penfioners also and squires of the body; but they would have their slaves, yea and their very hounds and dogs to be served daily, and have their ordinary allowance set even upon their table: for their will and meaning was, that who foever did them any fervice, & were emploied in 50 their ministerie, should if it were possible be partakers of their table and fire also: for furely the most fell or savage beafts that bee, are made tame by such communication and fellowship in their feeding. Heereat I could not chuse but laugh: And why then doe we not (quoth he) my good friend, put in practife the old order, and bring abroad the fifth laid up for flore, according to the common proverbe, as also the Chenix or measure that Pythagor as fo much talketh of, & upon which he forbiddeth a man to fit? giving us thereby a leffon, that wee should learne to leave somewhat for the next day, and on the even to remember and thinke upon the morrow. We Beeotians have this by-word amongstus, common in every mans mouth: Leave somewhat for the Medes: fince time that the Medes overran and forceied the whole province of Phoeis, and wasted the frontiers and marches of Bastis: but suply, we should have evermore ready at hand this saying? Save something alwaies for strangers and guests, that may come in unlooked for: And to speake what I thinke; so thinke own part. I missise suterly that hungry table that webilles kept, which evermore was found bate and void. For when as we jax and tuly see came embassage unto him, they sound no meat at all fittings whereupon he was forced even then to kill somewhat, and to deesse the same out of hand for their suppers: Another time also being minded to entertaine king Priamus friendly, when he came unto his pavilion:

He then bestir'd himselfe, and caught up soone, a constant of the

but about cutting it up, quartering, jointing, feething and rofting, be spent agreet part of the night: whereas Eumaus a wife scholar of as wife a master, was nothing at all troubled at the sudden and unexpected comming of Telemachus; but presently willed him to sit downe, made him good cheere, setting before him platters full

Of good fiesh meats, which were of former store, All ready rast, and left the night before.

But if you thinke that to be but a small matter, and lightly to be regarded, yet I am sure confesse you will; that this is not a thing of little importance; namely to refraine and and conteine the appetite, when as there is enough yet before a man, to provoke and satisfie it; for those who are wont to absteine from that which is present, have lesse desire to that which is absent: Then Eurosia added thus much, that he remembred how hee had heard his grandmother say: That the table was a facred thing: Which is stope so (quoth he) there ought no thing that holy is, to be emptie; and for mine owne part, I am of this minde: That the table is a representation and figure of the earth; for besides that, it seeded his, round it is, and standeth firme and sure; in which regard, some have called it properly, Vesta: and like as we would have the earth to be are and bring forth alwaies some thing or other for our prositissowe thinke, that we should never see the table void, nor left without some viands upon it.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

That we ought especially to beware of the pleasures which we take in naughtie musickes, and how we should take heed thereof.

T the folemnity of the Pythicke games, Calliftrates the superintendant, deputed by the A high commission and councell of State, named Amphytiones, for to oversee and keepe good order, put backe a certaine minstrel, who plaied upon the flute, though he were a countrey man of his and a friend, because he came not in time to present himselfe for to be intolled among those that were to contend for the prize, which he did according to the statutes and lawes of those games provided in that behalfe: but one evening when he had invited us to supper, he brought him forth into the banquet among us, fet out and adorned in his faire robes and chap-40 lets magnificently, as the maner is to be seene at such games of prize, and attended besides with a goodly dannee and quire of fingers, well and trimly appointed; and I affure you, a brave show it was at the first entrie, and a pleasant pastime woorth the seeing and hearing: but after that hee had tried and founded the whole companie there met, and perceived many of them how they were inclined, and that for their delight and pleafure which they prefently tooke, they would be carried away, and fuffer him to do what he lift himfelfe; namely, to play lafeivious tunes, and in gesture to represent the same accordingly; then he showed himselfe openly, and gave us an evident proofe and demonstration; that musicke will make those more drunke, and distemper their braines woorfe (who inconfideratly at all times, and without all measure exceedingly give themfelves unto it) than all the wine that they can drinke. For now by this time, they could not be 50 content as the were fet at they table, to hout and hollo with open throat, and withall, to keepe a clapping with their hands one at another; but in the end, the most part of them leapt from the boord, and began withall, to daunce and to foot it, yea, and otherwise to shew dishonest and filthy gestures, farre unbeseeming gentlemen, but yet surable to the tunes hee sounded, and the fongs that the rest chanted; but afterwards, when they had made an end, and that the banquet (as it were after a fit of furious madnesse) was come againe to it selfe, and better setled, Lamprias was defirous to have faid formewhat; and rebuked in good earnest, this missule and disorder of the youth, but that he feared withall, that he should be thought too rigourous, and give offence unto the companie; untill fuch time as Calliffrat whimfelfe gave him his hint, and incited him fo to do, by fuch a speech as this: For mine owne part (quoth he) even I also, do acquit them of intemperancie, the simple defire of hearing musicke, and seeing sports : howheir, I am not altogether of Aristonenus opinion, when he faith, that these be the onely pleasures that be woorth a whoupe, and at the end whereof, a man should fay, Kanis, that is to fay, Oh, well and trimly done! For furely, men are woont to attribute fo much unto certaine daintie means and fweet perfumes and ointments, calling them trim and fine, and giving this praise unto them, that they be well dreffed and confected; yea, and it is an ordinary speech to say: That it is well with us, when we 10 have beneat a delicate and costly supper. I suppose also, that Anstorie himselfe alledgeth not a fufficient cause, that the solace and pleasure by faire sights and sweet musicke, and generally, the contenument that we have by the cie and the care, is to be exempted from the crime of intemperancy, because as he faith, these be the onely delights proper unto man; whereas in all others, brute bealts do communicate with us, and have the benefit of them: for I fee that there be manie creatures which have no use of reason, and yet take pleasure in musicke; as for example, stages, in flutes and pipes; and at the time when mares are to be covered with stallions, there is a certeine found of the hauthoies and a fong to it, named thereupon, Hippotheros: and Pindarus faith in one place, that he was moved with the fong,

The leventh Booke.

Like as the dolphin furnmes apace,
Directly forwar do that place
Whereas the pleafant hautboies found,
And whence their noife doth foone rebound;
What time, both winds and waves do lie
As fea, and let no harmonie.

And as they daunce, they beare up their heads and eies aloft, as joying in the object which they fee of others likewife dauncing; for they strive to imitate and counterfeit the same, stirring and wagging their shoulders to and fro: I cannot see therefore, what singularitie by it selfe there is in these pleasures, because they onely are respective to the soule, and others belong unto the bodie, and do seize and rest in the bodie; whereas tunes, measures, daunces, and songs, passing bodie, and beyond the sense, doe saften their delight and tickling pleasure, upon the very joy and contentment of the minde; which is the reason that none of these delectations are hidden, nor have need either of darkenesse to cover them, or of walles to environ, enclose, and keepe them in, as women are woont to say by other pleasures; but contrariwise, built there are for these delights of the cie and care, circuits and races, theaters and snew places; and the greater company that there is with us to see or heare any of these, the greater joy we take, and the thing it selfe is more stately: but this is plaine, that desirous we are, not of a number of wimesses to tellistic our intemperance and naughtic pleasure, but we care not how many see our honest exercises and civill sports or recreations.

After that Callifratus had ended his speech, Lamprian perceiving that those favourers and 40 mainteiners of fuch care sports, tooke better heart, and became more audacious by these words; fet in hand to speake now in deed as he meant before, in this maner: This is not the cause, good fir Callistratus, the sonne of Leon, but in mine opinion, our ancient forefathers have not done well, to fay that Bacchus was the fonne of Oblivion; for they should rathet have faid, that he was his father; confidering, that even now by his meanes you have forgotten, that of those faults and mildemeanours which are committed by occasion of pleasures, some proceed from intemperance; others from ignorance or negligence: for where the hirt and dammage is evident, there men (if they finne) doe it because their reason is forced and overcome by intemperance; but looke where the hire and reward of incontinencie and loofenesse doth not directly enfue, nor prefently upon the committing of a fault, there all their delinquencie is to be aferi-50 bed unto ignorance, for that fuch leand acts, they both approve and perpetrate, because they wish not what hurt would follow: and therefore such as doe exorbitate and misgoverne themfelves in eating or drinking exceffively, as also in the immoderate use of women; which enormities be ordinarily accompanied with many maladies, much expence, decay of estate, losse of goods and an ill name befides; we usually call loose, dissolute, and intemperate persons : such an one was that Theodettes, who being diseased in his cies; when soever hee espied his sweet heart whom he kept as his harlot, would falute her in these tearnes, zeife pixer pos:

All haile my (weet and lovely light, The onely joy of mine eie fight. And fuch another was Anaxarchus of Abdera: Who (by report) knew well what miseries He lived in, but yet bu nature was Inclined fo to pleasure, which men wife, And fages dread most part; that he alas Was thereby drawen and caried unto fin, Out of that way which judgement fet him in.

But those who hold out manfully, and stand upon their owne guards, for seare they bee caught 10 and overcome with the groffe pleafure of the belly, and the parts under it, of taffe and of fmelling; and yet nevertheleffe fuffer themselves to be circumvented and surprized by other delights, which fecretly forelay them, and lie in ambush, hidden close within their cies and cares; these men (I say) although they be nothing lesse passionate, dissolute, and incontinent than the others, yet we tearmethem not fo for all that: and why fo? because they know not the danger wherein they fland; they runne on headlong through ignorance, thinking they fhall bee masters over their pleasures, yea, though they taried at the theater all the long day, from morning to night, to see and heare plaies and other pastimes, without bit of bread or drop of drinke; as if for footh an earthen veffell or pitcher should boast it selfe and stand much upon this, that it is not stirred and taken up by the belly or the bottome, and yet easily removed and caried from 20 place to place by the two eares: and therefore Arcesilans was woont to fay: That it skilled not which way one committed filthinesse; for behind and before, was all one; so that we ought to feare that wantonnesse and pleasure which tickleth us in our cares and eies both: neither are we to thinke a citie impregnable, which having all other gates fast made with strong locks, fortified also with croffe barres, & portculliffes, if the enemies may enter in at one other gate; nor to take our selves to be invincible & unconquered by pleasures, for that we be not caught & taken within the temple of Venue; in case we suffer our selves to be taken in the chappell of the Muses, or else at some theatre: For surely such a passion may overtake and captivate our soule as well here as there, yea, & betake it unto pleasures, for to hale & pull, carie & harie us as they list: and these verily doe infuse and powre into our spirits, poisons more eger and piercing, yea, and in 30 greater varieties I meane of fongs, daunces, mulicall accords and measures, than all those be, which either cooks, confectioners, or perfumers can devise: by the strength whereof, they leade and carie us whither they will, yea, and corrupt us so, as that wee cannot chuse bur convince and condemne our selves by our owne testimonic against us: For as Pindarus said very well:

We cannot charge, nor yet blame-worthy thinke, What ever, for our present meat and drinke The facred earth to us affoor ded bath, Or fea, with windes, that is fo fell and wrath.

And to fay a truth, there is no daintie cates, no delicate viands, fifth or flesh; no nor this passing good wine which we drinke, that for any pleasure & contentment which they yeeld unto us, cau- 40 feth us to fet up any fuch noises, like as ere while, the found and playing of the flutes did, which filled (I fay) not this house onely, but I believe well, the whole citie, with outcries, utas, clapping of hands, and alarmes: and therefore we are to stand in great seare and dread of such pleafures as these; for exceeding forcible they be, and most powerfull, as those who stay not there, as those doe which affect either taste, feeling, or finelling; to wit, in the unreasonable part of the foule, without paffing any farther; but they reach unto the very judgement, and discourse of reason: moreover, in other delights and pleasures, although reason should faile and not be able to withstand them, but give over in plaine field: yet there be other passions a good many which will refift and impeach them: for fay there be some daintie and delicate fish to be bought and fold in the market; nigardife oftentimes holdeth backe a gluttons fingers from drawing 50 outhis purse strings, who otherwise would bee busie and readie enough to helpe his deintie tooth: covetousnesse likewise otherwhiles turneth away a wanton leacher and whoremaster from medling with a deare and costly courtifane, who holdes her-selfe at an exceeding high price; like as Menander in one of his comedies bringeth in a pretie pageant of this matter; for when as a certeine band had brought unto a banquet where divers youthes were drinking, and making merrie together, a palling faire wench, yoong withall, and trimly fet out in every point, point, for to entice and allure them, they Cast downe their heads, and like good merry mates, Fell to their junkets hard, and deinty cates.

For when it stands upon this point, that a man must take up money at interest, or els goe withouthis pleasure; certes, it is a shrewd punishment to bridle his lust and incontinence; for wee are not alwaies fo willing and ready to lay our hand to our purfes: now the eies and cares of fuch as love muficians and minftrels, and other fuch gentleman-like fports, and recreations as we call them, fatisfie their furious appetites & affections, in founding mufick, plaies, & thewes. for nothing and without any cost: for why? such pleasures as these, they may be sped with, and enjoy in many places, at the publicke and facred games of prize, in theaters, and at feafts, and all atothermens charges; and therefore an easie matter it is to meet with matter enough for to spoile and undoe them quite, who have not reason to governe and direct them. Heereat hee made a paule, and so there was some filence for a while: And what would you have (quoth Callistraries) this reason, either to doe or say for to succour and save us for she will not fasten round about our eares, those little cases or boliters to cover our eares with, which Xenocrates speaketh of, neither wil the cause us to rife from the table so soone as we heare a musician to tune his lute or prepare his pipe: No in truth (quoth Lamprias) but looke how often foever as wee fall into the danger of these pleasures, we ought to call upon the muses for to succour, us; we must size into that mountaine Helicon of our auncients: for fuch an one as is enamoured upon a fump-20 tuous and costly strumpet, we cannot tell how to match by and by with a Penelope, nor marrie unto Panthea; but if one take pleafure in bawdy ballades, lascivious songs, and wanton daunces. we may foone divert him from thence, by fetting him to reade Euripides, Pindarus, or Menander; and so wash a filthic care, and furred all over with falt (as Plato faith) with a sweet and potable lotion of good fayings and wife lentences: for like as magicians commaund those who are possessed or haunted with evill spirits, to rehearle and pronounce apart by themselves Ephesian letters, or words for a counter-charme; even so when we are among these vanities, where minfirels play their parts, and moriske dauncers their may-games, fetching their frisks and gam-

> Shaking themselves in furious wife, With Arange allarmes and hideous cries: Wagging and flinging every way Their necks and heads all while they play.

Let us then call to remembrance the grave, holy and venerable writings of those ancient Sages, and conferring them with these sottish sonets, riband rimes, paltrie poemes, and ridiculous reafons, we shall not be endangered by them, nor turne fide (as they fay) and fuffer our selves to be carried away with them downe the streame.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Of fuch guests as be named shadowes; and whether he that is called by one, may go unto another to supper; if he may, when, and to whom.

Omer in the second booke of his Ilias, writeth of Menelaus, how he came of his owne accord unbidden, to a feast that his brother Agamemnon made unto the princes and chiefe commanders of the armie:

For why? he well conceived in his minde, That * troubled much, his brother he (hould finde.

And as he would not neglect and overfee thus much, that either the ignorance or forgetful-fore might neffe in his brother, should be otherwise seene; so he was lesse willing to discover it himselfe in owne brooking the state of the seene of the was lesse willing to discover it himselfe in owne brooking the state of the seene of 50 failing for to come 3 as some froward and peevish persons are woont to take holde of such over-ther. fights and negligences of their friends, being better content in their hearts thus to be neglecited, than honoured, because they would have advantage, and somewhat to complaine of. But as touching fuch as are not invited at all to a feast, nor have no formall bidding (whom now adaies, we call fhadowes) and yet are brought in by those who were invited, there arose one day a question, how this custome first came up and tooke beginning. Some were of opinion that Soerates began it, who perfuaded Ariffodemse upon a time, being not bidden to goe with him to a feath at Agathons house, where there fell out a pretie jest and a ridiculous; for Aristodemus tooke no heed when he thither came, that he had left Socrates by the way behinde him, and so himselfe entred before into the roome; which is as much as the shadow before the bodie, and the light comming after : but afterwards, at the feafting and enterteinment of friends that are travellers, and passe by as strangers, especially, if they were princes or great governours, because men knew not who were in their traine, and whom they deigned this honour, for to fit at their owne table, and to cat and drinke with them; the cultome was to request themselves, for to bring with them whom they would, but withall, to fet downe a determinate number; for feare left they should be so served as one was, who invited to a supper, Philipking of Macedonie, into the countrey: for he came unto his hoafts house with a great retinew after him, who had not provided a supper for many guests: Philip perceiving that his friend was hereupon in great perplexitie, and 10 knew not what to doe, fent unto every one of his friends that he brought with him, a fervitour of purpole to round them fecretly in the eare, that they should so eat of the viands before them, as that they referved a piece of their stomacke for a daintie tart or cate that was to come in : by which meanes, whiles they looked evermore when the faid dish should come to the table, and dideat more sparily in hope of it, of those meats which stood before them, there was sufficient for them all. But whiles I feemed thus to play upon the point before the company there prefint, Florus thought good that this question ought to be handled in good carnell, and more ferioutly; namely, as touching those thadowes above said: Whether it might stand with honesty and good maners, to follow or goe with them who were bidden ? As for Cefernius his fonne in law, he utterly condemned that fathion: For a man ought (quoth he) to obey the counsell of 20 Tie fjodus, who writeth thus:

If not fo, yet be fure at least wife to bid thy familiars and those of thine acquaintance, for to participate with thee in thy facred libations and thankfgivings to the gods at the table, in discourses there held, in the courtefies paffing to and fro; and namely, in drinking one to another: but now a daics it is with men that make feasts, as with those who keepe ferrie barges or barks to transport paffengers; for when they take in men aboord, they permit them to call into the veffell what fardels or baggage they have besides; for even so, we making a scalt for some especial perfons, give them leave to fill the place with whomsoever they please; whether they be honest nem & of worth or no, it makes no matter. And I would marvell much, if a man of quality, and one that knoweth good maners, would come thus bidden (as it were) at the fecond hand, which is all one as unbidde, being fuch an one, as many times the mafter of the feaft himfelfe knoweth not; and if he be one of his acquaintance and knowledge, and yet unbidden, furely it were more thame now to go unto his house, as it it were, to upbraid him and cast in his teeth, as if he came nato his feast without his good will, and yet would take his part thereof, even by violence and flrong hand. Moreover, to go before or tarrie after him, who would feeme to bid one to another mans table, carrieth fome shame with it, and would make a modest and honest man dismaied and blanke: neither is it a decent thing to have need of witnesses, and a warrant (as it were) betweene him and the mafter of the house, to infinuate thus much, that he is come indeed, not as 40 one formally bidden to supper, but as the shadow of such and such a man; besides, to daunce attendance upon another, and observe when he hath bene in the stouph, is anointed and washed, waiting the houre when he will goe, fooner or later; this in my fimple judgement is a very base and mechanicall thing, favouring strongly of the bonfon or parasit Guarbo, if ever there were fuch a friell-feaft as Gnatho, who haunted mens tables where it cost him naught: furthermore, if there be no time or place, wherein a mans tongue may be better permitted to fay thus:

Art thou dispos à to boast, to cracke and brave In measure? speake out hardly 3,000d seave have.

than at a banquet, where commonly there is most libertie allowed and intermingled in all that is done and faid, and every thing is well taken, as in mirth; how should a man behave and governe 50 himselfe at such a place, who is not a lawfull and naturall bidden guest indeed; but as a man would say, a bastard and subrepitious exerpt in, and intruded I wor not how into a feast, without all order of inviting? for say that hee doe speake freely at the boord, or say he doe not, lie open he shall both for the one and the other, to the calumniations of them there present neither is it a small inconvenience to be made, a marke for scurrile tearmes, and a meere laughing stocke, namely; when a man putter up, and endureth the base name of a shadow, and will be content to answere thereunto? for I assure you, to make simal account of unseemely words is the next wafe to leade men unto undecent and dishonest deedes, and to acquaint them therewith by little and little: wherefore when I invite others to a feaft or fupper unto mine owne house, I allow them otherwhiles to bring their shadowes with them (for the custome of a citie is much, and may not well be broken) but furely, when I have my felfe beene called upon, to goe with others to a place where I am not bidden, I have ever yet denied, and could not for any thing be brought unto it tipon which words enfued filence for a time, untill Floras began againe in this wife: Certes this fecond point is more difficult and doubtfull than the other; for when wee are to enterteine strangers that be travellers (as hath beene faid before) we must of necessitie invite them in this order: the reason is, because it were so incivilitie and discourtesse, to part them and their friends in a strange place, whom they were woont to have about them; and againe, it is no case matter to know, whom a man hath in his company. See then (quoth I) whether they who have given libertie unto them that make a feast, thus to invite guests, that they may take others unto them (as you say) permit not them also whom they would bring, as their shadowes, to obey, and so to come unto a feast; for it flandeth not with honestie, to graunt and give that, which is not meet for to demaund or give; nor in one word to follicite or exhort one to that, whereunto he would not willingly be follicited, either to doe or give his confent: but as for great States and rulers, or strangers travelling by the way, there is no fuch inviting or choise to be made; for enterteined they must be whom foever they bring with them: but otherwife, when one friend feafteth another, it were a more 20 friendly and courteous part, for himselfe to bid the familiars or kinsfolke of his faid friend, knowing them fo well as he doth; for by this meanes greater honour he doth unto his friend, yea, and winnerh more thanks at his hands againe, when the partie invited shall know that he loveth them best, that most willingly he defireth to have their companie, a staking pleasure that they be honored and intreated to come as well, for his fake; and yet for all this, it would otherwhiles be wholly referred unto his difcretion that is bidden: like as those who facrifice unto fome one god, doe honour likewife and make vowes unto those who are partakers of the fame temple and altar in common, although they name them not severally by themselves, * * For there is neither wine, deintic viands, nor sweet persumes, that give such contentment and pleasure at a feast, as doth a man whom one loveth and liketh well of stitting by his side or neere 30 unto him at the table: moreover, to aske and demaund of the man himfelfe, whom one would fealt, what viands or what banquetting diffies or paltry works he loveth best; as also to seeke and enquire of the diversitie of wines and pleasant odors he delighted in, were a very uncivil and abfurd part: but when a man hath many friends, many kinsfolks & familiars, to request such an one to bring with him those especially whose companie he liketh best, & in who he taketh greatelt pleasure, is no absurditie at all, nor a thing that can be offensive: for neither to faile in one thip nor to dwell in the fame house, ne yet to plead in the fame cause, with those whom we are not affected well unto, is fo displeasant & odious, as to fit at a supper with them against who our heart doth rife; and the contrary is as acceptable; for furely the table is a very communion and focietie of mirth and earnest, of words and deeds; and therefore if men would be merry there, 40 and make good cheere, I fee no need, that all manner of persons indifferently should meet, but those onely who have some inward friendship, and private familiaritie one with another: as for our meats and fauces that come up to the boord, cooks I confessed on make them of all maner of fapours, different as they be, mixing them together, and tempering, harth, fowre, milde, fweet, sharpe, subtill, and biring, one with another: but a supper or feast, is nothing acceptable and contenting, unlesse it be composed of guests who are of the same humour and disposition: and for that, as the Peripateticke philosophers doe affirme, that there is one Primum mobile, above, or principall moover in nature, which mooveth onely, and is not mooved; and another thing beneath, and in the lowest place, which is mooved onely, and mooveth not; but betweene thele two extremities, there is a middle nature, that mooveth one and is mooved by 50 another; even fo, (fay I) there is the same proportion among three forts of men; the first of those who invite another; the second of such as are invited onely; and the thirde of them that doe invite others, and are invited themselves: and now because wee have spoken alreadie of the first and principall feast-maker, who inviteth, it were not a misse to say somewhat now of the other two folks: He then who is bidden, and yet hath leave to bidde others; ought in great reafon (as I thinke) to be carefull and take heed, that he forbeare to bring with him a geat number or multitude, left hee should seeme to make spoile of his friends house, as of an enemies territorie, and as it were to forage there for all those that belong unto him; or to doe as those who come to occupie and inhabit a new countrey, that is to fay, by bringing with him formany of his owne friends, disease, or at leastwise exclude and put by his guests, who invited him, and so by that meanes the masters of the feasts might be served as they are, who set soorth suppersunto Hecate or Profer pina, and to those averruncan gods, or apotropae, whom men call upon, not to doc good, but to avert evill, for they themselves nor any of their house licke their lips with any jot of all that cheere; onely they have their part of all the smoake and troubles belonging thereto: for otherwise they that alledge unto us this common saying:

Must buy his owne viands, if he be wife. speake it but merily and by way of jest; but certeinly it befalletheven so in good truth and ear- 10 nest unto those who interteine either strangers or friends so rude and uncivill, who with a number of shadowes, as if therewere so many harpies or cormorants and greedy guls, consumed and devoured all their provision: fecondly, a friend that is himselfe solemnly invited, must be carefull, that he take not with him, for to goe unto another mans house, those that he first meeteth or that come next hand, but fuch especially, as he knoweth to be friends, and of familiar acquaintance with the feast-maker, as if he strived a vie to prevent him in bidding of them; if not to, to have those with him, of his owne friends, whom the master of the feast himselfe could have withed and made choife of, to have bidden; as for example, if he be a modest man and a civill, to fort him with modelt and civill persons; if studious and learned, to furnish his table with students & good scholars; if he have bene beforetime in authority, to fit him now with personages 20 of power & authority; and in one word, to acquaint him with those, whom he knoweth he would be willing to falute, and enterteine with speech and communication; for this is a wife kinde of courtefic and great civilitie, to give unto fuch a personage occasion and meanes, to falute, embrace, and make much of them: whereas hee who commeth to a feast with such about him as have no conformitie at all unto the feaft-maker, but feeme meere aliens and ftrangers; as namely, with great drunkards, to a fober mans house; to a man that is a good husband, wary, and thrifty in his expenses, with a fort of diffolute ruffians and swaggering companions; or unto a yong gentleman, that loveth to drinke heartily, to laugh, to jeft, and to be merie, with grim fires, and fevere ancients, fuch as in their talke are grave, and by their long beards, may be taken for fages and profound clearks; fuch an one (I fay) is a very abfurd fellow, thus to requite the hospitall 20 courtese of his friend, with such impertment incongruity: for he that is invited, must be as carefull to please the first inviter, as the feast-maker, his guest; and then acceptable shall hee be and welcome indeed, if not himselfe onely, but those also who come with him or for the love of him, be of good carriage and lovely behaviour. As for the third person, who remaineth to be spoken of, to wit, who is bidden and brought in by another; if he take pepper in the nofe, and cannot abide to be called a shadow; certeinely hee is afraid of his owne shadow: but in this case, there would be very great circumfpection had; for it is no point of honestie and good maners, to be foone intreated, and ready to follow every one indifferently at his call; confidered it would be, and that not flightly, what he is who moveth thee to go with him to fuch a feast; for if he be not a very familiar friend, but one of these rich magnificoes and portly personages, who would (as it 40 were upon a fcaffold) make a shew unto the world of a number of favourites and followers to guard and attend him at his heeles; or fuch an one as would feeme to doe much for thee, or to grace and honour thee greatly by taking thee in this order with him, thou oughtest flatly to denie him, and refuse such courtesse: well, say that he be a friend and familiar person, yet must not thou by and by for all that, bee ready and obey, but then onely, when there is some necessarie occasion for to commune or speake with the master of the feast or with the other partie, and that otherwise thou cannest meet with no good opportunitie for to doe it; or if he be newly returned from some long voiage, when he hath bene a great time away, or els about to depart, and fo feeme (for very good will) desirous of thy companie at supper; or if it appeare that he meaneth not to take with him many, nor those strangers and unknowen, but either thy selfe alone, or 50 some few others of his familiars; or after all these considerations, if thou maiest perceive, that by this occasion and opportunitie of thy companie, he doth practife to contract some beginning of farther acquaintance, friendship and amity, and namely, if he be reputed an honest man, and woorthy to be loved and regarded, who thus is defirous of thy companie, and earnest with thee to go with him; for wicked and leaud perfons, the more they feeme to claspe and take hold, and hang upon us, the more we ought to shake them off as burres, or els to leape over them as briers and brambles: nay, admit that they be honest enough, who would have our companie, and bring us to a man that is is not honest, we ought not to go with them, left we chance to take poison with honie, that is to say, get the acquaintance of a naughtie man, by the meanes of an honest minded friend: moreover, absurd it is, to goe unto a mans house whom we know not as all, or with whom we never had any maner of dealing and acquaintance, unleffe he be a perfonage of great matke for fingular vertue, as we have before faid, or that this occasion may serve as a foundation or ground-worke of fome farther love and amitie; for then it were not amiffe to be eafily intreated, and to go willingly without any ceremoniall complement unto him, under the wing and shadow of another. As for those who be already our familiars, unto such above all others we may be bolde to goe at the motion of another; for by that meanes we give reciprocall 10 libertic and leave unto them for to repaire likewife unto us at the request of others. There was one Philip indeed, a buffon and fourrile jefter, who was wont to fay: That to go unto a fealt, formally invited, was fimply more ridiculous, than to come as a shadow by the bidding of another: but in trueth, more honourable and pleafant it is for honest men and good friends, to refore unto their friends, who belikewise honest and vertuous, in seasonable time (without being invited or expected) with other friends; for thereby they both rejoice the heart of those that enterteine them, and doe honour unto fuch as bring them; but above all, most undecent it is, to goe unto princes, rulers, rich men and great States, when we are not invited by themselves, but brought by others; for in any cale avoid we mult, the imputation and note not undeferved, of impudencie, incivilitie, want of good maners, or ambitious infolence.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Whether it be a lawfull and decent thing, to admit minstrell-wenches to a feast, for to play and sing?

T N our citie Cheronea, there was held a great discourse one day at the table, where Diogenianus I the Pergamian was present, as touching the eare-sports which were to be admitted at a banquet; and much adoe we had to defend our felves, and to confute a long bearded philosopher that was there, one of the Stoicks feet for footh, who alledged againft us, Plato, blaming and condemning those who brought into their feasts, minstrell-wenches, to pipe and sing, and to be 30 heard, as if they were notable themselves to enterteine good speeches one with another; and yet present there was, a scholar, out of the same schoole, Philip a Prusian, who said: That such personages were not to be named in this question, who are brought in as speakers at Agathons boord, for that their speeches sounded more sweetly and melodiously, than all the flutes and cithrons in the world: no marvell it was therefore, that these minstrels had no audience at such a feast, but rather, that the guests sitting there at the table, forgot not altogether to eat and drinke, for the great pleasure and contenument which they tooke in hearing such discourses. And yet Xenophon was not ashamed to endure in the presence of Socrates, Amisthenes, and other such personages, a pleasant conceited jester named Philippus; no more than Homer to teach men: That an onion was a good fauce to draw on wine: And Plato having inferred in manner of an 40 interlude or comedie within his Banquet, the speech of Aristophanes as touching love : at the last setting as it were the backe doores of the hall wide open, brings in a pagent, fuller of varietie and vanitie than all the rest, to wit, Alcibiades little better than drunke, crowned with chaplets and garlands of flowers, and marching in a maske or mummerie: then follow the altercations and debates with Socrates as touching Agathon, and that encomiasticall praise of Socrares (ô bleffed faint Charites!) that even Apollo himfelfe (were it lawfull fo to fay) if he had entred in place with his harpeready ftrung and tuned for to play, the company would have requested him to flay his hand, untill the foredaid speech had beene finished and brought to an end: And did these personages indeed (quoth hee) notwithstanding they had so great grace in their discourses, use neverthelesse these pleasant sports and passimes betweene, garnishing their 50 feafts therewith, and all to make the companie to laugh and be merry? And shall wee being intermingled with persons managing affaires of State, with merchants, occupiers, and with many (it may so fall out) altogether unlestered; and somewhat rusticall, banish out of our feasts and banquets this amiable delight and pastime; or else rise from the table and begone, as if we would flie from fuch Sirenes as foone as ever wee fee them comming? It was thought a strange and woonderfull matter in Clitomachus the campion and professiour of performing games of prife; that fo foone as ever there was any talke begun of love matters, hee would leave the com-Panie and depart: and when a grave philosopher avoideth the found of the flute, and goeth out of the feaft, and as if hewere afraid of a minstrell wench, preparing her-felse to found and fing, * For they far * putteth on his shoes, and calleth incontinently to his page for to light his torch; shall he not upon pallets in so doing be thought woorthie to bee hissed at, and laughed of every one, for taking offence, and beds at the southern which slie from persumes and meat, and did and abhorring these harmelesse pleasures; like as these bettils which slie from persumes and of their thors sweet odors? For if there be any time or place allowed for these disports, it is at feasts and banquets principally: Then (I say) and there are wee to give our minds to such delights; all while we factifice unto Bacchus: For mine own part Euripides, howfoever otherwise he pleaseth me verie well, doth not fatisfie me heerein, when he ordeineth as touching mulicke, that transferred it should be from feasts and banquets, unto sorrowes and pensive sadnesse: for in these cases, there would be some good, sober and wife remonstranceau hand (like as a physitian with 10 ficke folke) to helpe al: but otherwise we are to mingle these delights of musick with the gifts of Baschus, in manner of a sport and recreation: Certes a pretie speech it was of a Lacedæmonian, who being at Athens one time, when new tragedies were to be acted, and the authours of them to contend for the best game; seeing the sumptuous furniture and provision of those who were the mafters of the revils, and fuch pattimes, together with the painfull labour in teaching and prompting of parts, and what adoe there was in ordering of the dances and shewes thereto belonging: whiles one strived to goe beyond another: Oh, what a foolish citie is this (quoth he) to imploy so much travell and serious studie in idle plaies and disports! For to say a truth, when we are at our plaies, we must doe nothing else but play, and not to buy so deare (with such cost and dispences, yea, and with the losse of time, which were better bestowed about other 20 good affaires) an idle sport: marie at the table, when our spirit is sequestred from other busineffe, we may tafte a little of fuch delights, and in the meane while, confider withall, what profit fuch solace may affoord.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What Acroames or Ear-sports, are especially to be used at supper time ?

Hen these words had passed, the sophister above-said, would gladly have replied againe: but I for to interrupt and stay his speech, began first and said: Nay rather Diogenianus, 30 I thinke it better to confider upon this point; that feeing there bee many eare-delights to content our hearing, which of them is most meet and fit ? and if you thinke so good, let us referre the matter to this wife man heere in place, and request him to give his judgement: for being as he is, inflexible, and a man subject to no passions, we shall never need to feare that he wil fo much trip, as to preferre a thing that is more pleasant, before that which is better. Then he at the request and exhortation of Diogenianus and us, without any delay: As for other pastimes (quoth he) at theaters, exhibited upon the stage and scaffold of plaiers and dauncers, I reject and banish them all; onely I admit one kinde of sport to delight the eare, which not long fince came to be taken up at Rome, in feafts and banquets, and it is not yet divulged abroad in every place: For youknow well (quoth he) that among the dialogues of Plato, Tome there be 40 which conteine a continued narration, of a thing done or faid, others againe confift of certein devised personages, talking and discoursing together: of these personal dialogues, those that be casiest, children use to learne, and con them without booke, together with expressing the gestures agreeable to the qualitie, manners, and nature of the persons, who are feigned and brought in a confirmation also and framing of the voice, yea, and a countenance and disposition every way answerable to the words that they pronounce: this manner of pastime hath beene woonderfully well accepted among grave persons, and men of honours but such as bee effeminate or have daintie & delicate eares, by reason that they are rude, illiterate, and ignorant what is good and honest; and who, as Aristoxenus was wont to say, will be ready to cast up their gorge, and vomit yellow choler, when they heare any good harmony, mislike them and 50 would not abide the hearing and I would not marvell verily if they reject and condemne them utterly, being so possessed with womanith deintinesse. Philip then perceiving some there in place, not to take these words well: Stay there (quoth he) my good friend, and forbeare in this wife to raile upon us, for we were the first, who were offended with this manner and fashion, when it began at Rome, yea, & we reprooved those who would have Plate serve the turne, for to make folke merry at the boord, and laboured; all they could, that Platees dialogues for footh should bee rehearled and heard, amidearts, march-paines, comfitures, and sweet perfumes: confidering confidering, that if some verses of Sappho, or Anacreous odes should be rehearfed : Me thinks I ought for very shame and reverence, fet the cup downe out of my hand, if I were about to drinke: many more things to this effect I have in my head, which I am afraid to utter for feare I might be thought of purpose to make head, and to dispute against you: and therefore to this friend heere of ours, together with the cup as you fee, I give the charge, for to wath a fallith eare (as they fay) with potable liquor of pleafant speech: then Diogenianus receiving the cuppe at his hand; But (quoth hee) I heare no other yet but all good lober speeches; so that it seemeth that the wine doth not worke in our heads, nor overcome our braines; and I feare mee, that I my felfe shall bee capitulated and articled against; howbeit, if I must speake no my minde, I am of opinion, that many of these matters which are presented unto our eares, for to tickle and pleafe them, ought to bee cut off; and namely, tragedies above all others, as being a thing (iwis) not very well befitting a feast, for that it speaketh in too grave and base a voice, representing besides, such arguments and acts, as moove the hearers to pitie and compassion. I reject also, out of our daunces, that which is called Pyladion, as being over-stately, and too full of pompe, exceeding patheticall besides, and requiring many persons and actours: but if we may admit any of those countrey kinds, which Socrates recounteth, when hespeaks of daunces, I receive that which is called Bashyllion, which of it selfe beareth a lower port, and foundeth much like to the rufticke daunce, called Cordax, or refembling Echo Pan, or Iome Satyre dancing amoroully and wantonly with Cupid: as for the comedic, that which was 20 called Petro, that is to fay, the ancient kinde first used, it forteth not well with the table, nor would be acted before men when they be drinking and merriclin regard of the inequalitie thereof : for that earnestnesse and libertie of speech, used in those grancing digressions, called mendators, is too free and over vehement; also, the facilitie and readineffe to scoffe, flour and jibe, is too rife and common, over-broad and plaine befides; full of undecent and unhonest verbs, and as full of filthichnollassivious nownes. Moreover, like as at the feasts of great princes and potentates, there flandeth alwaies waiting by every one of them that fit at the boord, a cuppe-bearer, to give him drinke when he calleth for it; even to there had need to be fome Grammarian or other at hand continually, for to expound ever and anon, the meaning of divers tearmes used in these comedies, to wit, what fignifieth in Eupolisthe poet, this word Lasmodias; also, what the poet Plato 30 meanes by Cinefin, in his comedies ; and what is meant by Lampon, in Cratinus; likewife one or offier for the purpose, to give the hearers to understand, who they be whom the actours let slie their scurrile scoffes at: so that by this meanes, our feast must be like a Grammar schoole, or els all the frumps and mocks that be flung and discharged, will light in vaine, and lose their grace, for want of being understood. But to come unto the new comedie, what should a man fay any thing of it but this, that it is so incorporate in feasts and banquets, that a man may better make a supper without wine; that without Menander? for why? the phrase or maner of speech in these comedies is sweet, pleasant, and familiar, the matter such, as neither can be despised of the sober, nor offensive to the drunken; befides, the vertuous and fententious fayings therein, delivered in fimple and plaine tearmes, tunne fo fmooth, that they are able to foften and make pliable everic 40 ways the Wiffelt and hardest natures that be, by the meanes of wine, like as barres of yron in the fire, and to reduce them to humanitie. To be short, the temperature thorowout of mirth and gravitietogether, is such, as it feemeth that this comedie was devised first for nothing els, but both to pleafure and profit those who had taken their wine liberally, and were now well disposed to mirch's moreover, even the amarotrous objects therein presented, are not without a singular use and benefit, for those who being already set in an heat with wine, are within a while after to goe to bed and fleepe with their wedded wives: neither shall you finde among all his comedies, as many ashe hath written, any filthy love of a yoong faire boy; and as for the deflowing of yong timedens and virgins, about which there is fuch adoe in his comedies, they ordinarily doe end in marriages and all parties be pleased. As touching the love of harlots and professed cour-50 tefans, if they be proud, disdainfull and presumptuous queanes, certeinly our wanton affection that way, is well cooled and danted, by certeine chastisements or repentances of yong men, who are represented in these comedies, to come againe unto themselves, and acknowledge their follies; bur as for those kinde harlots, which are of good natures, and for their parts doe answere againe in true love, either you shall have in the end their owne fathers found, who may provide them husbands, or els there is some measure of time set out for to gage their love, which at the laft, after a certeine revolution and course run, turneth unto civill and bashfull behavior. I know well, that all these matters and observations, unto those who are otherwise occupied and busied in affaires, be of no importance; but at a table, where men are fet of very purpose to be merrie and to solace themselves, I would wonder, if their dexteritie, delight, and good grace, doth not bring with it some amendment and ornament into the minds and conditions of those who take heed unto them, yea, and imprint a certeine zeale and emulation, to frame and conforme themselves unto those that be honest and of the better fort.

At these words, Diegenianse paused a while, were it for that he had made an end of his speech. or to take his winde, and breathe himfelfe a little : and when the fophifter beganne to replie and came upon him againe, faying, that in his opinion there should have bene some places and verfes recited out of Aristophanes. Philip speaking unto me by name: This man (quoth he) hath his defire fatisfied, now that he hath fo well recommended his friend Menander, in whom he ta- 10 keth fo great delight, and in comparison of whom, he seemeth to have no care nor regard at all of any other: but there remaine yet, many other matters, which wee are woont to heare for our pleafure, which hitherto have not bene examined; and yet very willing I am, to heare some difcourse of the as for the prety works of imagers, who cut out & grave small living creatures, if it pleafe this stranger here & Diogenianus, we wil put over the controversic & the decision thereof untill to morow morning, when we are more fober. Then began I to speake, and said: There be yet, other kinde of sports and plaies, named Mimi, of which, some they call Hypotheses, as it were moralities and representations of histories; others, Pagma, that is to wit, ridiculous fooleries; but neither of them both, doe I take meet for a banquet; the former, both because they require fo long time in the acting, and also, for that they require so costly furniture and preparation; 20 the other, are too ful of ribaudry, of filthy and beaftly speeches, not wel befeeming the mouthes of pages and lackies, that carry their mafters flippers and pantofles after them, especially, if their mafters be honeft and wife men : and yet many there are, who at their feafts, where their wives fit by their fides, and where their young children be prefent, cause such foolish acts and specches to be represented, as trouble the spirits and disorder the passions of the minde more, than any drunkennesse whatsoever. But for the play of the harpe, which is of so great antiquitie, and ever fince before Homers time, hath beene a familiar friend and companion with fealts, and alwaies enterteined there, it were not meet nor honest for to dissolve that ancient friendship, and of fo long continuance; but we would request those minstrels that play and sing to the harpe, to take out of their fongs those dolefull plaints, dumps, and forrowfull lamentations, which be fo 30 ordinarie in them, and to chaunt pleafant ditties and fresh galliards, meet for those who are met to be merrie and jocund. Moreover, as touching the flute and hautboies, they will not be kept our, do what a man will, from the table; for if we do but offer our libations, by powring out wine in the honour of the gods, we must needs have our pipes, or els all were marred, yea, and chaplets of flowers upon our heads; and it feemeth that the gods themselves doe sing thereto and accord: moreover, the found of the flute doth dulce the spirits, it entreth into the cares with so milde and pleafant a tune, that it carrieth with it a tranquillitie and pacification of all motions, even unto the foule, in fuch fort, that if there did remaine in the understanding and minde, any gricte, any care or anxietie, which the wine had not discussed and chased away, by the gracious and anniable noise thereof, and the voice of the musician singing thereto, it quieteth it, and brin- 40 geth it affecpe: provided alwaies, that this instrument keepe a meane and mediocritie, so that it move not the foule too much, and make it passionate, with so many tunes and notes that it hath, at what time as the faid foule is fo drenched and wrought foft with wine, that it is readie to be affeeted therewith: for like as sheepe and other cattell, understand not any articulate language of a man, carrying a fenfe and understanding therewith; howbeit, with certaine whistles or chirts, done by lips or hands, or with the found of fome pipe or shell, the shepheards and other heardmen can tell how to raise them, or make them lie downe and couch; even so, the brutish part of our foule, which hath no understanding, nor is capable of reason, may be appealed, ranged and disposed as it ought to be, by songs and sounds, by measures, tunes and notes, as if it were charmed and enchanted by them: but to speake what I thinke, this is my conceit, that neither found 50 of flute, nor lute and harpe, by it felfe, without mans voice and fong to it, can make merrie the companie met together at a feast, so much as a good speech, well and properly fitted; for so we mult accustome our selves in good earnest, to take our principall pleasure and delight in speech, and to spend the most part of that time in discourse and communication : as for song and harmonie, we are to make (as it were) a fauce to our freech, not to licke them up and fwallow them downe alone by themselves: for like as no man will reject and resuse the pleasure that commeth by wine & viands taken for the necessitie of our nouriture, and bringing therewith commoditie of our health; but that which entreth by fweet fents and perfumes is not necessarie, but superfluous & delicate, Soerates sent away (as it were) with a box of the eare; even so we ought not to heare the sound of a flute or psalterie, which striketh and beateth upon our eares onely, but if it follow or accompanie our speech, which doth feast and exhilarat the reason that is in our soule, we may well admit and receive the same. And verily, for mine owne part, I thinke, that then he had eleft on why in old time. Apollo punished that prefumptuous Marsyas, was this, that when he had eleft dup his mouth with his pipe and muzzle together; he presumed to contend and strive (having nothing but the bare sound of thenaked stute) against him; who together with the sound of the harpe, had the song also and musicke of the voice: let us therefore in this one thing espectorially, beware and take heed, that in the companie of those men, who by their speech and learned discourses are able to delight and pleasure one another, we bring not in any such thing to enter in at their eares, which may be an impeachment and hinderance rather of their delight, than a delectation it selfe: for not onely they be so olish and ill advised, as Euripides saith:

but also, that they being provided sufficiently of meanes in themselves, to make their recreations of, and to folace their hearts, labour nevertheleffe all that ever they can, to have their delights 20 from others. For the magnificence of that great king of Persia, wherewith he meant to enterteine Amalcides the Lacedæmonian, seemed (I affure you) very groffe, ablurd and impertinent, namely, when he dipped and wet a chaplet of roses, saffron, and other odoriferous flowers, intermingled together, in a precious oile, and fo fent it unto him, doing injurie by that meanes to the flowers, and utterly quenching and marring that native beautie and fragrant sweetnesse of their owne; femblably, no leffe abfurditie it were, when a feaft hath mirth and muficke enough in it felfe, to goe about for to enchant and encharme it with other minstrelsie from abroad, and fo for a strange and borrowed delight, to bereave the guests of their owne and proper, and as one would fay, change the principall for the accefforie. I conclude therefore, that the fittest feafon for fuch amadement and occupying of the eares is, when the feaft beginneth a little to grow 30 turbulent, and to fall into fome contentious debate and braule, by heat of opinionative arguing, for to alay and quench all, that it breake not out, to opprobrious tearmes; or to represse a disputation, which is like to paffe the bounds of reasoning, and to grow unto an unpleasant and sophiflicall alteration; yea, and to flay all litigious wrangling and vehement invectives, beforming rather pleas at barre, or the orations in the publicke hall of a city, untill such time as the banquer be reduced into the former calme and tranquillitie.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

That to confult at the table, while men are drinking wine, was an ancient custome among the Greeks as well as Persuns.

Neitratus upon a time invited us to a supper; and when we were set, there arose some special stouching certains matters, upon which the Athenians were the morrow after to sit in councell, and to debate in a generall affemblie of the citie: now, as one of our companie cast out this word, and said: This is the Persian fashion, my masters, thus to consult and holde a councell at the boord. And why Persian rather than Grecian (quoth Glaucias?) for a Grecian I am sure he was, that said:

Taseis केन में मोर्टामड़ दिक्रों में प्रभाव केंप्रटीस्वर.

That is to fay,

From bellie full, be st counsell doth arise,

And surest plots men in that case devise.

And Greeks they were, who under the conduct of Agamemmon held Troy befieged; who as they were eating and drinking together, who also was himselfe the author of this meeting, and advised the king to invite his nobles, and the principall captaines of the armie to a dinner, for to fit in counsell in these tearnes:

The good old Neltor first began,
Wisely upon the point to scan.

Make

Make now a feast, I you advise my lord, And bid your auncient peeres; who when as bord They be all set; marke who gives counsell best, Obey his reed, and see therein yourest.

And therefore the most nations of Greece which were ruled under the best lawes, and most constantly reteined their auncient ordinances and customes, laid the first foundation of their government and counsell of State upon wine: for those guilds and societies in Candy, which they called Andreia, as also the Phidinia in Sparta, were instituted and held for privie counsels and assemblies of senators; like unto that, if I be not deceived, which even in this citie heere of Anthens goeth under the name of Prytaneion, and These short helion; and not farte different from these, to in that night assemblie of the principall personages, and most politicke States-men whereof Plato speaketh in his books, unto which he referreth the causes and affaires of most importance, which require greatest consultation: those counsellers of State also in Homer:

Who offer wine to Mctcutic, the last of others all, What time as now, bed-time it is, and them to fleepe dosh call.

doe not they I pray you joine wine and words together? when they are about therefore to depart, and retire themselves into their bed-chambers, the first thing that they do, is to make their praiets, and power out their libations of wine, unto the wifest God of all others, as if he were 20 is, a wife and present with them, and their superintendent to overset them: but they who were indeed the present of all others, called even Bacchus himselse * Eubulus, as if they had no need at seller, a light of Mercurie, and in regard also of him, they attributed unto night the name of * Euconomic phrone.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Whether they did well who fat in consultation at the table?

7 Hen Glaucius had spoken these words, we all thought that these turbulent and litigious 30 debates had beene well appealed and laid alleepe; but to the end that they might fo much the rather die and be buried in oblivion; Nicestratus provided another question and faid: At the first (quoth he) I made no great matter of this custome, nor regarded it much, taking it to be a meere Persian fashion; but now seeing it is discovered to be an order also among the Greeks, requifite and necessarie it is to render some reason thereof, for to defend it against an evident abfurditie, which at the first fight presenteth it selfe; for that the discourse of reason in manner of the eie, is hardly to be governed by us, and untoward for to be brought to performe her worke in a great quantitie of moisture, and the same as yet stirring and waving: and besides, all odious griefes, which on every fide appeare and come foorth to wine, like as fnakes, lizards, and fuch like ferpents, are brought to light and fhew themselves to the funne, cause the minde 40 to be wavering, inconstant, and irresolute: as therefore a bed or pallet is better than a chaire, for them that are disposed to drinke and make merry, for that it conteineth the body at full, and exempteth it from all maner of motion; even so the best way is, to keepe the soule quiet and in repose altogether; and if that may not be, to do by it as men doe by children that can rest and fland on no ground, but be evermore flirring; namely to give unto it, not a fword or a javelin, but a rattle or a ball, like as Bacchus putteth into the hands of drunken folke the ferula stalke (a most light weapon and instrument either to offend or defend withall) to the end that as they be readielt to strike, so they might be least able for to hurt: for the faults that bee committed in drunkennesse ought to passe lightly in mirth, and go away with a laughter, and not to bee lamentable tragicall, and bringing with them great calamities. Moreover, that which is the 50 chiefe and principall thing in confultation of great affaires, to wit, that hee who for want of wit and knowledge in the world, should follow the opinion of those who are of great conceit, deepe judgement, and long experience, this meanes wine bereaveth us of; infomuch as it feemeth hecreupon to have taken the name owes in Grecke; because as Plate saith, it causeth them drinke it freely, * isso; that is to fay, to have a good conceit and weening of themselves, as if they were very witty and wife: for how ever they take themselves to be eloquent, faire, or rich, as ordinarily they doe all of them; yet they effecine better of their owne wit and wife-dome, than of any thing elfe: and this is the reason that wine is talkative and full of words; it filleth us with lavish speech, and the same unseasonable; yea, it maketh us to have a marvellous good opinion of our felves in ech respect, as if we were woorthy to commaund and prescribe unto others, more meet to be heard than to heare, and fitter to leade and goe before, than to follow & come after: But (quoth Glaucian then) an eafie matter it is for any man to collect and alledge much tending unto this point, confidering how evident and plaine the thing is: it were good therefore to heare a discourse to the contrary, if haply any person, young or old, will itand up in defence of wine. Then our brother, full cunningly and fliely, like a crafty fophitter: Why (quoth he) thinke you that any man is able fo prefently and upon a fudden to devife and 10 speake unto the question in hand, all that may be faid probably thereto? And why (quoth Nicoftratus) should not I fo thinke, considering so many learned men in place, and those who love wine well enough? at which word the other fmiled and faid: Are you in deed fufficient, even in your owne conceit, to discourse upon this point before us, and yet indisposed, and altogether unable to confider upon State matters, and affaires of government, because you have taken your wine well? and is not this all one, as to thinke that he who hath drunke freely, feeth well enough with his eies, and howfoever he heareth not perfectly with his cares those whom hee speaketh and talketh with, yet for all that he hath the perfect hearing of those who either sing or play upon the flute? for as it is likely, and standeth to great reason, that good and profitable things should affect and draw the outward sences more unto them, than those which are 20 gaudie onely and fine; even fo no doubt, fuch matters make the minde also more intentive: and if a man for that he hath plied his drinking overmuch, cannot haply comprehend well the difficult subtilities of some high points in philosophic, I nothing marvell thereat; but if the queftion be of matters and affaires of State, great likelihood there is, that if he be called away thereto, he should gather his wits more close together, and be more vigorous; like as Philip king of Macedona, who having plaied the foole, and made himselfe ridiculous at Charonea, after the battell there, both in word and deed, upon his liberall drinking, prefently affoone as hee fell to treatie of peace and articles of agreement, hee composed his countenance to gravitie, knithis browes, and cast behinde him all vaine fooleries, wanton gestures and unfeemly behaviour, and fo gave unto the Athenians a fober, differeet, and well advifed au-30 fwere. And verily one thing it is to drinke well, and another thing to be starkedrunke : such as be so farre gone and overseene with drinke, that they know not what they do or fay, ought as we thinke, to take their beds and fleepe; as for those who have taken their wine in deed too much, and be fearfe fober (howbeit, otherwise men of wit and understanding) we shall never need to feare that they will faile in judgement, yea, and forget their experience, confidering that wee daily see these dancers, singers and ministrels performe their parts no worse at feasts, for all their liberall drinking, than in the publicke theaters: for the skill and knowledge, whereof they have gotten the habit, is evermore so present and readie with them, that it maketh their bodies active and nimble, able to performe those parts and functions directly, yea, and to answere the motions of the minde accordingly with confidence. Many there be also, in whose heads and hearts 40 wine so worketh, that it putteth into them an affured boldnesse and resolution, which helpeth them much to the performance of any great actions, and the fame is nothing infolent and outragious, but milde and gracious. And thus we reade of Aefebylas the poet, that he endited and wrote his tragedies when he was thorowly fet in an heat with wine; in fuch fort, as that they all were conceived by the influence of Bacchau, and not as Gorgias faith, that one of them, and namely, the greatest (intituled, The seven princes before Thebes) was begotten (as it were) by Mars. For winebeing of power to enchafe the bodie and minde both, according as Plato faith, causeth the bodie to be perspirable, quicke and active, opening all the pores and passages thereof, giving way unto the fantalies and imaginations eafily to runne forth, drawing out together with them, the affurance of reason and boldnesse of speech : for you shall have men, whose in-50 vention naturally is good enough, in whom (when they be fober and fasting) the same is colde, timorous, and in maner frozen; let them once be well plied with wine, cup after cup, you shall fee them evaporate and smoake out, like as frankine ensed of h by the heat of fire. Furthermore, the nature of wine, chafeth away all feare, which is as contrarie unto those who lit in confultation, as any thing in the world; it quencheth alfo, many other base and vile passions, such as malice and rancour; it openeth the double plates and folds of the minde, displaying and discovering the whole disposition and nature of a man, by his very words; yea, it hath a vertue to give franke and liberall speech; and consequently, audacitie to utter the trueth; without which, neither experience nor quickeneffe of wit availeth ought: for many there be, who putting in practife, and making use of that which commeth quickely into their heads, speed better, and have greater fuccesse, than those who warily, cautelously, and with much subtilitie, seeme to conceale and keepe in that which presenteth it selfe unto them, and be very lateward in delivering their opinion: we are not therefore to feare wine in this regard, that it stirreth up the passions of the minde; for it inciteth not the worft, unleffe it be in the wickeddeft men, whose counsell is at no time fober: but as Theophrastus was woont to call barbars shoppes, drie bankets without wine; even fo, there is akind of winelesse drunkennesse, and the same, sowre and unpleasant, dwelling continually within the mindes of men that be vicious and without good bringing up; troubled and vexed alwaies with fome anger, with grudge, malice, envie, emulation, contention, or illibe- 10 ralbafeneffe; of which vices, wine abating the edge of a great part, tather than tharpning them, maketh men not sottith fooles, and blockish dolts, but ready and apt, and yet circumspect, cautelous, and wary; not supine and negligent in matters concerning their profit; but yet industrious, and making choise of that which is good and honest: but such as tearme wily-craftinesse, by the name of fine wit, and take erroneous opinion and mechanicall nigardile, for wifedome, may even aswell and with as good reason say, that as many as when they be drinking at the table, speake their mindes roundly, and utter with libertie what they thinke, be senselesse fooles: but contrariwife, our ancients called Bacchus, Endosies and Aviner, which is as much to fay, as Deliverer and Freer; being of opinion, that there was to be ascribed unto him, a great part of divination, not for that he was furious, raging & mad, as Euripides faid, but because he delivereth the minde, 20 and freeth it from all fervile feare, diffidence and cowardife, giving us freedome and libertie to speake the trueth, and use franknesse of speech one to another.

The Proëme.

Hey that chafe philosophie out of feasts and banquets (ô Sossus Senetio) do not the same, but worse farre, than those who take away the light from thence; for that when the lampe is gone; such persons as be made temperate and well disposed, will be nothing the woorse therefore, making as they doe, more account of a reverent regard, than of the mutual sight one of another; whereas, if rudenesse, is norance and leauthesse be joined with wine, the very golden lampe of Minerva, if it were there, could not possibly make the feast or banquet lovely, gracious, modest, and well ordered: for that men should feed and fill themselves together in silence; without a word faying were the fashion that favoured very much of still swine at their draffe, and perhaps a thing impossible: but who loever referveth speech in a feast, and withall, admitteth not the wife and 20 profitable use thereof, is more worthy to be laughed at, than he who thinketh verily, that guests thould be ever eating and drinking at a supper, but not filleth unto them, wine undelaied, unseafoned, and which is meere of it felfe; or fetteth before them, viands unfeafoned, without falt or fauce, and the fame not cleanly dreffed; for that there is no meat or drinke fo unfavorie, unpleafant and hurtfull, for want of good and orderly handling, as words carried unfeemly, and without discretion, at a banquet: which is the reason, that philosophers when they reproove drunkennesse, call it a dotting by wine; and furely, this dotage is no other thing, but raving or vaine, foolish and undifereet using of words: now when difordinate babling and foolish talke, meeteth once with wine in a banquet, it can not chuse but the iffue thereof will be reprochfull contumelie, infolencie, brainficke follie and villanie, which of all others, is a most unpleasant end, and far-30 theft from all muses and graces: and therefore it is no foolish ceremonie and absurd fashion. which the women in our countrey observe at their feasts called Agrenia, where they make semblance for a while, as if they fought for Bacchin, being fled out of the way, but afterwards give over feeking, and fay that he is gone away, and run to the mufes, and there lurketh, and lieth hidden among them : and anon, when supper is ended, they use to put forth darke riddles, and propose questions one to another, hard to be solved: the mysterie whereof, teacheth us thus much, that both we, ought at the table, to use such speech as doth conteine some good learned speculation and erudition; and also, that when those discourses are joined with wine and drunkennesse, then they be the muses who hide and cover all furious outrage and enormitie, which also is willing to be deteined and kept by them.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

As touching those dates which are enmobled by the nativitie of some renowmed persons; and withall of that progenie or racewhich is faid to be derived from the gods.

This book then, which is the eighth in order of our fympossaques or discourses at the table, shall conteine in the first place, that which not long since we chanced to heare and speake, that day whereon we celebrate the seast of Places nativity: for having solemnized the birth day of Secrates upon the fixth of February; the morow after, which was the seventh of that moneth, so we did the like by Plato; which gave us occasion, and ministred matter first to enter into a began first in this maner: 10m the poet (quoth he) said not amisse of tortune, that being as she was, different from wisdome in many things, yet she brought soorth effects not a sew like unto her; and as for this, it seemeth that she hath caused it to fall out very well and fitly, and not without some skill, (rash though she be otherwise) not only for that these two birth-daies jumpe so nere one unto the other, but also because, that of the master who was of the twaine more ancient, commeth also in order before the other. Whereupon it came into my head also to alledge many many examples of occurrents happening likewife at one and the fame time; and namely, as rouching the birth and death of Euripides, who was borne that very day whereon the Greeks tought the navall battell of Solamis at fea with the king of Perfia, and whole fortune it was to die the Jame day that Denys the elder tyrant of Swille was borne; as if fortune of purpole (as Timeus faith) had taken out of the world a poet, who represented tragicall calamities, the very same day that the brought into the world the actour thereof. Mention also was made of the death of king Alexander the Great, which fell out just upon the same day that Diogenes the Cynicke philosopher departed this life; and by one generall voice accorded it was, that king Attalus left his life, the very day that hee celebrated the memoriall of his nativitie : and fome there were who faid, that Pompey the Great died in Aegypt, the fame day of the yere that he was born 3 though others 10 affirmed that it was one day fooner: femblably, there came into our remembrance at the fame time Pinda us, who being borne during the folemnutie of the Pythicke games, composed afterwards many hymnes in the honour of that god, for whom those games were solemnized. Then Florus faid, that Carneades was not unworthy to be remembred upon the day of Platoes nativity, confidering he was one of the most famous pillers that supported the schoole of Academy; and both of them were borne at the festivall times of Apollo; the one in Athens, what time as the feast Thargellawas holden; and the other, that very day when as the Cyrenians folemnized it, which they call Carnea; and both of them fell out just upon the feventh day of Februarie; on which day you my mafters, who are the prophets and priefts of Apollo, doe fay that himfelfe was borne, and therefore you call him Hebdomagenes: neither doe I thinke, that they who attribute 20 unto this God, the fatherhood of Plato, doe him any dishonour, in that he hath begotten and provided for us a physician, who by the meanes of the doctrine of Socrates, even another Chrion, cureth and healeth the greater infirmities and more grievous maladies of the foule. Moreover, it was not forgotten, how it was held for certeine, that Apollo appeared in a vision by night, unto Ariston the father of Plato, and a voice befides was heard, forbidding him expresly not to lie with his wife, nor to touch her for the space of ten moneths. Hereupon Tyndares the Lacedæmonian (econded these words, and said, that by good right we were to sing and say thus of Plato:

He seemed not the sonne of mortall wight; Some god for fire, he may avouch by right.

Howbeit, for my part, I am afraid, that to beget repugneth no leffe with the immortalitie of the 30 deitic, than to be begotten; for furely, even the act of generation, implieth also a mutation and pullion; and king Alexander the Great fignified no leffe one time, when he faid, that he knew himselfe principally to be mortall and subject to corruption, by having companie with a woman, & by his fleep: for that fleepe is occasioned by a relaxation proceeding from feebleneffe; and as for all generation, performed it is by the passage of some portion of ones selfe into another; and to much therfore is loft & gone from the principall; and yet on the other fide, I take heart againe, and am confirmed, when I heare Plato himfelfe to call the eternall God, who never was borne nor begotten, Father and Creatour of the world, and of other things generable; not that God doth engender after the maner of men, by the meanes of naturall feed; but by another power doth ingenerate and infuse into matter, a vertue generative, and a principle, which alter-40 eth, moveth, and transmuteth the same:

For even by windes that female birds inspire, Conceiv'd they be, when they to breed defire.

Neither doe I thinke it any abfurditie, that a god companying with a woman, not as man, but after another fort of touching & contractation, and by other meanes, altereth and replenisheth her, being a mortall creature, with divine and heavenly feed: And this is (quoth he) no invention of mine: for the Aegyptians hold that their Apis is in that manner engendred by the light of the moone, firiking upon his dam, whereby the is conceived; and generally they admit thus much, that a god of the male fex, may deale with a mortall woman: but contrariwife, they think not that a mortall man is able to give unto any goodesse the beginning of conception or birthsforthey are of opinion, that the fubltance of these goddesses, consisteth in a certeine aire, and spirits, yea and in certeine heats and humors. THE SECOND QUESTION.

How Plato is to be under stood, when he sath: That God continually is exercised in Geometry.

Free these words, there ensued some filence for a while; and then Diogenianus beginning Aagaine to speake: How thinke you masters (quoth he) are you contented & well pleased, confidering that we have had some speech already of the gods, and that on the day wherein we folemnize the nativitie of Plato, that we make him partaker also of our conference, and take octo casion thereby, to consider upon what intention and in what sense hehath said, that God continually practifeth Geometrie, at leastwife if we may presuppose and set down, that he it was who was the author of this sentence: Then said I: Written it is not in any place of al his books; howbeit , held to be a faying of his, and it favoreth much of his stile and maner of phrase. Whereupon Tyndares immediately taking the words out of his mouth: Thinke you (quoth he) ô Diogemianus, that this sentence covertly and in mysticall tearmes, signifieth any darke subriltie, and not the very fame, which Plate himselfe hath both said and written in praising and magnifying Geometrie, as being the thing which plucketh those away who are faltened unto sensible objects, and averteth them to the confideration of such natures, as be intelligible and eternall 5 the contemplation whereof is the very end of philosophie, even as the view and beholding of 20 fecret facred things, is the end of religious mysteries: for the naile of pleasure and paine, which fasteneth the soule unto the bodie, among other mischieses that it doth unto man, worketh him this displeasure as it should seeme above all, that it causeth sensible things to be more evident unto him, than intellectuall, and forceth his understanding to judge by passion more than by reason: for being accustomed by the sense and feeling of extreame paine, or exceeding pleafure of the body, to be intentive unto that wandring, uncerteine, and mutable nature of the bodie, as seeming a thing substittent, blinded hee is, and loseth altogether the knowledge of that which is effentiall indeed, and hath a true being, forgoing that light and inflrument of the foule, which is better than ten thousand bodily eies, and by which organe alone, he might see the deitie and divine nature: for fo it is, that all other sciences which we name mathematicall, as 30 in fo many mirrors, not twining and warping, but plaine, smooth, and even, there appeare the very tracts, prints, and images of the truth of things intelligible: but Geometric especially which Philo calleth the mother citie, and mistressecommaunding all the rest, doth divert and gently withdraw by little and little, the minde purified & clenfed from the cogitation of fenfuall things: and this is the reason that Plate himselfereprooved Eudox su, Archit as, and Menachmus, who went about to reduce the duplication of the cube or folide square into mechanicall instruments, and artificiall engines, as if it had not beene possible, (if a man would set unto it) by demonstration of reason to finde our and comprehend, two middle lines proportionall; for he objected unto them: That this was as much as to destroy and overthrow the best thing in Geometrie, when by this meanes they would have her turne backe againe unto fensible things, 40 and keepe her from mounting up aloft, and embracing those eternall and incorporall images; upon which God being continually intentive, is therefore alwaies God.

After Tyndares, Floras a familiar friend of his, and one who made femblant alwaies by way of fport and gave it out in word, that he was timorous of him: Well done of you (quoth hee) in that you would not have this speech to be your owne, but a common saying of every man, and you would feeme to argue and proove, that Plato howeth how Geometric is not necessary for the gods, but formen for God hath no need of any mathematicall science, as an engine or inftrument to turne him from thingsingendred, and to bring about and direct his intelligence and understanding unto those that be of an eternal effence: For why? Inhim, with him, and a, bout him they be alibut take heed rather, & fee whether Plato hath not covertly under these dark 50 words lifted and fignified for curtar that is pertinent and proper unto you, which you have not marked and observed, in that hee joineth Lyoungan with Socrates, no leffe than Pythagoras, as Dicearchus was of opinion: for Lycurgus as you know very well, chaled out of Lacedamon, arithmeticall proportion as a popular thing, turbulent and apt to make commotions; but hee brought in the Geometricall, as befitting the civill and modest government of some sew wife fages, and a lawfull rotaltic and regall dominion: for the former giveth equally unto all according to number; but the other unto every one, by reason and with regard of desert and woorthinesse; this proportion (I say) maketh no confusion of all together, but in it there is an apparent discretion and distinction betweene the good and the bad, dealing alwaies unto every one their owne, not by the balance or lot, but according to the difference of vice and vertue: God therefore useth this proportion, and applieth it unto things and the same it is (my good friend Tyndares) which is called Dice and Nemefit; teaching us there by, that we ought to make of juflice, equalitie, and not of equallity, justice; for the equalitie which the common fort seeketh after, and is indeed the greatest injustice that may be, God taketh out of the world, and as much as possibly may be, observeth that which is fit and meet for every one according to desert and worthinesse, going heerein Geometrically to worke, by reason and law defining and distributing

When we had praised this exposition and interpretation of his, Tyndares said: That he en- 10 vied fuch commendation, exhorting Autobulus to fet against Florus, to consute him, and correct that which he had delivered. That he refused to do; howbeit, he opposed and brought forth a certeine opinion and conceit of his owne: Thus it is (quoth he) Geometrie is not a speculative skill of mens manners and behaviour, nor yet occupied about any subject matter whatsoever, but the symptomes, accidents, and passions of those extremities or termes which accomplish bodies: neither hath God by any other meanes framed and made the world, but onely by determining or making finit that matter which was infinit in it felfe, not in regard of quantititie, greatneffe, and multitude; but for that being as it was, inconstant, wandering, disorderly, and unperfect, our auncients were wont to call it infinit, that is to fay, undetermined and unfinithed: for the forme and figure is the terme or end of every thing that is formed and thapen; 20 the want whereof made it of it selfe to be shapelesse and dissignred : but after that numbers and proportions come to be imprinted upon the rude and formelesse matter, then being tied and bound (as it were) first with lines, and after lines, with superficies and profundities, it brought foorth the first kinds and differences of bodies, as the foundation and ground-worke for the generation of aire, earth, water, and fire: for impossible it had beene, and absurd, that of matter fo wandring, fo errant, and diforderly, there should arife equalities of fides, and similitudes of angles, in those solide square bodies, which were called Ottaedra and Eicosaedra, that is to faie, with eight and twentie bases: likewise in pyramidals and cubes, unlesse there had been some worke-man to limit, ordeine, and dispose everything Geometrically; thus a limit or terme being given unto that which was infinit; all things in this univerfall world, composed, ordered, and contempered accordingly in excellent manner, were first and made, and are made now every day 3 notwithstanding the said matter striveth and laboureth daily to returne unto her infinit estate, as very loth and refusing to be thus geometrized, that is to say, reduced to some finit and determinate limits; whereas reason on the contraristide, restreineth and comprehendeth her; distributing her into divers Ideaes, from which all things which are ingendred, take their generation and constitution.

He had no sooner thus said, but he requested me to contribute somewhat also of mine owne unto this discourse and question in hand but I for my part, commended highly their opinions, thus delivered, as being naturally and directly devised by themselves and their owne proper inventions, faying withall: That they caried with them fufficient probabilitie: But for that (quoth I) you should not be displeased and offended with your selves, nor altogether have your sie abroad and looke unto others, liften and heare what meaning and interpretation of the faid fentence, was most approoved unto our masters and teachers: for there is among the propositions, or positions rather, and theoremes geometricall, one above the rest, to wit; When two formes or figures are given and put downe, to let a third thereto, equall to the one, and femblable to the other; for the invention whereof, it is faid, that Pythagorus facrificed unto the gods: for this Theorem without all doubt is more gallant, witty, and learned, than that, by which he did demonstrate, and proove that the slope line Hypotinusa, availeth as much as the two laterales, which make a right angle in a triangle : Well faid of you (quoth Diogenianus) but what ferveth this for the matter now in question? You shall understand soone (quoth 1) 50 in case you will call to memory that division in Timau, whereas the philosopher made a tripartite distribution of those principles, whereby the world had the beginning of generation; of which, the one he called by a most just name, God; the second Matter; and the third Forme or Idea: So the matter of all subject things is most disordinate; the Idea of all mouldes and patterns, most beautifull; but God of all causes simply the best: Thus would not he admit, or leave anything, as farre foorth as possibly might otherwise be, infinit and undeterminate; but adorne nature with proportion, measure, and number, making of all subjects one thing, in quantity equall to the matter, & in quality femblable to the forme, fetting therefore before him this proposition, having already twain, a third to it hemade, doth make and preserve for ever, equal to the matter, & semblable to the forme, to wit, the world; which being alwaies in regard of that inbred necessitie of a bodie, subject to generation, alteration, & allkinds of passion, is aided and fuccoured by the creatour and father thereof, who determineth the substance by reason of just proportion, according to the image of the patron, whereby the pour prile and circuit of this univerfall world is more beautifull, being thus vast and great, than if it had beene leffe and competent,

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the reason that the night is more resonant or resounding than the day?

S we fat at supper one evening in Athens with Ammonius, we heard a great tumult & noise which rangall the house over, of people in the street without, crying aloud; Captaine, captaine: now was Ammonius then the third time prætor or captaine of the citie: Hee fent foorth immediately some of his men about him, to see what the matter was; who presently appeafed the hurry, and difmiffed those who had raised this outcry: upon which occasion wee in the meane while entred into question: Why those who are within house heare them very well 20 that cry without; but they that are abroad heare not fo eafily those within, crying as loud? Ammonius incontinently made answer and faid, that this question had already beene solved by Ariflotte in this wife: For that the voice of those within being once gotten foorth and flowen into a wide place of much aire, vanisheth away, and is diffipated immediately; whereas the voice of them without, when it is entred in, doth not the like, but is reteined and kept close, and so by consequence more easie to be heard: But there is another thing (quoth hee) which require the rather to have a reason rendred thereof; namely: Why in the night season all voices due refound greater than in the day time, and befides the greatnesse, are more cleere, distinct, articulate, & audible ? For mine owne part(quoth he) I am of this minde, that the divine providence hath in great wisedome ordeined, that our hearing should be more fresh and quicke, when as 30 our fight ferveth us in little or no ftead at all; for feeing that the aire of the night which accorcording to Empedocles,

Wandreth alone, and folitary,

And doth blind eies about her cary. is obscure and darke, looke how much detect it maketh in our fight, so much it supplieth and requiteth in our eares: but for that of things also which necessarily are done by nature, the causes ought to be fought out, and the proper & peculiar office of a philosopher and naturalist, is to buffe himfelfe in feeking after the materiall causes, & instrumentall principles; which of all you will first come forth with some probable reason, as touching this matter? whereupon there being fome paufe & filence for a time, Boethus faid thus: When I was my felfe a yong man, and a 40 student, I made use otherwhiles of those principles which are in Geometrie called Positions: and certaine propositions I supposed as undoubted truthes, without any need of demonstration: but now will I use some of those which hecretosore have beene prooved by Epicurus, as for example: Those things which be, are caried in that which is not, nor hath any being: for much vacuitie or voidnesse there is stored as it were, and intermingled among those atomes or indivifible little bodies of the aire, which when it is fpred abroad in spacious capacitie, and by reafon of the raritie and thinnesse thereof, runneth too and fro round about: there be a number of small, void, and emptie places, among those little motes or parcels scattered here and there, and taking up the whole region: but contrariwife, when they are pent in, and a restreint and compression made of them, being thrust together into a little space; these small bodies being 30 hudled perforce one upon another, leave a large voide space, to vague and range abroad: and this doth the night by reason of cold; for heat doth loosen, difgregate, scatter and dissolve all thicke things, which is the reason why those bodies which either boile, thaw, or melt, occupie more roome: contrariwife, such which gather, congeale, and beefrozen, come together close, and be united, leaving an emptie place in those vessels wherein they were conteined, and from which they be retired: The voice therefore comming among, and lighting upon many of these bodies thus scattered and dispersed thicke everie where, either is drowned altogether at once or difgregated and broken as it were in pieces, or elfe meeteth with many impeach-

ments to withstand and stay it: but where there is a space void, and wherein there is not a bodie, it having a free and full course, and the same not interrupted, but plaine and continued, commeth fo much the fooner unto the care, and together with that fwiftnesse, reteineth still the articulate, expresse, and distinct found of every word in speech for you see how emptie vessels, if a man knocke upon them, answere better to every stroake, and carrie the found and noise a great way off, yea, and many times they yeeld a found that goeth round about, and continue tha good while, redoubling the noise; whereas let a veffell be filled either with folid bodies, or els with fome liquor, it is altogether deafe and dumbe, if I may fo fay, and yeeldeth no found againe; for that it hath no place nor way to passe thorow. Now among solid bodies, gold and stone, because they be full and massie, have a very small and seeble found, that will be heard any way, and 10 that little which they doc render, is soone gone: contrariwise, brasse is verie vocall, resonant, and (as one would fay) a blab of the tongue; for that it hath much emptineffe in it, and the fubstance or masse thereof, is light and thinne, not compact of many bodies, hudled together, and thrust one upon another; but hath foilon and plentie of that substance mingled together, which is foft, yeelding and notrefifting the touch or the stroake, which affoordeth easinesse unto other motions, and so enterteining the voice gently and willingly, sendeth it untill it meet fourthing in the way which stoppeth the mouth; for then it staieth and ceaseth to pierce any surther, because of the stoppage that it findeth. And this is it (quoth he, in mine opinion) that caufeth the night to be more resonant, and the day, lesse; for that the heat in day time which dissolveth the aire, caufeth the intervalles betweene the atomes or motes above faid, to be the smaller: 20 this onely I would request, that no man here doe oppose himselfe to contradict the premisses and first suppositions of mine. Now when as Ammonius willed me to say somewhat, and replie against him: As touching your formost supposals, friend Boethus (quoth I) about the great emptinesse, let them stand, fince you will have it so; but whereas you have set downe, that the said emptinesse maketh much for the motion and easie passage of the voice, I like not well of that supposition; for surely, this qualitie not to be touched, simitten, or made to suffer, is rather proper unto filence and ftill tacitumitie; whereas the voice is the firiking and beating upon a founding bodie; and a founding bodie is that which accordeth and correspondeth to it felfe, moveable, light, uniforme, simple and pliable, like as is our aire; for water, earth and fire, be of themfelves dumbe & speechlesse; but they found & speake all of them, when any spirit or aire is got- 20 ten in, then (I fay) they make a noise: as for brasse, there is no voidnesse within it; but for that mixed it is with an united and equall spirit, therefore it answereth against o claps and knocks, and therewithall refoundeth: and if wee may conjecture by that which our cie feeth and judgeth, yron feemeth to be spongeous, and as it were worme-eaten within, full of holes, and hollowed in maner of hony combs; howbeit, a mettall it is of all other, that hath the woorst voice, and is most mute: there was no need therfore to trouble the night so much in restreining, compreffing, and driving in the aire thereof fo close of the one fide, and leaving fo many places and spaces void on the other fide; as if the aire impeached the voice, and corrupted the substance thereof, considering it selfe is the very substance, forme and puissance of it: over and besides, it fhould follow thereupon, that unequall nights, namely, those that be foggie and mistic, or ex- 40 ceeding colde, were more resonant than those that be faire and cleere; for that in such nights, those atomes are clunged close together, and looke where they come, they leave a place void of bodies: moreover, (that which is easie and evident to be seene) the colde Winter night ought by this reckoning to be more vocall and fuller of noise, than the hot Summers night; whereof neither the one nor the other is true : and therefore (letting this reason, such as it is, goe by) I will produce Anaxagoras, who faith: That the funne caufeth the aire to move and ftirre after a certaine trembling motion, as if it did beat and pant; as it may appeare by those little motes and shavings (as it were) in maner of dust, which flutter and flie up and downe thorow those holes; whereas the funne-thine paffeth, fuch as some Greeks call naz: which (faith he) chirming (as it were) and making a humming in the day time, cause by their noise, any other voice or found 50 not to easie to be heard; but in the night season, as their motion ceaseth, so consequently, their noise also is gone.

After I had thus faid, Ammonius began in this wife: We may be deemed haply ridiculous (quoth he) to thinke that we can refure Democritus, or to go about for to correct Anaxogor as; howbeit, we mult of necessitie take from these little bodies of Anaxogor as his devising, this chirming noise beforefaid, which is neither like to be so, nor any waies necessarie: sufficient it wil be to admit the trembling motion and stirring of them, dancing as they doe, in the same light, and but by that meanes difgregating and breaking the voice many times, and featter it to and fro: for the aire (as hath bene faid already) being the very body and fubthance of the voice, if it be quiet and fetled, giveth a direct, united and continued way unto the finall parcels and movings of the voice, to paffe along a great way: for calme weather and the tranquillitie of the aire, is refonant, whereas contrariwise, tempettuous weather is dumbe and mute: according to which, Simondes hath thus written:

For then, no blasts of winde arose on hie, Shaking tree-leaves; that men need once to seare Lest they might breake sweet songs and melodic, Stopping the sound from passage to their care.

For often times the agitation of the aire, permitteth not the full, expresse and articulate forme of the voice, to reach unto the sense of thearing; howbeit, somewhat it carrieth alwaies thorow from it, if the same be multiplied much and forced aloud: as for the night, in it selse it hath nothing to thire and trouble the aire; whereas the day hath one great cause thereof, to wit, the sun, as Anaxagoras himselfe hath said.

Then Then John the forme of Ammonius, taking his turne to speake: What should we meane by this I pray you in the name of Jupiter (quoth he) to attribute this cause unto an invisible motion of the aire; and leave the agitation, to sing and divulsion thereof, which is to manifest and evident to our cies? for this great ruler and commander in the heaven, Jupiter, doth not after an imperceptible maner, nor by little and little, stirre the smallest parcels of the aire, but all at once, so so so she she sheweth his sace, exciteth and movethall things in the world.

which they no fooner fee, but they obey and follow; as if together with the new day, they were regenerate againe, and entred into another manner of life, as Democritus faith; fetting themfelves unto their bufineffe and affaires, not without fome noife & effectual cries: in which fenfe Ibyeu called not impertinently the morning, or dawning of the day Clytus, for that now we begin Autor, that is to fay, to heare others, yea, & to fpeake aloud our felves: whereas the aire of the night being for the most part calme and still, without any waves and billowes, for that everice 30 thing is at rest and repose, by all likelihood conveigheth the voice entier and whole unto us, not broke nor diminished one jot. At these words, Aristodemus of Cypres, who was one of our companie: But take heed Thrasyllus, (quoth he) that this which you say be not convinced and resuted by the battels and marches of great armies in the night feafon, for that upon fuch an occafion the noise and outcries be no leffe relounding and cleere, how troubled and waving soever the aire be, than otherwife: and peradventure there is some cause thereof, proceeding also from our selves; for the most part of that which we speake in the night season, is of this nature, that either we commaund fome body after a turbulent manner, as if a paffion urged us thereto, or if we demaund and aske ought, we cric as loud as we can; for that the thing which wakeneth and maketh us to rife at fuch a time (when as we should sleepe and take our repose) for to speake or 40 doe any thing, is no fmall matter or peaceable, but great and important, halting us for the urgent necessitie thereof unto our businesse, in such fort, that our words and voices which then we utter, go from us in greater force and vehemency.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

How it comes to passe, that of the sacred games of prize some use one maner of chaplet, and some another, yet all have she branch of the date tree? Also why the great dates bee called Nicolai?

During the folemnitie of the Isthmick games, at what time as Sospis was the judge and directour thereof now the second time: other feasts of his I avoided; namely, when as hee invited one while many strangers together; and otherwhiles a number of none else but citizens, and those one with another; but one time above the rest, when as hee scatted those one-ly who were his greatest friends, and all, men of learning, I my selfe also was a bidden guest, and present among them; now by that time that the first service at the table was taken awaie, there came one unto the prosessed contains and rhetorician Herodes, who brought unto him from a scholar and familiar of his, who had wonne the prize, for an encomiasticall or laudatoric torie orazion that he had made, a branch of the date tree, together with a plaited and broided coronet of flowers; which when he had curteoufly received, he returned them backe to him again. faying withall: that hee marvelled why fome of thele facred games had for their prize this crowne, and others that, but generally all, a branch of date tree: For mine owne part (quoth he) I cannot perswade my selfe that this ariseth upon that cause which some alledge; namely, the equality and uniformitie of the leaves, foringing and growing our as they doe, alwaies even and orderly, one just against another directly, wherein they seeme to contend and strive a vie. refembling thereby a kinde of combat; and that victorie it selfe tooke the name in Greeke Nuc, as it were and cheen, that is to say, not yeelding nor giving place: for there be many other plants which as it were by weight and measure, distribute nourishment equally unto their boughes 10 and branches growing opposite in that manner, and heerein observe exactly a woonderfullorder and equality: but in my conceit, more probabilitie and apparence of reason they alledge, who imagine & suppose, that our auncients made shoice of this tree, because they tooke a love to the beautic, talneffe, and ftreight growing thereof, and namely Homer, who compareth the beautic of Mausicaa the Phæocian queene, unto the plant or stem of a faire date tree: for this you all know verie well, that in old time they were wont alwaies to cast upon those victorious champions who had wonne the prize, roses, and rose champion flowers; yea and some otherwhiles apples and pomegranates, thinking by this meanes to recompence and honour them: but there is nothing effeto much in the date tree, to commend it to evidently above other trees: for in all Greece fruit it beareth none that is good to be eaten, as being unperfect and not ripe 30 enough; and if it bare heere as it doth in Syria and Aegypt, the date which of all fruits for the lovely contentment of the cic, is of all fights most delightsome, and for the sweetnesse of talle, of all banquetting diffies most pleasant, there were not a tree in the world comparable unto it: and verily the great monarch and emperour Augustus by report, for that he loved fingularly well, one Micolaus a philosopher Peripatetick, in regard that he was of gentle nature and sweet behaviour, tall and flender withall of stature, and besides of a ruddy and purple colour in his vilage, called the fairest and greatest dates, after his name, Nicolai, and to this day they beare that denomination.

In this discourse, Herodes pleased the company no lesse with the mention of Nicolaus the philosopher, than he did with that which he had spoken to the question: And therefore (quoth 30 Sossi) to much the rather ought we every one to devise for to conferre unto this question propounded, whatsoever hee is persuaded concerning it: Then I for my partiss, brought foorth mine opinion as touching the superioritie of this date tree at the facred games, because the glorie of victours and conquerors, ought to endure and continue incorruptible, and as much as possibly may be not age and waxe old: for the date tree liveth as long as any plant whatsoever that is longest lived: and this is testified by these verses of Orpheus:

And this is the onely tree in manner, which hath that propertie indeed, which is reported though not fo truely, of many others: And what is that ? namely, to carie the leaves firme and 40 fait, so as they never tall off; for we do not fee, that either the lawrell or olive tree, nor the myrtle, nor any other trees which are said to shed no leafe, keepe alwaies the same leaves still; but as the first fall, others put foorth, and by this meanes they continue alwaies fresh and greene, living evermore as cities and great townesdoe; whereas the date tree never loseth any of those leaves which once came foorth, but continues thill clad with the same leaves; and this is that vigour as I take it which men dedicate and appropriat especially to the force or strength of victorie.

When Soffish had made an end of this speech, Protogenes the Grammarian calling by name unto Praxiteis, the discourser and historian: Shall wee suffer these oratours and rhetoricians (quoth he) after their usuall maner and profession, to argue thus by conjectures and likely probabilities; and can we alledge nothing out of histories pertinent directly unto this matter? and verily for mine owne part, if my memoric faile me not, have not read long since in the Attique annales, that These which since the outgames of prize in the sile Delos, brake & plucked from the facted date tree, a branch, which thereupon was called Spadis; and Praxitelist said as much: But some onen (quoth he) might aske of These winniesse, what reason induced him (when he proposed the prize of victorie) to pull a branch from the date tree, rather than from the laurell or olive tree? and what will you say, if this be a Pythicke prize? for that the Amphistiones honored first at Delphos, the victours, with abranch of date tree and laurell, in honour of Pythius Apello, considering that the maner was not to consecrate unto that God, the laurell or olive onely, but also the date tree; like as Niesa did, when in the name of the Athenians, he defiated the charges of games, in Delpis; and the Athenians, at Delphi; and before them, Cypselus the Corinthian; for otherwise, this God of ours hath evenmore loved those games of prize, yea, and was desirous to win the victorie, having strove personally himselse in playing upon the harpe, in singing, and slinging the coit of brassle; yea; and as some some say, at hurl-bass and sift-sight; savouring men also, and taking theirpart at such combats; as Homer seemeth to testisse, when he bringeth in Abbilles, speaking in this wise:

Two champions now, who simply are of all the armie best, Myplessare is shall forth advance;
and sooke who us so blest,
And sovured at busset fight,
by god Apollocs grace,
As for to win the victoric, and honour, in that place.

Also when he speaketh of archers, he saith expresly, that one of them who invocated upon pollo, and praied unto him for helpe, had good fucceffe, and carried away the best prize; but the 20 other, who was fo proud, and would not call upon the god for his aid, miffed the marke & scope whereat he shot. Neither is it likely or credible, that the Athenians dedicated their publicke place of exercise, unto Apollo, for nothing, and without good cause; but surely thus they thought, that the fame God unto whom we are beholden for our health, giveth us also the force and strong disposition of bodie, to performe such games and feats of activitie. But whereas, fome combats there be, fleight and easie; others, hard and grievous: we finde in writing, that the Delphians facrificed unto Apollo, by the name of Pyctes, that is to fay, the champion at fiftfight: but the Candians and Lacedæmonians offered facrifice unto the fame God, furnamed, the Runner. And feeing as we do, that the maner is to prefent in his temple within the citie of Delphos, the primices or dedications of the spoiles and bootie gained from the enemies in war, 30 as also to confectate unto him the Trophees; is not this a great argument and testimonie, that in this God it lieth most to give the victorie and conquest? And as he went forward, and was minded to fay more, Cephil we the fonne of Theon, interrupted his speech, saying: These allegations (beleeve me) favour not of histories, nor of Cosmographicall books; but being fetched immediatly out of the minds of those Peripateticall discourses, are handled and argued probably to the purpole: and befides, whiles you take up the fabricke or engine, after the maner of tragedian plaiers, you intend as it thould feeme, to afright by intimating the name of Apollo, those that contradict and gainfay your opinions: and yet (as well beformeth his goodnesse and bountie) he is indifferent and alike affected unto all; in clemencie and benignitie: but we following the tracts & steps of Sofpin, who hathled us the way very well, keepe our felves to the date 40 tree, which afoordeth us sufficient matter to discourse thereof againe: for the Babylonians doc chaunt and fing the praises of this tree; namely, that it bringeth unto them three hundred and threescore forts of fundrie commodities; but we that are Greeks, have little or no profit thereby: howbeit, good philosophie may be drawen out of it, for the better instruction of champions and fuch as are to performe combats of prize, in that it beareth no fruit with us: for being a right goodly, faire, and very great tree, by reason of the good habit and disposition thereof, yet is it not here among us, fruitfull; but by this strong constitution that it hath, it imploieth and spendeth all nouriture to feed and fortifie the bodie, after the maner of champions, by their exercise, so as there remaineth but a little behinde, and the fame not effectuall for feed: over and above all this, one qualitie it hath, proper, and peculiar to it felfe alone, and that which agreeth not to any 50 other tree, the which I intend to thew unto you: For the woodie fubstance of this date tree aloft, if a man feeme to weigh and preffe downe with any heavie burden, it yeeldeth not, nor floupeth under the poise, but curbeth upward archwise, as withstanding that, wher with it is charged and preffed; and even fo it is with those combatants in facred games: for such as through feeblenesse of bodie, or faintnesse of heartseeme to yeeld, those, the said exercises doe bend and keepe under; but as many as froutly abide, not onely with their strong bodies, but also with magnanimous courage, these bethey that are raised up on high, and mount unto honour.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that they who saile upon the river Nilus, draw up water for their use, before day light?

Ne there was, who demanded upon a time the reason, why the water-men who saile and row upon the river Nilse, provided themselves of that water which they drinke, in the night, and not by day. Some faid, it was, because they feared the sunne, which by enchasting and heating the water, maketh it more subject to corruption and putrifaction : for whatsoever is 10 warmed or made hot, the fame is alwaies more ready and disposed to mutation, and doth soone alter, by relaxation of the proper and native qualitie that it hath: whereas colde, by reftreining, feemeth to conteine and keepe each thing in the owne kinde or nature; and water, especially. Now, for the trueth of this, that the coldnesse of water hath vertue to preserve, the snowe is a sufficient testimonic, which keepeth flesh a long time sweet, and without corruption; but contrariwife, heat causeth all things to goe out of their owne nature, yea, even honie it selfe; for being once boiled, marred it is; but if it continue raw, it not onely keepeth it selfe well enough, but helpeth to preserve other things; and for a further proofe of this matter, the water of lakes and pooles is a principall thing to confirme the same; for as potable it is, and as good to drinke in Winter, as any other waters; but in Summer, the same is starke naught, and breedeth diseases: 20 and therefore, fince the night answereth to Winter, and the day to Summer, those water men of Nilus abovefaid, are of this opinion: That water wil continue longer before it turne and corrupt, if it be drawen in the night feason. To these allegations, which of themselves seemed to catry probabilitie enough, reason also includeth as an evident & inartificiall proofe to strengthen and confirme the experience and beleefe of these water men; for they faid, that they drew water, whiles the river was yet still and quiet; for in the day time, many men either faile upon it, or otherwife, fetch water from it; many beafts also, passe to and fro in it; whereby it is troubled, thicke and muddie; and fuch water will foone putrifie: for whatfoever is mixed, more eafily taketh corruption, than that which is pure and fimple, confidering that mixture maketh a fight, and fight causeth change and alteration. Now, who knoweth northat putrifaction is a kinde 30 of mutation? which is the cause that painters call the mixtures of their colours, by the name of panen, that is to fay, corruptions; and the poet Homer, when he speaketh of dying, faith, they did μιθίναι, that is to fay, staine and infect: the common use also of our speech carrieth it, to call that which is unmixed and meere of it felfe, a esaprer to akneurer in akceurer, that is to fay, incorrupt and fincere: but principally, if earth be mingled with water, it changeth the qualitie, and marreth the nature of it quite for ever, for being potable and good to drinke: and therefore it is, that dormant and dead waters, which stand in hollow holes, are more subject to corruption than others, as being full of earthic fubftance; whereas, running streames escape this mixture, and repell the earth which is brought into them : good cause therefore, had Hesiodus to commend 40

The water of some lively spring, shat alwaies runnes his course, And which no muddie earsh among, doth trouble and make woorse.

For hollome we holde that which is uncorrupt; and uncorrupt we take that to be, which is all fimple, pure and unmixed: and hereto may be adjoined, for to confirme this opinion of theirs, the fundrie kinds and differences of earth: for those waters which run thorow hillie and stonic grounds, because they carrie not with them, much of the earth or soile, are stronger and more firme, than such as passe along marishes, plaines and state. Now the river Nilm keeping his course within a levell and soft countrey; and to speake more truely, being (as it were) bloud tempered and mingled with stell, is sweet doubtlesse, and full of juices that have a strong and nutrifered and disquieted; for the moving and agitation thereos, mixeth the terrestriall substance with the liquid humour; but when it is quiet and at repose, the same settleth downe to the bottome, by reason of the weight. Thus you see why they draw up their water in the night-season; and withall, by that meanes they prevent the sun-rising; which alwaies doth catch up and corrupt that which is in all waters most substille and light.

Of those who come late to supper 3 where, discoursed it is, from whence be derived these names of refettions in Greeke daylanga, dusor, and disvor.

Y yonger fonnes upon a time had flaid longer at the theater, than they should, to see the Mights, and heare the eare sports which there were exhibited; by occasion whereof, they came too late to supper; whereupon Therm sonnes called them in mirth & sport xwavordtirres and to copperatus, as one would fay, supper-letting, and night-supping lads, with other such like names, but they, to be meet & quit with them againe, gave them the tearme of 35 5 xider 185, that is to fay, runners to supper. Heerewith one of the elder fort there present, said: That hee who came late to his supper, ought rather to be called 35 22 de 1700, because he maketh more haste with an extraordinary pace, for that he hath feemed to staic too long: to which purpose he related a pretie tearme of Battm, the buffon or pleasant jester to Casar, who was wont to call those, embrues distres, that is to fay, defirous of suppers, who at any time came tardie: For (quoth he) although they have businesse to call and keepe them away, yet for the love of good cheere and sweet morcels, they refuse not to come (late though it be) when soever they are invited. Heere came 1 in with the testimonie of Polycharmus, one of the great oratours, who managed the State of Athens: 20 in an oration of his, where making an apologie of his life unto the people in a frequent affembly he spake in this wise: Loe, my masters of Athens how I have lived: but besides manie other things which I have already alledged, take this moreover : that when loever I was bidden to any supper, I never came last, for this seemed to be very popular and plausible; whereas contrariwife, men are wont to hate them as odious persons, and furly lords, who come late, and for whom the rest of the companie are forced to staie. Then Sociarus willing to defend the young boies: But Alcaus (quothhe) called not Pittaeus, Zophodorpidas, because he supped late in the night, but for that it was ordinary with him to delight in none other guests, and table companions, but base, vile, and obscure persons; for to eat early or betimes, was in old time counted a reproch; and it is faid, that this word areanous, that is to fay, a breakefast, was derived of 30 alegna, that is to fay, intemperance. Then Theon intetrupting his speech : Not so (quoth he) but we must give credit rather unto those who report the auncient manner of life in old time: for they fay, that men in those daies being laborious, painfull, and temperate in their living withal, tooke for their repast early in the morning, apiece of bread dipped in wine, and no other thing, and therefore they called this breakfast of theirs, Acrasisma, of Acraton, which is meere and pure wine: and as for open, it fignifieth those viands which were prepared for repail in the evening; for 4, betokeneth late in the evening, at what time their manner was to suppe; namely, after they had dispatched their other affaires. Heere occasion was given to demaund from whence were derived these words Actavov, that is to say, supper, and exists, dinner: and thought it was that Arifon and Acratisma, fignified both one thing: and for proofe heereof, they repor-40 ted them to Homer, who faith: That Eumans provided Ariston by the breake of day, as appecreth by this verse:

No sooner did day light appeere, But they prepared their owne * dinner.

And it feemeth very probable that this repair deson, tooke the name of the morne-tide, and is as much to fay, as dupton, now for the refection called Act aron, that is to fay, supper, it was so called, in the name of the morne-tide, because it gave repose from their labours; for men used to take their supper after they had done some businesse, or else in the very time that they were about the same; this also may be showed by the tellimonie of Homer, who saith:

But what time as the woodman minding rest,

o From hewing trees, his supper some had drest.

unlesse a man wil haply say, that Ariston, that is to say, a dinner or breakfast, tooke that name, because solke solke use to dine or breake their fast, with that which first came to their hands, without any labour or dressing thereof in the kitchin and Actives, that is to say, supper was so called, because there was some labour emploied abour the dressing thereof; and therefore apress, is as much to say, as posses, that is to say, very easily, and some provided; but Actives, as one would say, a diamental was given to so, done with much paine and travell. But out brother Lampings, who naturally was given to scotling, and loved a life to be merry and to laught. Since that (quoth hee) we are allowed so great libertic for to prate thus and talke so idlely as we doe, I am able to proove unto you, that the Romane words are ten thousand times more properly devised, and expresse these things better than the Greeke: for they called a supper, Cana, which is as much as word; for the good fellowship and companie of those that supped (as it were) in common together: for the olde Romans, howfoever they dined or brake their fast ordinarily by themselves alone, yet they supped ever with their friends about them. Now their dinner, they called, Prandium, of the houre or time thereof, as if they would fay mer endion; for endion is as much as Sunavor, that is to fay, morning or noone-tide at the farthest; and to repose or rest after dinner, is expressed by the word or Jinkers or els perhaps, Prandium fignifieth a breakefast or morning repast, when as men do eat before they be enders, that is to fay, before they have any need or want of victuals : and 10 now to fay nothing of many things, which they expresse by meere Greeke words; as for example, how they call beds, Strata, of spolutar; wine, Vinum, of or o ; oile, Oleum, of water; hony, Mel, of μέλι; to tafte, Guffare, of γένουδς; to drinke one unto another, Propinare, of σεσπάν; who can denie, but their word, Comessatio, that is to say, Banqueting, is derived of our Greeke word κωμός; and Miscere, that is to say, to temper and mixe wine, of well ar in Greeke? for thus saith Homer: She tooke the cup, and once againe, also a table, they called Mensa, because it stood is wise, that is to say, in the mids; and bread, Panis, for that it flaked reiver, that is to fay, hunger; also a chaplet or garland of flowers, Corona, of the word region, an helmet, or region, the head; for in one place, Homer called an helmet or 20 head piece, mean, that is to fay, Corona, a coronet; likewife, Cadere, that is to fay, to beat or kill, of New; and Dentes, that is to fay, teeth of odorres; and last of all, Labra, that is to fay lips, of raceir Boyder, that is to fay, receiving and taking in meat with them. To conclude therefore, either we are to heare such derivations as these, without laughing thereat; or els we must not give them to easic accesse (as it were by undermining) unto words, as unto walles; partly to overthrow and beat downe some, and in part to batter and breake others.

In it he tempered pleafant wine.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Of certaine Pythagorean precepts, forbidding in any wife to admit swallowes into the house, and 30 commanding to ruffle the bed-clothes, so soone as aman is risen.

Tlla of Carthage,upon my returne to Rome, after I had bene long absent, invited me to a supper for my welcome home; for fo the Romans tearmed such a courtesie; and to beare mee companie, he bad other friends, and those not many in number; among who was one Lusius of Tuskane, a disciple of the Pythagorean philosopher, Moderatus: this Lucius perceiving that our Philinus did eat of nothing which ever had life (as the usuall maner of him and other Pythagoreans was to doe) fell into speech as touching Pythagoras himselfe, and affirmed that a Tuskane he was not as some others, because his father, and his ancestours, were Tuskans, from whom he was descended; but for that he was himselfe borne, reared, brought up, and taught in Tuf-40 kine; which he proved principally, by certeine fymbolicall and allegoricall precepts of his; as for example, among others, that he commanded those who were new risen out of their beds, to russile the clothes together; also that the print of a pot or cauldron, should not be left upon the afhes, after it is taken away, but that the afhes ought to be flirred together; item, that no swal-* For Philome- lowes should be admitted into the house; likewise, that no man should step over a besome, nor keepe within house; those creatures which had hooked clawes: For these rules, and such like fame) into a (quoth he) which the Pythagoreans deliver in word, and fet downe in writing, the Tuskans onfwallow who ly observe and keepe in deed. Which when Lucius had faid, strange it was thought, and absurd above the rest, to chase and keepe out of the house, fillie swallowes, harmelesse and gentle creato kel her own tures, as well as those that have crooked clees, which are the most bloudy and cruell of all others: 50 child, by Te- for whereas some ancient interpreters gave the solution and exposition onely, as if covertly it it up before implied thus much, that we should avoid the companie of secret whisperers, backbiters and slanhistas addh derers; Lucius himselte approoved not thereof; for the swallow whispereth not at all; it chattethe bond, for reth in deed and talketh (as one would fay) loud enough; and yet not more than pies, partridges and hennes. But what thinke you by this (quoth Sylla) that in regard of the tale that goes defloured the of Progne, who killed her young some Itys, they hate * swallowes for that abominable act, and therefore would feeme to cause us for to detestia fatte off, such infamouscales, for which they fay, both Terem and the women, partly did perpetrate, & in part fuffered horrible and unlawfull things; whereupon, to this very day, these birds be called Daulides? But Gorgias the sophistics. by occasion that a swallow mewted over his head, and squirted her dung upon him, looking up unto her: Thefebe no faire casts (quoth he) Philomela; or is this also common to the rest a for the Pythagoreans doe not exclude or banish out of house the nightingale, * which bearetha * For Prope part in the fame tragedies, and is faultie with the rest. Peradventure (quoth I then) there is as (as the take much reason in the one as the other (ô Sylla;) but consider, and see whether the swallow be not included odious and infamous with them for the fame cause, that they reject and wil not enterteine those Sections u creatures which have hooked tallons; for the likewife feedeth upon fleth, and befides, killeth Comes Across 10 and devouresh especially, grashoppers, which are facred and musicall: moreover, the flieth between the close by the ground, hunting and catching little fillie creatures (as Aristotle faith) furthermore, the is the onely creature of all the other, that be under the fame rouse with us, which lodgeth there of free cost, living without contributing ought, or paying anyrent : yet the ftorke which hath no covert by our house, nor warmth by our fire, ne yet enjoieth any benefit, pleasure, or helpe at all by our meanes, giveth us otherwhiles some tribute and custome (as it were) for marching onely upon the ground; for up and downe fhe goes, killing toades and ferpents, mortall enemies to mankind, and lying in wait for our lives; whereas the fivallow having all those commodities at our hands, no tooner hath nourished her young ones, and brought them to fome perfection, but away the goes and is no more to beleene, to difloial and 20 unthankfull the is: and that which of all others is worst, the flie and the swallow bee the onely creatures haunting our houles as they doe, that never will be tamed, nor fuffer a man to touch and handle them, nay they will not admit any fellowship, societie, or communion with him, either in worke or play: the flie indeed hath some reason to be afraid of us, for that the sustaineth harme by us, and is chafed and driven away fo often: but the swallow hateth man naturally, the will not trust him, but remaineth alwaies suspicious and untained: now if wee are to take these and fuch like speeches, not directly according to the litterall sense, and as the words onely doe implie, but rather by way of an oblique reflexion, as the refemblances of things appearing in others: certes Pythagoras propofeth unto us heerein, the very pattern of an unthankfull and faithlesse person, admonishing us not to receive unto our familiar acquaintance and amitie, 30 those who for the time, and to serve their owne turne, draw necre unto us, and retire themselves under the roufe of our houfe, and that we ought not to make them inward with us, communicating with them, our house, our domesticall altar, and those things which are in stead of most facred obligations. When I had thus faid, it feemed that I had given the companie encouragement and affurance to speake, for they began boldly to apply unto the other symbolical precepts, their morall expositions: And Philinus for his part said, that in commaunding to confound the forme of the pot or cauldron imprinted in the albes, they taught us this leffon, not to leave any marke or apparent impression of anger; but after it hath once done boiling what it will, and is fetled and cooled againe, to ridde away all ranckor and malice, yea and to burie all in perpetual oblivion. As for the shuffling of the bed clothes together, when we are newly ri-40 fen, some thought there was no hidden matter meant thereby, but signified onely, that it was not feemely or honeft, that the marke or print in the bed should remaine as an expresse image to be seene, of the place, wherein man and wife had lien together: But Sylla guessed otherwise and conjectured that heerein was conteined a dehortation to divert us from fleeping on bed in the day time, when as even in the very morning the preparation and meanes to fleepe was fo immediately taken away: for that we ought to take our rest and repose in the night, but in the day time to be stirring and about our businesse, not suffring to remaine in our beds so much as the tract of our bodie; for a man lying affeepe, is good for nothing, no more than when he is dead: and heereto seemeth to allude and accord, another precept of the Pythagoreans which they give unto their friends, forbidding them not to ease any man of his burden, but rather to 50 lay on more, and feeme to furcharge him still, as not approoving any floth or idlenesse whatfoever: now for that during these discourses, Lucius neither approoved nor disprooved ought that was faid, but fat still, heard all, faid nothing, and pondered every thing in himselfe: Empedocles calling unto Sylla by name, faid as followeth! THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

Why the Pythagoreans, among all other troing creatures, absteine most from eating fish.

[1. Lucius our friend (quoth he)be offended, or take no pleafure in our fayings, it is high time I that we should give over and make an end : but if these things fall within the compasse of their precept for filence; yet this I thinke ought not to be concealed, but may well be revealed and communicated unto others, namely: What the reason is that the Pythagoreans absteined principally from eating fifth ? for for much we finde written of the auncient Pythagoreans: and 10 I my telle have fallen into the company and conference of certaine disciples of Alexierates, aman of our time; who fedde a little fometimes of other living creatures, yea and factificed them unto the gods; but for no good in the world would they fo much as tafte of a fifth: not as I take it for that cause which Tyndares the Lacedæmonian alledged, who thought that this was tione for the honour they had to filence 3 in regard whereof, the philosopher Empedocles whole name I heare, who was the first that ceased to teach Pythagorically, that is to say, to give rules and precepts of hidden wifedome, calleth fiftes Ellopas, as having ruin one to anagolius, that is to fay, their voice tied and shut up within; but for they thought, tacitum itie to be a singular and divine thing, and in one word, that even the gods themselves doe shew by deeds and effects, without voice or speech unto wife men, what their will and pleasure is: Then Lucius mildely and simply 20 antwered: That the true cause indeed might peradventure lie hidden still and not be divulged: howbeit, there is nothing to hinder or let us, but that we may render one reason or other which carieth with it fome likelihood & probability: fo Theon the grammarian began first to discourse upo that point faying: it was very difficult to shew & prove that Pythagoras was a Tuskan born 3 but for certaine knowen it was, that he had made his abode a long time in Acgret, & converted with the fages of that countrey, where he approoved, embraced, and highly extolled manie of their religious ceremonies, and namely, that astouching beanes: for Herodotus writeth, that the Aegyptians neither fowe, nor eat beanes, no nor can abide fo much as to looke upon them: and as for fitties, we are affured that their priefts, even at this day, absteine from them, and living as they doe, chalte and unmaried, they refule falt likewife; neither will they endure to eat 30 it as a meat by it lelfe, nor any other viands wherein any fea falt commeth; whereof divers men alledge divers & fundry reasons; but there is one true cause indeed, & that is the enmittie which they beare unto the fea, as being a favage element, a meere alien, & estranged frous, or to speak more truely, a mortall enimie to mans nature; for the gods are not nourished therewith, as the Stoicks were of opinion: that the flarres were fed from thence: but contrariwife, that in it was loft the father and faviour of that countrey of Aegypt, which they call the deflux or running out of Ofiris, and in lamenting his generation on the right hand, and corruption on the left, covertly they give us to understand, the end and perdition of Wilm in the sea: In which confideration, they are of opinion, that lawfull it is not, once to drinke of the water, as being not potable; neither docthey thinke, that any thing which it breedeth, bringeth foorth, or nourisheth, is 40 cleane and meet for man; confidering that the fame hath not breath and respiration common with us, nor food and patture agreeable unto ours; for that the very aire which nourisheth and mainteineth all other living creatures, is pernicious and deadly unto them, as if they were engendred first, and lived afterward in this world against the course of nature, and for no use at all: and marvell we must not, if for the hatred they beare unto the sea, they hold the creatures therein, as strangers, and neither meet nor worthy to be intermingled with their bloud or vitall spirits: feeing, they will not deigne so much as to falute any pilots or mariners when soever they meet with them, because they get their living upon the sea.

Sylla commending this diffeourfe, added moreover, as touching the Pythagoreans, that when they faculticed unto the gods, they would especially tast of the primices or parcels of siesh which 50 they hadkilled: but never was there any fifth that they facrificed or offred unto the gods. Now when they had finished their speech, I came in with mine opinion : As for those Aegyptians (quoth I) many men there be as well learned, as ignorant, who contradict them, & plead in the behalfe and defence of the fearrecounting the manifold commodities thereof, whereby our life is more plentifull, pleasant, and happie: as touching the furcease as it were of the Pythagoreans, and their fortearing to lay hand upon fishes, because they are such strangers unto us, it is a very abfurd and ridiculous device; or to fay more truely, it is a cruell and inhumane part, and favoring much of a barbarous Cyclops, feeing that to other living creatures they render a reward and recompence, for their kinred, coulenage and acquaintance, by killing, eating, and confuming them as they doe: and verily reported it is of Pythagoras, that upon a time hee bought of the fifthers a draught of fifth; and when he had to done, commaunded that they should be all let out of the net into the sea againe: surely this was not the act of a man, who either hated or despised fishes as his enemies or strangers; considering that finding them prisoners as he did, he paid for their raunsome, and redeemed their liberty, as if they had bene his kinssolke & good friends: and therefore the humanitie, equitie, and mildnesse of these men, induceth us to thinke and imagine cleane contrary, that it was rather for some exercise of justice, or to keepe them-10 felves in ure and cultome thereof, that they spared and pardoned those sea-creatures, for that al others, give men cause in some sort to hurt them; whereas poore fishes offend us in no maner: and fay their nature and will were so disposed, yet cannot they execute the same: moreover, conjecture we may and collect, by the reports, records, and facrifices of our auncients, that they thought it an horrible & abominable thing, not onely to cat, but also to kill any beast that doth no hurt or damage unto us: but feeng in processe of time how much pestered they were, with a number of beafts that grew upon them, and overspred the face of the earth; and withall being as it is faid, commaunded by the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, to fuccour the fruits of the earth, which were ready to perish; they began then to kill them for facrifice unto the gods: yet in fo doing, they feemed to tremble and feare, as troubled in minde, calling this their action 20 Folew and figur, that is to fay, to doe or perpetrate, as if they did, and committed fome great deed in killing a creature having life; and even still at this day they observe a ceremony with all religious precisenesse, not to massacre any beast before it hath given a nod with the head, after the libations and effusions of wine upon it, in figure and token of confent; fo strict they were and wary to committo unjustact. Certes, to say nothing of other beatls, if all men had forborne to kill and eat no more, but pullen and conies, within short time they should not have been able to have dwelt within their townes or cities, nor enjoied any fruits of the earth: & therefore although necessitie at the first had brought in the use of eating stess; a very hard matter it were now, in regard of pleafure, to put down & abolifh the fame: whereas the whole kind of fea-creatures using neither the same aire and water with us, nor comming necre unto our fruits, but be-30 ing (as a man would faie) comprised within another world, & having diffinet bounds and limits of their owne, which they cannot paffe, but immediatly it collects them their life, for punishment of their trespasse, giveth unto our belly none occasion or pretence at all, more or lesse, to runne upon them: fo that the whole hunting, catching, and running after fifth, is a manifelt worke of gourmandife and daintie feeding; which without any just or lawfull cause, troubleth & disquieteth the seas, and descendeth into the very bottome of the deepe; for we have no reafon at any time to call the red fea-barbell мивотнея, that is to fay, corne devourer; nor the guilthead 2507 112 2005, that is to fay, vine wafter, or grape eater, nor yet any mullets, lubins, or feapikes, σπερμολόγωs, that is to fay, feed gatherers, as we name divers land bealts, noting them thereby for the harme and annoiance they doe unto us: neither can we impute unto the greatest fish 40 in the fea, the least wrong or shrewd turne, wherewith wee charge, in our exceeding neerenesse and parfimonie, some cator wezill, a * mouse, or rat which haunt our houses: in which regard, when a die. they precifely contemning themselves, not for feare of law onely, to doe wrong unto men, but also by the very instinct of nature, to offer no injurie unto any thing in the world that doth them no harme, nor displeasure, used to feed on fish lesse than on any other meat: & admit there were no injustice in the thing, all busic curiofitie of men in this point, being so needlesse as it is, bewraieth great intemperance and wastfull gluttony: and therefore Homer in his poeme deviseth this, that not onely the Greeks encamping upon the streight of Hellespont, absteined wholy from eating fish, but also that the delicate and daintie toothed Phæacians, the wanton and licorous woers likewise of lady Penelope, dissolute though they were otherwise, and all 50 islanders were never served at their tables with any viands or cates from the sea: no nor the companions of ul/fies in that great and long voiage of theirs which they had at fea, ever laid hooke, leape, or weele, or call net into the sea for fish, so long as they had a bit of bread, or handfull of meale left:

But when their ship had vittailes none, But all therein was spent and gone.

even a little before that they laid hands upon the kowes of the funne, then began they to fish; not iwis for any deintie dishes, but even for necessary food: With

With bended hookes, for now their maw, Great hunger bit, and guts did gnaw.

So that for extremenced they were forced to eat fifth, and to kill the funnes kine: whereby wee may perceive that it was a point of fanctimonic and chaftitie, not onely among the Aegyptians and Syrians, but the Greeks alfo, to forbeare feeding upon fifth; for that befide the injuffice of the thing, they abhorred as I thinke, the superfluous curiositie of such food.

Heereupon Neftor tooke occasion to speake : And why (quoth he) is there no reckoning made of my countrey-men and fellow-citizens, no more than of the Megarians? and yet you have heard me to fay often times, that the priests of Neptune, whom we call Hieromnemones, never eat fish : for this god is furnamed Phytalmios, that is to fay, the Prefident of breeding and 10 generation in the sea and the race descending from that ancient Hellen, sacrificed unto Neptune, by the name and addition of Patrogeneios, that is to fay, the flock-father and principall Progenitour, being of opinion, that man came of a moist and liquid substance, as also, be the Syrians; which is the very cause that they worship and adore a fish, as being of the same kinde, generation, and nouriture with themselves; philosophizing and arguing in this point, with more apparence and shew of reason, than Anaximander did, who affirmed not, that men and fishes were bred both in the same places; but avouched that men were first engendred within fishes themselves, and there nourished like their yoong frie; but afterward, when they became sufficient and able to thift and helpe them, they were cast footth, and so tooke land: like as therefore, the fire cateth the wood, whereby it was kindled and fet a burning, though it were father and mother 20 both unto it ; according as he faid, who inferted the marriage of * Ceyx among the works of Hefodus; even so Anaximander in pronouncing, that fish was both father and mother unto men, taxeth and condemneth the feeding thereupon.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

Whether it be possible, that new diseases may be engendred by our meats?

Philo the physician constantly affirmed, that the leprosie, called Elephantiasis, was a disease not known long since; for that none of the ancient physician and the second size of the second siz not knowen long fince; for that none of the ancient physicians made any mention of this 20 maladie; whereas they travelled and busied their braines, to treat of other small trisling matters, (I wot not what) and yet fuch fubrilties as the common fort could hardly comprehend. But I produced and alledged unto him for a witnesse out of philosophie, Athenodorus, who in the first booke of his Epidemiall or popular diseases, writeth, that not onely the said leprosie, but also Hydrophobie, that is to fay, the feare of water, occasioned by the biting of a mad dogge, were first discovered in the daies of Afelepiades: now as the companie there present, marvelled that these maladies should newly then begin, and take their consistence in nature; so they wondered as much on the other fide, how so great and grievous diseases could be hidden so long, and unknowen to men: howbeit, the greater part inclined rather to this fecond & later opinion, as being more respective and favourable to man; for that they could not be perswaded, that nature 40 in such cases thould in mans bodie (as it were in some citie) studie novelties, and be evermore inventing and working new matters. As for Diogenianus, he faid, that the passions and maladies of the foule, held on their common course, and went the accustomed way still, of their predeceffours: And yet (quoth he) wickednesse is very manifold in fundry forts, and exceeding audacious, to enterprise any thing: and the mind is a mistresse of herselfe, and at her owne command; having puissance to turne and change easily as she thinketh good: and yet that disordinate confusion of hers, hath some order in it; keeping a measure in her passions, and conteining herfelfe within certeine bounds, like as the fea, in the flowings and tides; in fuch fort, as that the bringeth forth no new kinde of vice, such as hath not bene knowen unto those in oldetime, and of which they have not written: for there being many different forts of lufts and defires; infinite 50 motions of feare, as many kinds of paine, and no fewer formes of pleasure; which would require great labout to reckon up, and not to give over.

These neither now nor yesterday

Began; but all have lived ay:

And no man knowes, nor can say well,

Since when they siyst so men befell.

nor yet wheteupon any new maladie or moderne passion hatharisen in our body; considering it hath not of it felfe the beginning of motion properly as the foule hath, but is knit and conjuined with nature by common causes, and composed with a certeine temperature: the infinite varietie whereof, wandereth notwithstanding within the pourprise of set bounds and limits; like unto a veffell which lying at anchor in the fea, nevertheleffe doth wave, and is toffed within a round compasse: for neither the settled constitution of a disease is without some cause, bringing into the world irregularly and against all law of nature, a generation and power from that which hath no being at all: nor an easie matter is it for a man to finde out a new cause, unlesse withall, he do fet downe a new aire, strange water, and such meats as our forefathers never tasted of, imagining, that they are run hither to us now and never before, out of (I wot not what) other 10 worlds; or imaginatic inter-worlds and spaces betweene; for sicke wee fall by meanes of the fame things whereof we live; and no peculiar and proper feeds there be of diseases; but the naughtinesse and corruption of such things whereby wee live, in regard of us, and our owner faults and errours befides, about them, are they which trouble and offend nature: thefe troubles have perpetually the fame differences, though the fame many times take new names; for these names are according to the ordinance and custome of men; but the maladies themselves are the affections of nature: and to those diseases of themselves finite, being varied & diversified by these names infinite, have deceived and beguiled us: and as there is not lightly and upon a fudden, committed in the Grammaticall parts of speech, or in the Syntaxis, and construction thereof, any new barbarisme, solæcisme, or incongruitie; even so the temperatures of mens bo-20 dies, have their falles, errours and transgressions, which be certeine and determinate, considering that in fome fort, even those things which are against nature, be comprised and included in nature: and this is it, that the wittie inventers and devifers of fables, would fignific in faying: That when the giants made warre against the gods, there were ingendred certeine strange and monstrous creatures every way, at what time as the moone was turned cleane contrary, and arofe not as the was wont: and verily, their meaning was, that nature produced new maladies, like unto monsters, but withall, imagine and devise a cause of such change and alteration, that is neither probable nor yet incredible; but pronouncing and affirming, that the augmentation more or leffe of some difeases, causeth that newnesse and diversitie in them, which is not well done of them (my good friend Philo:) for this intention and augmentation may well adde 30 thereto frequencie and greatneffe; but furely it transporteth not the subject thing out of the first and primitive kinde: and thus I suppose the leprose or Elepantiasis to be nothing els, but the vehemencie of these scurvic and scabbie infections; as also the Hydrophobie, or vaine search of water, no other but an augmentation of the paffions of ftomacke or inclancholie: and verily, a woonder it were, that we should not know how Homer was not ignorant hereof; for this is certeine, that he called a dogge worn ries, of this raging accident whereto he is subject : and hereupon men alfo, when they are in a rage, be faid likewife Aussir. When Dingenianus had thus difcoursed, Philo himselfe, both seemed somewhat to answere and refute his reasons; and also requested me to speake in the behalfe of the ancient physicians, who were thus challenged and condemned for their ignorance or negligence in these principall matters, in case it were true, 40 that these maladies were not of a later breed and more moderne than their age. First therefore, it feemed unto me, that Diogenianus put not this well downe for a good supposall, that tensions and relaxations, according to more or leffe, make no differences, nor remove the fubject matters out of their kinde: for by this meanes we should likewise say, that vineger differed not from wine that is fouring, nor bitterneffe from flyplicitie or foureneffe, nor darnell from wheat, ne yet garden mints from the wilde mint: but evident it is, that these do degenerate, yea, and become altered in their very qualities; partly by relaxations, as the things doe languish and lose their heart; and in part, by tenfion, as they be reenforced, and take vigor: for otherwife, we must be forced to fay, that the flame differeth not from a white or cleere winde, nor a light from a flame, nor frost from dew, nor haile from raine; but that all these be but the inforcements onely and 50 tentions of the fame things; and to conftantly we shall be driven to affirme, that blindnesse and dimme fight differ not, and inordinate paffion of vomiting, called Cholera, is nothing different from a keckish stomacke and a defire to cast, but onely according to augmentation and diminution, more or leffe: and all this is nothing to the purpose; for if they admit and say, that this very tension and augmentation in vehemencie, came but now of late, as if this noveltie were occasioned by the quantitie and not the qualitie, yet the absurdation of the paradox remaineth nevertheleffe: moreover, seeing that Sophoeles (speaking of those things, which because they had not bene in times past, men would not beleeve to be at this present) said very well in this wife:

All kind of things both good and bad, Once at the fir ft their being had.

This also seemeth very probable and to stand with great reason, that maladies ran not forth all at once, asifthe barriers had bene fet open for the race, and they let out together: but some came alwaies successively behinde at the taile of others, and each one tooke the first beginning at a certaine time: And a man may well conjecture and gueffe (quoth 1) that fuch as a rose of want and indigence, as also those that came of heat and colde, were the first that affailed our bodies; but repletions, gluttonies, and delicate pleasures, came afterwards together with floth and idlenesse; which by reason of abundance of victuals, caused great store of superfluities and excrements, from whence proceeded fundry forts of maladies; the complication whereof and intermixture 10 one with another, bringeth evermore fome new thing or other: for every naturall thing, is orderly, and limited; because that nature is nothing els but order it selfe, or at leastwise the worke of order: whereas diforder (like to the same that Pindarus speaketh of) is infinit, and can not be comprised within any certeine number; so that whatsoever is unnaturall, the same immediatly is unlimited and infinit: for, the trueth we can not deliver but one way; marie to lie, a man may finde an infinit number of meanes, by occasion of innumerable occurrents; also accords muficall and harmonies, stand upon their certeine proportions; but the errours that men commit in playing upon the harpe or other instrument, in fong, and in dauncing, who is able to comprehend? although Phrynichus the tragedian poet said of himselfe thus:

Induunce I finde as many forts And formes of geftures and disports, As waves in fea, and billowes strong Arife by tempest all night long.

And Chrysippu writeth that the divers complications of ten profitions, which they call Axioms, and no more, furmount the number of ten hundred thousand but Hipparchus reprooved this, and taught that the affirmative doth conteine of connexed propolitions, one hundred thousand, and besides, one thousand fortie and nine; but the negative of the same propositions comprehendeth three hundred and ten thousand, with a surplusage of nine hundred, fiftie and two: and Xenocrates hath fet downe, that the number of fyllables, which the letters in the alphabet, being coupled and combined together, do affoord, amount to the number of one hundred 30 millions, and two hundred thousand over: why should it therefore bee thought strange and wonderfull, that our body having in it fo many faculties, and gathering still daily, by that which it eateth and drinketh, so many different qualities, considering withall, that it useth motions and mutations, which keepe not one time nor the fame order alwaies; the complications and mixtures of formany things together, bring evermore new and unufuall kinds of maladies, fuch as Thueydides wrot, was the peltilence at Athens, conjecturing that this was no ordinarie and usuall maladie, by this especially, for that the beasts of prey, which otherwise did eat of flesh, would not touch a dead bodie : those also who fell ficke about the red sea (as Agathireides maketh report) were afflicted with strange symptomes and accidents, which no man had ever read or seene, and among others, that there crawled from them certeine vermin like small serpents, which did eat 40 the calves of their legs and the brawnes of their armes 3 and looke whenfoever a man thought to touch them, in they would againe, and winding about the muskles of the flesh, ingendered inflammations and impostumes with intolerable paine. This pestilent disease, no man ever knew before, neither was it ever feene fince by others, but by them alone, like as many other fuch accidents; for there was a man who having beene a long time tormented with the diffurie or difficultie of his urine, delivered in the end by his yard, a barley straw knotted as it was with joints: and we know a friend and guest of ours, a yoong man, who together with a great quantitie of naturall feed, cast foorth a little hairie worme or vermin with many feet, and therewith it ranne very swiftly : Aristotle writeth also, that the nourse of one Timon of Cilicia, retired her selfe for two moneths space every yeere, and lurked in a certeine cave all the while, without drinke 50 or meat, or giving any other apparence of life, but onely that shee tooke her breath: certes recorded it is in the Melonian books, that it is a certeine figne of the liver diseased, when the ficke partie is verie busie in spying, seeking, and chasing the mice and rats about the house; a thing that now a daies is not seene: let us not marvell therefore, if a thing be now engendred that never was seene before, and the same afterward cease as if it had never beene; for the cause lieth in the nature of the bodie, which sometime taketh one temperature, and one while another: but if Diogemanus bring in a new aire, and a strange water, let him alone, seeing

he is so disposed: and yet we know well that the followers of Democritus both say, and write, that by the worlds which perith without this, and by the straunge bodies which from that infinitie of worlds runne into this, there arise many times the beginnings of plague and petitlence, yea and of other extraordinarie accidents: we will passe over likewise the particular corruptions which happen in divers countries, either by earthquakes, excessive droughts, extreme heats, and unufuall raines, with which it cannot be chosen, but that both winds and rivers which arise out of the earth, must needs be likewise infected, diseased, and altered: but howfoever those causes wee let goe by, yetomit we must not, what great alterations and changes be in our bodies, occasioned by our meats and viands, and other diet and usage of our selves; To for many things which before time were not wont to bee tafted or caten, are become now most pleafant dainties; as for example; the drinke made of honie and wine; as also the delicate dith of a farrowing fwines shape or wombe; as for the braine of a beast, it is faid, that in old time they were wont to reject and call it from them, yea, and so much to detest and abhorre it, that they would not abide to heare one to name it; and for the cucumber, the melon or pompion, the pomeeitron and pepper, I know many oldfolke at this day, that cannot away with their tafte: credible it is therefore ithat our bodies receive a woonderfull change and strange alteration by such things in their temperature, acquiring by little and little a divers qualitie, and superfluitie of excrements farre different from those before: semblably wee are to believe that the change of order in our viands, maketh much heereto; for the services at 20 the boord, which in times pastwere called the colditables, to wit, of oisters, sea-urchings, greene fallads of raw lettuce, & fuch other herbs, be as it were the light forerunners of the featt, as transferred now by Plate, from the rereward to the forefront, and have the first place, whereas before in old time, they came in last: a great matter there is also in those beavers or fore-drinkings called Propomata; for our ancients would not drinke fo much as water before they did eat; and now a daies, when as men are otherwise fasting & have eat nothing, they will be in maner drunke, & after they have well drenched their bodies, they begin to fall unto their meats, and whiles they be yet boiling, they put into the stomacke those things that bee attenuant, incifive and sharpe, for to provoke and stirre up the appetite, and still fill themselves up full with other viands: but none of all this hath more power to make mutation in our bodies, nor to breed new maladies, 20 than the varietie of fundry fashions, of bathing of flesh: for first & formost it is made soft, liquid, and fluid as iron is by the fire, and afterwards it receiveth the temper and tincture of hard fleele, by cold water: fo that me thinks if any one of those who lived a little before us should see the dore of our flouphes and baines open, he might fay thus:

Heere into runneth Acheron, And fire-like burning Phlegethon,

Whereas in our forefathers daies, they used their bathes and hot-houses, so milde, so kinde, and temperate: that king Alexander the Great, being in a fever, lay and slept within them: yea the Gaules wives, bringing thither their pots of pottage, and other viands, did eat even there with their children, who bathed together with them: but it seemeth in these daies, that those who are within the stouphes and baines, be like unto those that are raging madde, and barke as dogs, they pusse and blike sed swine, they lay about them and to sleevery way; the aire that they draw in, as it were mingled with fire & water, sufferent no piece nor corner of the body in quiet and rest, it shaketh, tosseth, and remooveth out of place, the least indivisible parcell thereof, until such time as we come to quench and allay the same thus instanted and boiling as they doe: There is no need therefore of Diogenianus (quoth I) of sorten and sare fetched causes from without, neither of those new worlds and intervals betweene: for to goe no further than to our selves, the very change onely of the sastion of our dier, is a sufficient meanes both to breed, and also to abolish and cause to ease any maladie in us.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that we take least heed of dreames in the end of Autumne, and give small credit unto them?

Florus lighting upon physicall problemes or naturall questions of Arislotle, which were brought to Thermopyle, for to passe the time away, filled both himselfewith many doubts, as ordinarily men do, who are by nature studious, and also put as many into the heads of others, giving testimony heerein to Arislotle who saith: That much knowledge breedeth many occa-fions of doubt; as for other questions, they afforded unto us no unpleasant pastime and recreation, in the day time as we walked in the galleries abroad; but that probleme concerning dreams, (namely, that they be uncertein, lying, & falle, especially during those moneths whe trees shed their leaves) was let on foot again (I wot no thow) after supper by Phavorings, when he had done with other discourses: As for your familiar companions my children, they were of opinion, that Ariftotle, himselfe had fufficiently solved the question, & there needed no farther enquirie into the matter, nor any speech more to be made thereof, but even to attribute the cause, as he did, to the new gathered fruits of that feafon: for being as they were, fresh and greene still in their ftrength and full of vigour, they engendred in our bodies many ventofities and bred much trouble and agitation in the humours: for likely it is not, that new wine alone doth worke, 10 boile, and chaufe, nor that oile onely, being new drawen and preffed, yeeldeth a noife as it burneth in lampes, by occasion that the heat causeth the windinesse and spirit thereof to evaporate and walme out : but we fee that come also newly inned, & all fruits of trees presently upon their gathering, are plumpe, full, and swelled againe, untill such time as they have exhaled foorth all that is flatuous, and breathed out the crudities thereof: now that there be certeine meates that cause troublesome dreames, and engender turbulent visions and fansies in our sleepe, they brought in and alledged for their tellimony the instance of beanes, and the head of the pulpe or pour-cuttle fish, which they are bidden to absteine from, who would divine and foreshew things that come by dreames. As for Phavorinus, howfoever he was himfelfe at all times wonderfully affected & addicted to Aristotle, and one who attributed unto the Peripateticks schole 20 this fingular commendation, that their doctrine caried more probabilitie and refemblance of the truth, than other philosophers whatsoever; yet at this present he came out with an old rustie reason of Democritus, taken out of the smoake (where it had gathered a deale of thicke soot) for to furbish, scoure, and make it bright againe: for this was the vulgar opinion which Democritus put downe for a supposition: That certeine images doe enter and pierce deepe into our bodies thorough the pores, which as they rife againe from the bottome, cause those visions which appeare unto us as we fleepesthat these came out of al parts wandering, as presented from utenfils, habillements, & plants, but principally from living creatures, for that they moove & stir much, and befides are hot, having not onely the expresse similatudes and fundry formes of bodies imprinted in them, as Epicurus thinketh (who thus farre foorth followeth Democritus, and leaveth 30 him there) but also drawing therewith the apparences of the motions of the minde, of counsel, of usual milde affections, as also of vehement passions, wherewith they entring in, doe speake as if they were living things, and distinctly catie unto those that receive the same, the opinions, the words, the discourses and affections of such as transmit the same, if in their entrance they reteinestill the expresse and nothing confused; which they doe especially, all while that their way and paffage thorough the aire, cleere and united, is speedy, quicke, and not empeached by any hinderance: confidering than, that the aire of the Autumnall quarter, in the end when as trees doe cast their leaves, hath much asperitie and inequalitie, it turneth aside and putterth by divertly those images, causing their evidence to be feeble and transitorie, as being darkened by the tardity and flownesse of their pace in the way: whereas contrariwise, when they 40 runne foorthin great number, and swiftly out of those things that swell with fulnesse, and burne, as it were, with defire to be delivered of them, then as they passe they yeeld their resemblances all fresh and very significant. After this, casting his eie upon Autobulue, and smiling withall: Me thinks (quoth he) that I perceive you, and those about you, to addresse your selves alredy for to maintaine a kinde of fight against these images, & that you meane to fasten with your hands and catch hold of this old opinion, as if it were fome rotten picture, to doe it fome violence: Goe to (quoth Autobulus) will you never leave these fashions, to play with us in this manner? for weeknow well enough iwis, that you hold and approove the opinion of Arifortle, and that for to give a lustre thereunto, you have set this of Democritus by it, as a shadow and foile: that conceit therefore of Democritus, we will turne over and put by , and take in hand for to impugne this reason of Aristotles, which impute thall to these new fruits, and unjustly without al all reason, blaming & discrediting that which we all love so well; for both Summer & Autumne will beare wirmeffe, that when we cat these fruits, more fresh and greene, even at such time as they are most successent, and verdant: (as Antimachus said) our dreames are lesselying and deceitfull: but these moneths which we name, the Fall of the lease, pitching their tents as it were, and taking up their standings close to the Winter, have reduced already, both come of the field, and also the fruits of trees, which remaine uneaten by their perfect concoction, to this paffe that they looke flender, and in fome for triveled, as having loft by this time, that violent, heady, and furious force which was in them. As touching new wine, they that drinke it foonest, doe it in the moneth * Anthisteren, that is to fay, Februarie, presently after winter, and foonelt, doe it in the moneth "Antonierom, was 1500 1893; Contain Spreading and since; and that day upon which they begin to tafte it, we in our countrey call daths distances, that is to fay, the November, November, day of good fortune; but the Athenians name it, of opening their tunnes or wine veffels, Pi-before wite thagia: but fo long as the Must or new wine is working still, and in the heat, we see, that all men ton, accor even the very artificers and labourers are affiraid to tafte of it, and to meddle withall: let us forbeare therefore to flander and blame the good gifts of the gods, and goe we rather another way to worke for the inquifition of the caule, unto which the very name of the feafon, and of thefe the leafe, to wit, the end of Autumne; when by reason of cold, and drinesse, trees shedde their leaves, unleffe it bee fome which are hot and fatty, by nature, as the olive, the lawrell, and the date trees, or very moift, as the ivie and myrtle; for fuch as these, their temperature of the street of the stree rature helpeth, others not, by reason that this glutinous humour which holdesh the leaves upon the tree, continueth not; because that their naturall humiditie is congealed with cold, or elfe dried up, being so feeble and little withall: to flourish therefore, to grow, and to be fresh, in plants, and much more in living creatures, commeth of moisture and heat; and contrariwife, cold & drinesse are deadly enemies: & therefore Homer very properly, is wont to call men who are fresh and lusty steps, that is to say, moist and succulent; as also to joy and be merry, he expresent by the verbe intrody, that is to say, to be hot; contrariwise, that which is dolorous and fearefull, he tearmeth einedender x) xpueeder, that is to fay, ftiffe & starke for cold; a bodie that is dead, he tearmeth axigus, that is to fay, without moisture; as also onesens, that is to fay, a verie anotomy, dried in the smoake, or against the sunne; which are two words devised to traduce & note their extreme drinesse: moreover, bloud which is the thing within us, of principall strength & vertue, is both hot and moist; but old age is destitute both of the one and the other: now it seemeth that the later end of Autumne is the very age of the yere, having performed his revolutio; for as yet the moisture is not come, but the heat is gone already, or at least wise is very feeble, & that (which is a great figne of cold & drineffe) this feafon caufeth bodies to be disposed unto difeases. This being laid (or a ground, necessary it is that the soule should have a sympathy & fel-30 low feeling of the indifpositions of the bodie, & that when the spirits be incrassate & thickned, and the powre and facultie of divination or forefeeing future things, must needs be dimmed and dulled, much like as a mirrour or looking glaffe, overcast with some thicke mist: no marvell therefore if it fend and transmit nothing in phantasie and imaginations, that is plaine, expresse, articulate, evident, and significant, so long as it is rough and unpolished, not smooth and resplendent.

The Proëme.

His ninth booke of Sympoliaques (& Softus Senecio) conteineth the discourses held at Athens, during the festivall solemnities of the Muses; for that this number of nine, forteth and agreeth well with the faid Muses. Now if the number of questions handled in this booke, surmount the ordinarie Decade of the former books, you 30 are nothing to marvell thereat, because we ought to render unto the Muses all that appertemeth unto the Muses, without taking away or deteining ought from them, no more than from holy facrifices; confidering that we owe unto them many things befides, and the fame more beautifull than this.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Of verses eited and pronounced in season and to good purpose, or otherwise.

Mmonius being captaine of the citic of Athens, was desirous in favour of Diogenius, to take A view and knowledge, how the yoong men profited, who were students in Grammar, Geomettie, Rhetoricke and Musickes, whereupon he invited to supper, the most famous regents and mafters, that were thorowout the whole citie. There met also with them, and were prefent, many other learned and studious persons, in great frequencie, yea, and in maner all his friends and familiars: As for Achilles, verily, at the funerall games and folemnities of Patroelus, he bad onely those to sup with him, who had fought hand to hand in single combat to the utterance, with this intent (as it is faid) that if haply there had bene any choler or heat of revenge inkindled and inflamed betweene these men, whiles they were in armes, they should now lay downe and quit the same, meeting thus at one feast, eating and drinking together at one table: but it hapned 50 cleane contrary as this time unto Ammonias; for the jealousic, contention, and emulation of theie schoolemen and matters of art aforesaid, became the hotter, and grew to the heighth amid their cups; for by this time, they fell to argue, yea, and to challenge and defie one another, reafoning, and disputting without all order or judgement: whereupon, at the first he commanded the mulician Eraton, to fing unto the harpe; who began his fong in this wife, out of the works Of of Hesiodus:

Of quarell and contention, There were as then, more forts than one.

for which I commended him, in that he knew how to applie the dittie of his fong fo well unto the present time; which gave occasion afterwards unto Ammonius of this argument; namely, to discourse of verses in season, and to good purpose pronounced; saying: That herein there appeared not onely a good grace, but also ensued otherwhiles great commoditie thereof. And presently every mans mouth was full of that Rhapsodian poet; who at the marriage of king * Ptolemans, when he espoused his owne fifter, and was thought herein to commit a strange and unlawfull act, began his fong with these verses out of Homer:

Great Jupiter, to Juno then, did call

His fifter deere and wedded wife withall. as also another, who being to sing after supper before king Demetria, at what time as he sent unto him his sonne Philip, being as yet a very infant, came readily forth with these verses:

I his childe, fee that you well bring up in vertuous discipline; As fits the race of Hercules, and eke a fonne of mine.

Anaxarehus likewife, when Alexander at supper time slung apples at him, arose from the boord, rehearing this verse out of Euripides:

Some god one day, in veritie By mortall hand shall wounded be.

But most excellently of all others, a Corinthian lad, who being led away prisoner, as the citie was forced and loft, when Mummius taking a furvey of those children who were free borne, commanded as many of them as had any knowledge in literature, for to write before him, wrate ex

Thrice and fouretimes those Greeks were blest, I say,

Whose hap it was to die before this day.

And by report Mummius tooke such ruth and compassion heereat, that he shed teares, and for this youthes fake, fet at libertie as many as were of his kinted and alliance. There was remem-30 bred alfo, the wife of Theodorus the tragedian, who when the time drew neere, that fuch poets and actours were to strive for the best game, would not suffer him to lie with her; but after he was returned home from the theater, where he had gotten the victorie, and gained the prize, when he came toward her, the kiffed and welcomed him home with these verses:

O noble sonne of Agamemnon, now To do with me your will, good leave have you.

Semblably, fome there were in place, who heereupon inferred many other verfes as unfitly alledged, and altogether out of scason; for that it was not thought amisse or unprofitable, both to know the same, and to beware thereby; and namely, that which is reported concerning Pompeius Magnus, when he returned from a great expedition and warlike voiage; unto whom his little 40 daughter was presented by her schoolemaster; and for to shew unto him how the had profited in learning, when a booke was brought unto her, the faid schoolemaster opened it, and turned to this place for her to reade, which beginneth thus:

> From warrethou art returned (afe and found, Would God thou hadft bene there left dead on ground.

Alfo, when uncerteine newes (without any head or authour) was brought unto Cafeus Longinus, that his fonne was dead in a strange countrey, fo as he could neither know the trueth, nor yet do away the doubtfull suspition thereof, there came an ancient senatour to visit him, and said: What Longinus, will you not contemne and neglect this vaine bruit and headleffe rumor, raifed (no doubt) by some malicious person? as if you neither had known nor read this sentence:

No publicke fame, nor vox popli Was ever knowen in vaine to die.

As for him, who when a Grammarian in the ifle of Rhodes, called for a theame, to varie upon, and to thew thereby his learning before the people in a frequent theater, gave him this verse;

Avant out of this ifle, I do thee reed, Most wicked wretch that lives, and that with speed.

it is hard to fay, whether he did it of purpose, contumeliously, to deride this poore Grammarian, or committed an errour against his will? But to conclude this discourse of verses inserted aptly and otherwise alledged, did very pretily appease the stirre and tumult among the regents and masters of art above laid.

THE SECOND QUESTION AND THE THIRD.

What is the cause why Alpha, (or A) was raunged first of all other letters? as also, what proportion, the number of vowels and semi-vowels hath beene composed and ordeined?

Hereas the use and custome was at Athens, during the foresaid feasts in the honour of the Muses, that lots should be carried round about the city, and they that chaunced by drawing to be matched together, propound one unto another questions of learning : Ammomus fearing left some professours of one and the fame art, should be committed in opposition together, tooke this order, and ordeined, that without any lottery at all, a Geometrician might propose a question unto a Grammarian; the Rhetorician unto a Musician, and so reciprocally answere them againe by turnes: Heereupon Hermins the Geometrician put foorth first unto Protogener the Grammarian, a question, urging him to tell the cause, why, A was set formost of all the letters? who rendred unto him a reason which goeth for currant in the schooles: For this is certaine (quoth he) that vowels may claime by a most just title, the place before all con- 20 fonants, whether they be mute or femi-vowels: and feeing that of vowels fome be long, others fhort, and a third fort doubtfull, and as they fay, of adouble time: thele of the last kinde, ought by good right to be effected of greater woorth and puiffance than the rest; and of them, that is, to have and hold the place of a capitainnesse, which in composition and making of a diphthong, goeth alwaies before the other two, and never commeth behinde; and that is Alpha, which nether secondeth Joia, or upfilon so, as that it will in such composition yeeld or helpe to make one fyllable of those twaine: but in a kinde of anger and indignation, leape backe againe unto her proper place: contrariwife, fet Alpha with whether you will of the other two, fo as the may goe before, the will accord very well, and both together will make one entire fillable, as we may fee in these words, aupen, duren, as also in day, differ, and an infinit number of 20 others: thus in these three respects shee hath the victorie, and carieth the prize, like unto those champions who are winners in Quinquettium, or the five severall games, for she hath the vantage above the multitude of other letters, in that the is a vowell above vowels, because the hath two times, as being one while long, and another while fhort, and even of thefe double timed vowels she hath the preeminence, by reason that she standeth alwaies before, and never followeth or commeth behinde others.

When Protogenes had made an end of his speech, Ammonius called unto me by name and faid: How now Plut arch, wil not you aid Cadmus, being (as you are) a Boeotian as he was? for it is faid, that he placed Alpha before all other letters; for that Alpha in the Phænician language fignifieth a beefe, reputed amog them, not in the second or third place, according to He sound 40 even the very first and principall of necessarie mooveables belonging to a man: Not I (quoth he) for I am bound to fuccour (what I can) mine owne grand-father, rather than the very grandfire of Bacchus; for my grand-father Lamprias was wont to fay: That the first distinct and articulate voice which a man pronounceth, is by the power of Alpha; feeing that the breath and spirit within the mouth, is formed principally by the motion of the lips, which as they are opened and divided a funder, yeeld by that fimple overture this voice first, which of all others likewife is most simple, and performed with least adoe, calling neither for the tongue to helpe it, nor waiting for the use thereof, but iffueth foorth, even when it lieth still and stirreth not out of the owne place: and therefore it is the first voice that infants utter: heereupon also commeth this word dien in Greeke, which fignifieth as much as to heare any voice, for that al- 50 waies fuch a found as A is usually heard: yea, and many other like vocables, as alter, that is to fay, to fing; a when, that is to fay, to pipe; and what deer, to cric or holla; yea and these words copen to elevate or lift up, and conform, that is to fay to open : not without good cause tooke these names upon the deduction and lifting up of the lips, whereby such a found as A, is let foorth, and falleth out of the mouth, and therefore the names of other mute confonants, all fave one, are helped by this A, which ferveth as a light to cleare their blindnesse: for there is but Pi, or P onely, wherein the power of this letter or found is not emploied: as for Ph and Chi, the one of them is P, and the other K, pronounced with (b) or an afperation.

Hecreto when Hemias faid, that he approved well of both reasons: Why doe not you then (quoth I) expound and deliver unto us, what is the proportion if there be any, in the number of letters; for in mine opinion there is, which I collect by this argument, in that the multitude of mute consonants and semicowels, in regard one of another, as also in respect of vowels, ariseth not so by channes, but according to to the first proportion which we call Arithmeticall, for there being 9. and 8. it commets to passe that the middle number betweene, as it summounteth one, so it is equally surmounted of the other, and the two extremes being brought roge-ther, the greater in respect of the lesse, so that of Apollo, for 9. is attributed to the muses, like as 7. to Apollo, which being joined together, that the surface of that which is in the middes, to wit, of 8. and that by good reason; for that the suminovowels betweene both, doe participate the power and efficacie of the extremes, to wit, mutes and vowels; according to the figure heere represented:

Mercurie (quoth hee) was the first god who found out letters in Megypt: therefore the Aegyptians when they would represent the first letter, doe paint Ibis, a sowle dedicated to Mercurie: but not well in my judgement, thus to give the precedence and superioritie of all other letters unto a beast that uttereth neither voice nor found at all: Moreover, unto Mercurie is confecrated of all numbers, the quaternarie especially, and many there bee who have written, that borne he was upon the fourth day of the moneth: now if you multiply fowre by fower, you arise to fixteene, the just number of those first letters which were called Phænician, invented first by Cadmus. Of the other letters which afterwards were added to the rest, Palamedes devi-30 fed one fowre; and Simonides put thereto another fowre: moreover, the first perfect number of all others is 3, as having a beginning, a middle, and an end: after it the number of 6, because it is knowen very well to be equall in all the parts thereof: of these now, if 6.be multiplied by 4. and the first quadrat or cube (8) by the first perfect number (3) they bring foorth 24. the full number of all the letters in the alphabet. Whiles he thus spake still, Zopyrion the Grammarian was perceived evidently to laugh at him and mumble fomewhat betweene his teeth secretly: but so soone as he had made an end of speech, he could hold no longer but out hee spake and faid: That all this was nothing else but frivolous bibble-babble: For that (quoth Zopyrion) there can no found reason at all begiven, but even by adventure and chaunce it fell out, that so many letters there were, and those placed in such order as they be: Like as (quoth he) that the 40 first verse of Homers Ilias, should contain so many syllables just, as the first of his Odyssea: and againe, that the last of the one, should answer in number of syllables even, to the last of the other, is altogether a cafuall thing, hapning fo by meere fortune and not otherwise.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether hand it was of Venus that Diomedes wounded?

Feer this, when Hermias addreffed himselfe to propose unto Zopyrion a question, we inhibited and staied him. But Maximus the Rhetorician, came with a long steth a same of 50 out of Homer, and demanded of him: Whether hand it was of Venus that Diomedes wounded? With that Zopyrion to quit him againe, asked him presently: Of whether legge king Philip haulted? The case quoth Maximus is not all one and the same: for Domosthers hath left unto us no meanes for to answer this question: but if you confesse once that you know not; others there be who will shew you the very place where Homer telleth them who have any wit to conceive, which hand of hers was hun? Zopyrion at this speech seemed to be associated and stand in maze: whereupon whiles he held his peace, we requested Maximus, to point unto us the place as foresaid:

aforefaid: First and formost (quoth Maximus then) considering that the verses runne in this

Then leapt aside bold Tideus sonne, and traversing his ground, Stept to, and with sharpe pointed speare,

It is plaine and evident; that if he had meant to have finitten her left hand; her needed not to have leapt at one fide, for he had the left hand of Penns just opposite unto his owner ight hand, when he directly affronted her? and more propable it is, and stands to greater reason; that his when he directly affronted her? and more propable it is, and stands to greater reason; that his intent was to hurt the stronger hand, and that which held Aene as her sonne; whom shee see the med with violence to carteaway, and which being wounded, she might beforeed to forgoe her hold, and let his body goe. Secondly, when Penns was returned up into heaven, Mineros by way of scoffing, laughed at her, and said to Jupiter in this wise:

No doubt, faire V crius hath suborn'd fome Greekish dame to love,
And follow one of these Troy knights, whom she affects above
All other wights: and whiles she stroubt this lady gentlysee,
Her soft hand met with some gold class.

ndmet with some gold class,

And verily I suppose, that even your selfe good fir, an excellent regent and professour as you are, if at any time you would seeme in making much of one of your scholars; to stroake and softly to handle him, will not doe it with your left hand, but with the right; and even so, verie like it is, that Venus, the most gentle and courteous goddesse of all others, in this manner dealt with the Grecian ladies, when she perswaded them unto her minde.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that Plato Said, how the Soule of Ajax came to the lot, in the 20. place.

His prettie discourse aforesaid, pleased the whole company, and made them all metrie, but one Grammarian named Hylan, whom Sospis a professiour in Rhetoricke, seeing to sit all silent, sad and heavy, (for that in deed he had sped not very well, whensoever he made proofe of his scholars proceedings) came out with these verses aloud:

Ajax foule, the fonne of Tclamon,

Remained fill, and all alone.

and the rest of the verses following, he delivered in an higher note than ordinatie, and rehearfed them aloit unto him, in this wise:

But now good fir come bither, that my words you may well heare, Represse your ire, thu anger quench, and tame your moodie cheere.

But Hylus grumbling fill in anger, bewraied no leffeby his croffe and impertinent answer, saying: That the ghost of Ajax in hell, tooke het turne in the 20. place, and her lot was according to Plate, to be transmuted into the nature of a lion: But for mine owne part (quoth he) I thinke many times of the old mans saying in the comedie:

Retter is were an asse to bee Indeed, than for a manto see Those live preserd in worldy pelse, Who are for woorth behinde himselse.

Hecreat Soffis laughing heartily: But I befeech you good Hylas (quoth hee) meane while that we are turning into affes, and taking pack-faddles on our backs (if you regard and refpect any thing the honour of Plato) declare unto us the reason, why hee said: That the soule of Jax (him I meane who was Telamons sonne) came in the twentieth place to have her choice from the lottery? Which when Hylas stady refused to doe, (for he thought that they made a mocking

Who was fant peere for prowesse ay? And you know that twentie makes up the fecond decade; and the decade or number of ten, is of all numbers principall and most puiffant, like as Achilles was among the princes of the Greeks. With that we al ferup a laughter: Then Ammonius, Well (quoth he) Lamprius, you are disposed thus to jest and play with Hylas, butfince of your owne accord, you have undertaken the charge, To to deliver the cause hereof, let us intreat you to impart it unto us, not by way of sport and meriment, but in good earnest. Lamprias was at the first not a little troubled at this chalenge, but after he had pauled, and thought upon the matter a while, in the end he spake to this effect: It is an ordinary thing (quoth he) with Place, to play with us many times merrily, by certaine devifed names that hee uleth: but when foever hee inferteth fome fable in any treatife of the foule, he doth it right foberly, and hath a deepe meaning, and profound fenfe therein: for the intelligent nature of heaven, he calleth, a Chariot volant, to wit, the harmonicall motion and revolution of the world: and heere in this place whereof we are now in question (to wit, in the end of the tenth books of his Common wealth) he bringeth in a meffenger from hell, to relate newes of that which he had there himselfe seene; and calleth him by the name of Era, a Pam-20 phylian borne, and the sonne of Armenius, giving us covertly (by an enigmatical conveiance) thus much to understand: That our foules are engendred by harmonie, and so joined to our bodies, but when they be disjoined, and separate from them, they runne together all into aire from every fide, and fo returne againe from thence unto fecond generations: what should himder then but this word * exastiv, was put downe by him, not to fhew a truth whereof he spake, but * Which figrather "wow, as a probable speech, and conjecturall fiction, or else, a thing spoken (as it should mifeth also feeme) to a dead bodie, and so uttered * vainly and at a venture in the aire: for Plato alwaies * dis elect. toucheth three canfes, as being the philosopher who either first knew, or principally underflood how fatall destiny is mingled with fortune; and againe, how our freewill is woont to bee joined with either of them, or is complicate with both: and now in this place before cited, hee 30 sheweth excellently well, what power each of these causes hath in our humane affaires, attributing the choice and election of our life unto free will, (for vertue and vice befree, and at the commaund of no lord) and tying to the necessitie of farall destinie, a religious life to Godward in them, who have made a good choife, and contrariwife in those who have made a choise of the woorst: but the cadences or chaunces of lots, which being cast at a venture, and lighting heere and there, without order, befall to every one of us, bring in fortune, and preoccupate or prevent much of that which is ours, by the fundry educations or governments of commonweale, wherein it hapneth each of us to live: for this I would have every one of you to confider, whether it bee not meere folly and without all reason, to seeke for a cause of that which is 40 puted no more to fortune or adventure, but all to fome fatall destinic or providence.

Whiles Lamprias delivered this speech, Mareus the Grammarian, seemed to count and number (I wot not) what upon his singers to himselfe apart: but when he had made an end, the said Mareus named aloud all those souls or spirits which are called out in Homers News. Among which (quoth he) the ghost onely of Elpenor wandering still in the middle confines, is not reckoned with those beneath in another world, for that his bodie as yet is not interred and committed to the earth: as for the soule of The said of the emeth not to be enumbred with the rest.

as also the power to Ipeake with the living, and to understand their state and affaires, even before he had drunkethe bloud of sacrificed beasts: If then (quoth hee) of Lamppias you subtract these two, and count the rest, you shall find e that the soule of Ajax was just the twentieth of those which presented themselves to Unffer; and hereto alluded Plato, as it should seemely way of mirth, joining his sable together with that evocation of spirits, otherwise called Neepsa in Homers Odysses.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is covertly means by the fable, wherein Neptune is feigned to have beene vanquisted: as alfo, why the Athenians take out the second day of the moneth, August?

Ow when the whole company were growen to a certeine uprore, Menephyllus a Peri-patetickephilosopher calling unto Hylus by name: You see (quoth he) now, that this queftion was not propounded by way of mockerie and contumelious flouting: but you my good friend(leaving this froward and mal-contented Ajax, whose name as Sophoeles faith, is omi- 10 nous, and of ill presage) betake your selse unto Neptune, and side with him a while; who is wont to recount unto us himselfe, how he hath beene oftentimes overcome; to wit, in this city, by Mineron; at Delphi, by Apollo; in Argos, by Juno; in Aegina, by Jupiter; and in Auxus, by Bacebus: and yet in all his repulses, disfavors, and infortunities, he bare himselse alwaies mild, and gentle, carying no ranckor or malice in his heart: for proofe hecreof, there is even in this city a temple common to him and Minerva, in which there standeth also an alrar dedicated to Oblivion: Then Hylas who feemed by this time more pleafantly disposed: But you have forgotten (quoth he) o Menephyllu, that we have abolished the second day of the moneth, August, not in regard of the moone, but because it was thought to be the day upon which xeprune and Minerva pleaded for the seignorie of this territorie of Attiea. Now I affure you (quoth 20 Lamprias) N eptune was every way much more civill and reasonable than Thrasibulus, in case being not a winner as the other, but a lofer, he could forget all grudge and malice.

A great breach and defect there is in the Greeke originall, wherein wanteth the farther handling of this question, as also 5. questions entier following, and a part of the 6. to wit.

Why the accords in musicke are devided into three?

Wherein differ the intervals or spaces melodious, from those that be accordant?

What cause is it that maketh accord? and what is the reason that when one toucheth two strings accordant together, the melody is ascribed to the base?

10 What is the cause that the eclipticker evolutions of summe and moone being in number equall, yet we see the moone oftner ecclipsed than the sunne ?

II That we continue not alwaies one and the same, in regard of the daily deflux of our substance.

12 Whether of the twaine is more probable, that the number of flarres is even or odde?

Of this twelfth question thus much remaineth as followeth.

Tfander was wont to fay: That children are to be deceived with cockall bones, but men with Lothes: Then Glaucias, I have heard (quoth he) that this speech was used against Polycrates the tyrant; but it may be, that it was spoken also to others; But whereby do you demaund this of me ? Because verily (quoth Soffin) I see, that children fnatch at such bones, & the Academiques catch at words: for it feemeth unto me, that these stomacks differ in nothing from them, who holding out their clutched fifts, play at handy dandy, & aske whether they hold in their close hand even or odde? Then Protogenes, arose, and calling unto me by name: What aile we(quoth he) and what is come unto us that we fuffer these Rhetoricians and oratours thus to brave it out, and to mocke others, being demaunded nothing in the meane time, nor put to it for to contribute their skot and part unto this conference and these discourses? unlesse peradventure they 50 will come in with this plea, that they have no part of this table talke, in drinking wine, as being those who admire and follow Demosthenes, who in all his life time never dranke wine: This is not the cause (quoth I) but the reason is , because we have spurred them no questions: but if you have no better thing to aske, I will propose unto them acase of repugnancie in contrarie lawes or conditions, and the same drawen out of Homer.

THE THIRTEENTH QUESTION.

Aquestion as touching repugnant lawes, taken out of the third Rhapsodie or booke of Ho-

Nd what is that case, demaunded he againe? I will tell you (quoth I) and with all propose A it unto these here: and therefore let them give attentive eare: Alexander Paris, in the third booke of Homer's Ilias, giveth defiance to Menelaus, and chalengeth him to a lingle fight, 10 with certaine conditions protesting in this maner:

Let us betweene both armies meet without, My selfe Imeane and Menclaus stout : To try in single fight upon this plaine To which of us by right shall appertaine Dame Helene, with her goods : For looke who shall Make good his ground, and quit himselfe withall So bravely, that the victorie he gaine, Have he ber-felfe, and jewels in domaine.

Hetter againe publishing unto all, and declaring as well to Greeks as Trojanes the same cha-20 lenge and defiance of his brother Paris, ufeth in maner the verie fame words, faying:

His meaning is, that Greeks and Trojanes all Besides, should for the time surcease and quite Lay downe all armes upon the ground withall, Whiles he and Menelaus hardy knight, For Helen faire, and all her jewels fight: And he that shall the better hand obteine, With him both lady shall and goods remaine.

Nowwhen Menelaus had accepted of these conditions, and both sides were sworne to the articles accorded, Agamemnon to ratifie the same by his roiall affent, spake in this wise:

If Alexander in plaine fight, shall Menelaus kill: Dame Helene hemay leade away, and her goods at his will: But fay that Menelaus brave, doe Alexander flay The woman then and what she hath, let him streight have away.

Now for that Merielaus vanquished Paris indeed, but yet bereft him not of his life; either fide had good plea to defend their cause opposite unto their enemies: for the Greeks pretended a 40 right claime unto Helena, for that Paris was overcome : and the Trojanes impleaded and denied to redeliver her, because he was not left dead in the place : how shall this case then be decided and judged aright in fo great a difference and contrarietie? Certes it belongeth not to Philosophers nor Grammarians alone; but it is for Rhetoricians also to determine heereof, who are both learned in Grammar and good letters; and withall, well seene in Philosophic, as yoube. Then Soffis gave his opinion and faid: That the cause and plea of the defendant chalenged, was farre better and stronger, as having the law directly on his side: for the assailant and chalenger himselfe, denounced under what conditions the combat thould be performed; which feeing the defendant accepted of, and yeelded unto, it lieth not in their power any more to adde ought thereto: for the condition comprised in the chalenge, caried no words imply-50 ing flaughter or death of any fide; but the victory of the one, and the discomfiture of the other; and that with very great reason: for by right the lady belonged to the better man, and more valiant; and the more valorous man is he who vanquisheth: for otherwise it falleth out many times, that valiant and hardie men are flaine by very cowards; as afterwards Achilles himselfe chaunced to be killed by Paris with the shot of an arrow: neither will any man (I trow) say, that Achilles thus flaine, was the leffe valiant, or call this the victorie; but rather the good fortune of Paris unjustly dealt, whose happe it was to shoot so right; whereas on the other side, Heltor was vanquished by Achilles, before he was flaine, for that he would not abide his comming, but for feare abandoned his ground and fled: for he that refuse the combat and runneth away, is in plaine tearmes vanquished, & hath no excuse to palliate or closke his defeature; but flatly confession his enemie to be his better. And therefore Irun, comming at first to Helena for to give her intelligence of this combat, slatth unto her:

They will in combat fight it out with long speares now for thee: And looke who winnes the victory, his wife thou nam'd shalt be.

And afterwards Jupiter himselfe adjudged the prize of victorie unto Menelaus in these words:

Now plaine it is, the champion bold, fir Menclaus hight,

Hath quit himselfe a man, and wonne

For it were a ridiculous mockerie to fay: That Paris had coquered Achilles, because he stood behind a farre off, & with the shot of an arrow wounded him in the foote, who never was ware of him, nor fo much as looked for any fuch thing; & that now when he refuted combat, diffrufted himselfe, & ran out of the field like a coward, to shroud & hide himselfe within the bosome, & betweene the armes of a woman, being as a man would fay difarmed and despoiled of his weapons, even whiles he was alive, his concurrent should not deserve to carie away the victorie, thewing himselfe the conquerout in open field; even according to the conditions offred by 20 Paris the chalenger. Then Glaucus taking the matter in hand, impleaded and argued against him thus: First (quothle) in all edicts, decrees, lawes, covenants and contracts, the last are reputed alwaies of greater validitie, and doe stand more firme than the former: but the second covenants and the last, were they which were declared and published by Agamemnon; in which was comprised, expressly death for the end of the combat, and not the discomfiture or yeelding of the partie conquered: moreover the former capitulation of covenants, passed onely by parole & bare words, but the other which followed after, was fealed & confirmed with an oath, yea & a curse and execration was set therupon, for who sever should transgresse the same : neither was it approoved & ratified by one man alone, but by the whole army together:in fuch fort as this latter paction and covenant, ought properly and by right, to be so called; whereas the 30 former was nothing else but the intimation of a chalenge and defiance given; in testimonie whereof, Priamus also after the articles of combat were sworne unto , departed out of the field

For as yet the combat remained unatchived and unperfect, neither had it a certaine and doubtleffe conclusion, considering neither the one not she other of the champions was staine: so that in mine opinion, there is no contrarietie heere at all, because the former articles and conditions were comprised in the second: for no doubt, he that killeth hath overcome; but it followeth not, that he who vanquisheth hath killed his enemie: but to say a truth, weemay well and admitteth no tergiversation at all, we ought to esteem more firme and essectivall: furthermore, that which is the chiefe and most principall point of all, even he himselfe who is supposed to be the victour, in that he retired not backe, nor gave over seeking for him that sled, but went up and downe, to and fro among the troupes seatching all about, teflified plainly, that his victory was imperfect and of no validitie; confidering that his concurrent was escaped out of his hands, which put him in minde of the words which himselfe a little before had said:

The house of death, so whether of us twaine Is come, let him lie dead upon the plaine: As for the reft, see every one apart, And that with speed, you home in peace depart.

And therefore it ftood him upon necessarily, to seeke out Alexander, to the end, that having slaine him, he might accomplish the entire execution of the combat, and gaine the end thereof; whereas, neither killing him out of the way, nor taking him prisoner, without all right he demanded the prize of victorie: for in very trueth, he did not so much as vanquish him, if we may gather presumptions and conjectural arguments, even out of his owne words, complaining as he doth of Jupiter, and lamenting to himselse, that he missed of his purpose, in these words:

O Jupitet, in heaven above,
no God there is againe,
More fight full than thy selfetome,
nor exuell, to be plaine,
I made account, and so gave out,

THE FOURETEENTH QUETSION.

As touching the Muses and their number, ecreeine points not after a vulgar and common maner handled.

His discourse being thus finished, we performed our oblations and libaments to the Mufes; and after we had fung an hymne to Apollo, the lender and conductour of the Mufes, we chanted also to the found of the harpeya's Ernton plaied thereupon, those verses which Hesiodus wrote concerning the generation and birth of the Muses: when our fong was ended, Herodes the rhetorician began his speech in this wife: Listen lordings (quoth he) you that would diftrack and plucke from us, Callioge: they fay (for footh) that the converfeth with kings, and not with those who can skill of unfolding syllogismes, or who propose difficult questions to such as fpeake big, and are of magnificent speech; but those rather who do and effect great matters, the works I meane which concerne orators, politicians & Statelmen: and as for Cho, of all the Mu-50 fest the admitteeth and avowed the encomialtical orations, wherein are conteined the praifes of other arrizans; for the in old time; our ancestours called praises, Clea : and Polymneia enterteinetly histories which is nothing els, but the memoriall or remembrance of many antiquities : and it is reported, that in some places, and namely, in "Chios, they name all the Muses will so, that " Ot, Live. is to fay, memories: as for me, I challenge also to my selfe some part of * Euterpe, if it be as * Or, Terple Shay spone faith, that she it is, who hath allotted unto her the gift to enterteine meetings and diere. conferences, with pleafure, delectation and grace : for an oratour is no leffe affable in familiar convertation, than eloquent in pleading causes at the barte, or in opining and delivering his minde in confultations at the counfell table; confidering that the art and profession of an oratour, conteineth the facultie and feat to win good will, do defend, mainteine, and justifie; but principally, and most of all, we imploy our greatest skill in praising and dispraising; which if we can order artificially and with dexteritie, we are able to bring about and effect no small matters: and contrariwife, if we do unskilfully, and without art, we faile of the marke which we shoot at: for this commendable title,

O God, this man how acceptable

agreeth in my judgement, to oratours, rather than to any other persons, who have the skill to speake well and to perswade : a gift most requisit, fit, and beforming those that are to converse 10 with men. Then Ammonius: It were not well done of as (quoth he) ô Herodes, if we should be offended and angry with you, although you feeme to comprehend all the Mules together in your hand: for that among friends, all things are common: and therefore it is, that Jupiter hath begotten many Mules, that every man might draw abundance from them of all good things, and make no spare: for we have not all of us need, of the skill in hunting, of militarie science, of the art of navigation, nor of the mechanicall handictafts of artizans; but we all stand in need of learning and erudition,

As many as on fruits do feed,

Which for our use the earth doth breed.

And hereupon it is, that Jupiter hath procreated one Minerva, one Diana, and one Vulcane; but 20 many Mules: now that there should be nine of them in number just, and neither more nor fewer, you will be fo good (will you not) as to yeeld us areason? for I suppose you are well studied in this point, being as you are, fo well affected unto them, and fo much adorned by their graces. And what great learning (quoth Herodes againe) should there be in that ? for every man hath in his mouth, the number of nine, and there is not a woman, but fingeth thereof, and is able to fay, that as it is the first square arising from the first odde number, so it is unevenly odde it felfe, as being divided into three odde numbers equall one to the other. Now furely (quoth Ammonius, and therewith finiled) this is manfully done of you, and flourly remembred: but why do you not adde thereto, thus much more, for a corollary and over-measure, that it is a number composed of the two first cubes, considering that it is made of an unitie and an octona- 30 rie: and after another maner likewise of composition, it standeth of two triangled numbers, to wit, a fenarie and a ternarie, whereof, both the one and the other is a perfect number: but what is the reason, that this novenatic or number of nine; agreeth better unto the Muses, than to any other gods or goddeffes; for nine Mules we have, but not nine Cerefes, nor nine Minervaes, nor yet nine Dianaes? you are not (I trow) perswaded that the cause hereof is, because the name of their mother Manuscuin, conteineth just so many letters ? Herodes laughed heartily heereat; and after some time of paule and filence, Ammonius sollicited us to take the matter in hand, and fearch the cause thereof. With that, my brother beganne, and said : Our ancients in olde time knew of no more than three Muses; but to proove so much by way of demonstration, before this company, where there be so many wife men and learned clerks, were a meere uncivill and 40 rufticall part, favouring of vanitie and oftentation but I affure you, the reason of this number, was not (as some affirme) the three kinds of musicke or melodie, towit, * Diatonique, * Chromatique, and * Harmonique; nor by occasion of the three termes or bounds which make the intervals in an octave or eight, of mulicke harmonicall, to wit, Nete, Mefe, and Hypate, that is to fay, the Treble, the Meane, and the Bale; and yet verily, the Delphians so called the Muses, wherein they did amiffe, in my judgement, to reftraine that generall name of them all, to one science, orrather to one part of a science, to wit, the harmonie of musicke : but our ancients and thinding (knowing well, thet all arts and sciences which are practifed & performed by reason and speech are reduced to three principall kinds, Philosophicall, Rhetoricall, and Mathematicall) reputed them to be the gifts and beneficiall graces of three deities or divine powers, which they called 50 Muses: howacit, afterwards, and about the time wherein Hestodan lived, when the faculties of thefe generall sciences were better revealed and discovered, they perceived that each of them had three differences; and so they subdivided them into three subalternall forts; namely, the Mai thematicks, into Arithmaticke, Musicke, and Geometrie; Philosophy, into Logicke, Ethicke of Morall, and Phylicke or Naturall; as for Rhetoricke, it had at the beginning for the first parts Demonstrative, which was imploied in praises; for the second, Deliberative, occupied in confultations; and for the third, Judiciall, uled in pleas and judgements: of all which faculties, they thought there was not fo much as one, that was invented, or could be learned without fome gods or Mules, that is to fay, without the conduct and favour of fome superiour pullance; and therefore they did not devile and make fo many Mules, but acknowledged and found that formany there were: like as therefore, the number of nine is divided into three ternatics, and every one of them subdivided into as many unites; even so the rectitude of reason in the precellent knowledge of the trueth, is one puissance, and the same common: but ech of there three kinds is subdivided into three other; and every of them hath their severall Muse, for to dispose and adorne particularly one of these faculties, for I doe not thinke, that in this division, poets and aftrologers can of right complaine of us, for leaving out their fciences; knowing 19 (as they do) as we can tell them, that Astrologie is contributed unto Geometric, & Poctrie to Mulicke. Upon this speech, Tryphon the physician brake out into these words : But what meane you (I pray you) and how hath our poore art offended you, that it is excluded thus our of the temple and focietie of the Mules? Then Dionyfine of Meliting, added moreover, and faid: Nay you have provoked many of us besides, to complaine upon our discontenument in the fame behalfe: for we that are gardeners and husbandmen imploied in agriculture, challenge a right and propertie in lady Thalia, afcribing unto her, the care and charge of plants and feeds, that they may come up, grow, flower, increase, and be preserved. But herein (quoth I) you doe the man manifelt wrong; for you have Ceres for your patroneffe, furnamed Anvoidage, for giving us fo many gifts; to wit, the fruits of the carth: yea, and Bacchus may goe for a patron in this re-an, bande And we know besides, that physicians have Aesculapius for their president and tutelar god. who ordinarily also use Apollo as he is furnamed, Pean, that is to say, the appealer of all paines and maladies, but never as he is, Musegetes, that is to say, the prince and guide of the Muses; True it is indeed, that according to Homer:

Allmortallmen of gods have need; That they in their affaires may speed.

Howheit all men require not the helpe of all gods: But I woonder much at this, that Lamprias should either forget or be ignorant of that common faying of the Delphians, who give out: That among them the Mules beare not the name, either of founds and notes, or of ftrings; but whereas the whole world is divided into three principall parts or regions; whereof the farft is of those natures which be fixed and not erraticall; the second of such as are wandering; and the third, of bodies under the sphære of the moone: these are every one distinctly digested, composed, and ordered by harmonicall proportions, and each of them (as they say) hath a Muse to their keeper and prefident, to wit, the first or highest region, Hypate; the last or lowest, Nete: & as for Mele which is in the middle betweene, the doth both comprehend and also turne a-40 bout mortall things, (as much as it is possible, considering they come after) with divine and immortall, yea, and earthly natures with heavenly and celettiall, according as Plato himfelfe after a covert & anigmaticall maner hath given us to understand, under the names of the three Destinies, calling one, Atropos; another, Lachesis; and a third, Clotho: for as touching the motions and revolutions of the eight heavenly Sphæres, hee hath attributed as prefidents

Then Menephylus the Peripateticke comming in with his speech: There is (quoth hee) some reason and probabilitie in the Delphians saying; but surely the opinion of Plate is abfurd, in that unto those divine and eternall revolutions of the heavens, he hath affigned in stead of Muses, the Syrenes which are dæmons, or powers not verie kinde and good, nor beneficiall; 50 either leaving out as he doth the Mules altogether, or els calling them by the names of the Destinies, and saying they be the daughters of Necessitie: for surely Necessitie is a rude thing and violent; whereas Perswasson is gentle and gracious; by the meanes of Muses amiable, ta-than doth that grace and Venus of Empedocles. That is true indeed (quoth Ammonius) it abhorreth that violent and involuntarie cause, which is in our selves, enforcing us to doe against Xxx 3 our evils: but the necessitie which is among the gods is nothing intollerable, nor violent, nor hard to be obeied or perswaded, but to the wicked, no more than the law of a citie, that unto good men is the best thing that is, & which they cannot pervert or transgresses not because it is impossible for them so to do, but for that they are not willing to change the same. Moreover as touching those Syrenes * of Homer, there is no reason that the sable of them should affright us for (after an anigmatical and covert fort) even he fignifieth very well unto us, that the power of their fong and mulicke, is neither inhumane, nor pernicious or mortall; but fuch as imprinteth in the foules which depart from hence thither, as also to such as wander in that other world after death, a vehement affection to divine and celestiall things, together with a certeine forgetfulnefle of those that be mortall and earthly, deteining and enchanting them as it were with 10 a pleasure that they give unto them; in such fort as by reason of the joy which they receive from them, they follow after and turne about with them: now of this harmonie, there is a little echo or obscure resonance commeth hither unto us, by the meanes of certeine discourses, which calleth unto our foule, and putteth into her minde, fuch things as then and there are, whereof the greatest part is enclosed and stopped up with the abstructions of the slesh, and passions that are not fincere: howbeit, our foule, by reason of the generositie wherewith it is endued, doth understand, yea, and remember the same, being ravished with so vehement an affection thereof, that her pattion may be compared properly unto most ardent and furious fits of love, whiles the still affecteth and defireth to enjoy, but is not able for all that, to loofen and free her-selfe from the bodie; howbeit, I doe not accord and hold with him altogether in these matters: but 20 it feemeth unto me, that Plato as he hath somewhat strangely in this place, called the axes and poles of the world and heavens, by the names of spindels, rocks, and diffaves, yea & tearmed the starres, wherves : fo, to the Muses also he hath given an extraordinarie denomination of Syrens, as if they related, and expounded unto the foules and ghosts beneath, divine and celestiall things: like as utyffes in Sophoeles faith, that the Syrenes were come:

The daughters who of Phorcis were,

As for the Mules they be affigued unto the eight heavenly sphæres: and one hath for her porti-That doth of hell the lawes declare. on the place and region next to the earth: those then which have the presidences & charge of the revolution of those eight sphares, do keepe, preserve and mainteine the harmony and con- 30 fonance, as also of themselves one to another; and that one which hath the superintendence of that space betweene the moone and the earth, and converfeth with mortall and temporall thinges, bringeth in and infufeth among them, by the meanes of her speech and song (so farre forth as they be capable by nature and apt to receive the same) the perswastive facultie of the Graces, of musicall measures and harmonie: which facultie is very cooperative with civile policie and humane societie, in dulfing and apeafing that which is turbulent, extravagant and wandering in us, reducing it gently into the right way, from blind by pathes and errors and there fetleth it : but according to Pyndarus:

Whom Iupiter from heaven above Vouchsafeth not his gracious love, amaz'd they be and flie for feare When they the voice of Mules heare.

Whereto when Ammonius had given acclamation, alluding (as his maner was) unto the verice of Xenophanes in this wife:

These things doe cary good credence and withall mooved us every one to opine and deliver his advice: I my felfe after fome little Andto the trueth have reference, pause and silence, began thus to say: That as Plato himselfe by the etymologie of names (as it were by traces) thought to finde out the properties and powers of the gods; even so let us likewife place in heaven & over celestial things, one of the Muses, which seemeth of the heaven to 50 to be called Urania. Certes, it standeth to great reason, that these heavenly bodies require not much variety of governmet, for that they have but one simple cause, which is, nature: but whereas there be many errors, many enormities & trespasses, thither we must transfer those eight: one for to correct one fort of faults and disorders, and another for to amende & reforme another: and for that of our life, one part is bestowed in serious & grave affaires, and another in sport & game; & throughout the whole course thereof, it hath need of a moderate temperature & muficall confent: that which in us is grave & ferious shall be ruled and conducted, by Calliope, Clie and Thalia, being our guides in the skill and speculation as touching gods and goddesses as for the other Mules, their office and charge is to support and hold up that which is inclined and prote to pleafure, place and different not to fuffer it through weaknesse and imbecillity to runne headlong into loofnesse and bestiality; but to keepe in, represse and hold it in good and decent order with danneing, finging and playing fuch as hath their measures, and is tempered with harmonie, reason, and proportion: For mine owne part, considering that Plato admitted and fetteth downe in every one two principles and causes of all our actions; the one inbred and naturall; to wit, a defire and inclination to pleasures: the other comming from withput foorth; to wit, an opinion which covereth the best; insomuch, as the one he calleth sometime, Reason, and the other, Passion; and seeing that either of these againe admitteth distinct differences; I see certainly, that both of them require a great government; and in verie truth, an heavenly and divine conduct: and first as touching Reason, one part thereof is civill and roiall; namely, that which medleth in policke government, and matters of State: over which is placed as Hefodus faith, Callispe; Clio is allotted for her part principally, to advance, colland, and encourage, ambition or defire of honour; Polymneia ruleth and preserveth the vertue memorative, and the defire of knowledge and learning, which is in the foule: and heereupon it is, that the Sicyonians of those three Muses which they honour, call one, Polymathia; and unto Euterpe, who attributeth not the skill and speculation of trueth in nature, as acknowledging no delights and recreations more pure, beautifull, and honest than it. To come now unto ap-20 petites and affections, that which concerneth eating and drinking, Thalia maketh civill, fociable, and honest: whereas, otherwise it would be inhumane, beastly, and disordered; which is the reason that we say; those men doe θαλιάζειν, when they meet together friendly and merily to make good cheere: but in no wife fuch as become drunke, and grow to exceffe and riotous missed missed and Venus, Erato is the that performeth them with her presence; perswading that the action thereof should respect reason and the opportunity of time, cutting off wantonnesse, and quenching the furious heat of lust and pleasure, making it for to determine and rest in faithfull love and amitie, and not to end in dissolute and lascivious intemperance. There remaineth yet the pleasure of hearing and seeing, whether the same belong to reason or to passion; or rather apperteine in common to both: the other two Muses, to 30 wit, Melpomene and Terpsichore, are regents over them, which they compose and order in such fort, that as the one becommeth an honest delight, and not an enchantment of the cares; so the other contenteth the eies as much, though it doe not be witch and corrupt the fame.

The ninth Booke.

The whole chapter following is so defective and faultie in the originall, that we know not by any conjectural meanes to supply or reforme it.

THE FIFTEENTH QUESTION.

That in dauncing there be three parts, Motions, Gesture, and Shew: what every of them is? also, what communitie there is betweene the art of Poetry and the feat of dauncing.

Fter this, there was proposed a tart or cake called Pyramu, as the prize of victory for L* children, who dannee best: and for umpiers & judges were chosen Meniffue the schoole- * THE OF TH mafter, and Lampryas my brother: for before time he had daunced the warlike moriske veric reade must pretily, and was held in the dauncing schooles and places of exercise, to have the best grace in that is to say gesticulation with his hands when he daunced, above all other boies whatsoever: now when as many had daunced and shewed therein more affection than elegancie, and more heart than art; fome there were of the companie, who having chosen two more expert than the rest, and who 30 affected greatly to observe the rules of art, praied them to daunce φοραν παρα. φοραν, as one would fay, motion after motion, or one bout after another. Heereupon Thrasibulus the sonne of Ammonius, demanded what this tearme over, that is to fay, motion, fignified in this place, which ministred matter, and gave occasion unto Ammonius to discourse more at large concerning the parts of dauncing; for he faid: That there were three parts thereof, namely, over, oxinua, and differ: For that (quoth he) a daunce is compounded of motions, gestures, or countenances, like as longs standeth upon sounds, and times, or rests betweene; for paules and staies are the ends of motions heerein; and verily those motions, professors call poeis; but the dispositions and habitudes, habitudes, yuara, unto which the motions doe tend, and wherein they rest and end a namely, when in the forme and gesture of their body, they represent Apalle or Ran , or, some of these raging Bacche, fo as a man at the first fight may acknowledge their part expectly refembled as for the third part called Jugs, it is not a feigned imitation, but adovely and true demonstration of the subject matters in the daunce; for like as the poets when they would plainly and barely name Achylles, uly/fes, the Earth or Heaven, ule their proper tearnes to expresse them, and even fuch as the vulgar know them by; but for the greater emphasis and representation as it were to the life of that which they meane to deliver, they use otherwhiles words of their owec making, and borrowed Metaphors; as namely, when they would fignifie the noise of running mates, they are wont to fay, they doe xxxapley, and rexxager and for to expresse the flight of re What hot defire and haste they make,

Of flesh and blouds beir fill to take. Some see and the Alfo to show a doubtfull battel, wherein it is hard to say whether part shall have the better hand; they come with these tearmes:

ίσας υσμίνη καφαλάς έχεν.

The fight two heads aloft in view,

Confronting equally did show.

Likewise to expresse that which they would say, they devise and coine many compositions of names in their verses, as for example: Euripides speaking of Perseus:

Then Gorgon-flayer mounting hie,

In aire of Jupiter did flie.

Semblably Pindarus writing of the horse:

What time as he with courage fout,

* Spur-leffe, his bodie gave so strong,

Torunne arace from bout to bout, upon Alpheus banks along. Yea and Homer describing a course athorse-running:

I he chariots with braffe and tiv,

bedight upon the plaine,

And draw'ne by sure swift-footed steeds, were feene to runne amaine.

Even foit is induncing, for that which they call gues, that is to fay, gesture, representeth the forme & the vilage: 002, that is to fay, the motion, expresset emphatically some affection, action, or power of the minde; but by the shewes, which they call differs, properly and promptly, the very things themselves; as for example: the earth, the heaven, the affistants or standers by; which being done in order, number, and measure, resemble those proper names which otherwhiles in poetric are used, running roundly with the ornaments of their attributes and epithits in this manner:

Themis modest, venerable:

Venus black-eicd, amiable:

Queene Juno with her gold crowne honoured,

Faire Dion and wel-favoured.

Alfo:

From Helen came renowned kings,

*irrnor accuse. for otherwife if poets thould not thus doe, their stile would be very base, and their verses starke naught, and without all grace, as if one should pen them in this fort simply without all epi- 50 thits:

For the like faults and errours are committed at dauncing in the forefaid shewes, if they carry not a probable likelihood and a grace with them, and the fame accompanied with decencie and an unaffected fimplicitie: in one word, we may firly transferre the Apophthegme of Simonides, from painting unto dauncing, and fay thus: That adaunce is a mute poefie, and poefie a fpeaking daunce; infomuch (quoth hee) as neither painting dependeth upon poefie, nor poefie of painting, as having no need at all, one of the other: whereas betweene dauncing and poetrie, all things are common, are participating one with another in every thing, and representing, both 10 of them, one and the fame thing, especially in those songs to daunce, which they call Hyporchemata, wherein is performed the most effectuall and lively resemblance, of the one, by gesture, and of the other, by words and names: fo that poëmes feeme aptly to be compared unto the lines and pourfling in a picture, by which the formes of vilages are drawen; infomuch, as hee who hath proceeded well in those Hyporeliemata, and is become excellent in that feat, sheweth plainly, that these two arts, necessarily have need the one of the other: for he who chaunteth out this fong, declareth thereby, that poëmes doe in maner provoke the disposition and gesture of dauncing, berestored, I drawing with the found of verfes, as it were with certeine cords, both hands & feet, of the whole thinken bootbodie rather, stretching out every member thereof in such fort, as when they be pronounced bout to interand chanted forth, there is not one of them that can rest in quiet; by occasion whereof, the par-pretit. 30 tie who fingeth fuch fongs, is not abathed to praise himselfeno lesse for his sufficiencie in the art of dauncing, than his accomplished skill in poefie; and as if he were rapt with some divine instinct, breaketh out into this note:

I can yet foot it merrily.

And this maner of danneing to the measures; they call the Candiot dannee; howbeit, now a daies there is nothing so ill taught, so badly practifed, and so much depraved and corrupted, as is this feat of dauncing : and therefore that is befallen unto it, which Ibycan the poet fearing, wrote of himfelfe in these verses with the verses cording to the opinion of Ariftotle) is the beginning of motion and rest, in that thing wherein it is properly and principally, not by accident: for all things to be seene (which are done neither turall, as having a proper and peculiar nature of their owne; as the earth, fire, water, aire, plants, and living creatures. Moreover, those other things which we do see ordinarily engendered, as raine, hade, lightning, presteres, winds, and such like; for all these have a certeine beginning; and every one of them was not fo for ever, and from all eternitie, but did proceed from some originall: likewife, living creatures and plants, have a beginning of their motion; and this first principle, is Nature : the beginning not of motion onely, but also of rest and quiet; for whatsoever hath had a beginning of motion, the same also may have an end; and for this cause, Nature

Eing minded to write of naturall philosophie, we thinke it necessary

ry in the first place, and before all things els, to set downe the whole disputation of Philosophie, by way of division; to the end that we may know which is naturall, and what partit is of the whole. Now the Stoicks fay, that fapience or wisdom is the science of all things, aswell divine as humane; and that Philosophie is the profession and exercise of the art expedient thereto, which is the onely su-preame and fovereigne vertue; and the fame divided into three most generall vertues; to wit, Naturall, Morall, and Verball : by reason whereof, Philosophie also admitteth a three-folde distribuis the beginning aswell of rest as of moving.

CHAP. II.

What difference there is betweene a principle and an element.

Ristotle and Plato are of opinion, that there is a difference betweene a Principle and an A Element; but Thales Milefus thinketh they be both one: howbeit, there is a great difference betweene the one and the other; for elements be compounded; whereas we holde, that the first Principles neither be compounded, norare any complet substance: and verily, earth, water, aire, and fire, we tearme Elements; but Principles we call other Natures in this respect, that there is nothing precedent or before them, where f they are ingendred; for otherwise, if they were not the first, they should in no wise be Principles, but that rather were to be so called, wher-30 of they be ingendred. Nowcerteine things there are precedent, whereof, earth and water, &cc. be composed; to wit, the first matter, without all forme and shape; as also the first forme it selfe, which we call Entelechia; and thirdly, Privation. Thales therefore is in an error, when he faith, that water was both the Element and Principle or first beginning of all things.

CHAP. III.

Of principles or first beginnings, what they be.

* HALES the Milelian affirmed, that Water was the first principle of the whole world: 40 and this man feemeth to have beene the first author of philosophie; and of him tooke the Ionique fect of Philosophers their name (for many families there were flicceffively of Philosophers) who having studied Philosophie in Aegypt, went to Miletum, when hee was farre stept in yeeres, where he mainteined this position: That all things were made of Water; so all things were to be refolved again einto Water. The reasons of this conjecture of his, were these: first, because naturall seed is the principle and beginning of all living creatures, and that is of a moift substance; therefore probable it is, that all other things likewise have humiditie for their principle: fecondly, for that all forts of plants be nourifhed by moifture, which if they want, they wither and fade away: thirdly, confidering that the fire or the finne it felfe, and the starres is nourished and mainteined by vapours proceeding from the waters, the whole 30 world also by confequence confilteth of the fame: which is the reason, that Homer (supposing all things to be engendred of water) faith thus:

The ocean fea, from whence ccb thing

But ANAXIMAND Exthe Milefian holdeth: that Infinitie is the principle of ale for every thing proceedeth from it, & refolveth into it againe; & therefore there be engendred infinit worlds; and those vanish againe into that whereof they bee engendred : and why is there this Infinitie? Because (quoth he) there should never faile any generation, but still have subfittence, howbeit, pateticks, in maner all, divide Philosophie in this maner; namely, into Contemplative and Active: For necessarie it is (say they) that a man (to atteine unto persection) should be a spectatour of all things that are, and an actour of fuch things as be feemely and decent, and may the better be understood by these examples: The question is demanded, whether the Sunne be a living creature, according as it feemeth to the fight to be, or no? He that fearcheth and enquireth into the trueth of this question, is altogether therein speculative, for he seeketh no far- 50 ther than the contemplation of that which is; femblably, if the demand bemade, whether the world is infinit? or if there be any thing without the pourptile of the world? for all these questions be meere contemplative. But on the other fide mooved it may be, How a man ought to live? how he should governe his children? how he is to beare rule, and office of State? and lastly, in what maner, lawes are to be ordeined and made? for all thefe are fought into, in regard of tion; to wit, into Naturall, Morall, Rationall or Verball: the Naturall part is that, when as we 49 enquire and dispute of the world and the things conteined therein: Morall, is occupied in in-treating of the good and ill that concerneth mans life: Rationall or Verball, handleth that which perteineth unto the discourse of reason and to speech, which also is named Logique or Dialelectique, that is to fay, Disputative. But Aristotle and Theophrastus, with the Peti-action, and a man conversant therein, is altogether active and practique.

CHAP

Which of natures eternity, Doth seed and root containe.

And our foule (as he faith) doth confift of the quaternary number; for there is in it, understanding, science, opinion, and sence; from whence proceedethall manner of art and knowledge, and whereupon we our felves are called reasonable: as for understanding, it is that unity; for that it conceiveth and knoweth not but by unitie; as for example: There being many men, they are not every one in particular subject to our senses, but incomprehensible and infinit; mary in our understanding we conceive and apprehend this one man alone, unto whom none is like: and so in our cogitation we consider one man onely; but if they bee considered particularly To apart, they are infinit: for all these genders and kindes are in unitie; and therefore when the question is asked of a particular man what he is? we yeeld a general definition and fay: He is a reasonable creature, apt to discourse by reason; and so likewise of this or that horse, wee must answer: That hee is a living creature, having a propertie to neigh. Thus you see how underflanding is unity, whereby we understand these things: but the binary or number of two, is by good right an indefinit science: for all demonstration and proofe of any science, yea and moreover, all manner of fyllogifme or argumentation, doth collect a conclusion which was doubtfull, of certaine premifed propositions, confessed as true: whereby it sheweth easily another thing, whereof the comprehension is science; and so it appeareth, that science by a likelihood is the binarie number: but opinion by good reason may be said, the ternary number by 20 comprehension; for that opinion is of many, and the ternaric number implieth a pluralitie or multitude, as we may fee by the poet when he faith:

Thrice happy men, Those Greeks were then.

And for this cause Pythagoras made no reckoning of three, whose seet he name of Italique, for that he (not able to endure the tyrannicall dominion of Polygrates) departed from Samos, his native country, and went to keepe his schoole in Italy.

HERACLYTUS, and HIPPASUS the Metapontine, were of opinion, that Fire was the principle and beginning of all: for of fire fay they, all things are made, and in fire they shall have an end; and when it is extrinct and quenched, the universal world is in this manner engendred and framed: for first and formost the grosest part thereof being condensate and thrust together into it selfe, becommeth earth, and afterwards, when the same earth is resolved by fire, it turneth to be water; which when it doth evaporate, is converted into aire: againe, the whole world, and all the bodies therein conteined, shall be one day consumed by fire in that generall constagration and burning of all: whereby hee concludeth, that fire is the beginning of all things, as that whereof all was made, and the end likewise, for that all things are resolved into it.

EPICURUS the Athenian, fonne of Neocles, following the philosophie of Democritus, faith: That the principles of all things be certeine Atomes, that is to fay, little bodies indivisible, and by reason onely perceptible, the same solide, and admitting no vacuitie, not engen-40 dred, immortall, eternall, incorruptible, such as neither can be broken, nor receive any forme of the parts, ne yet be otherwise altered: These (nboth he) being perceptible & comprehended by reason, moove notwithstanding in emptinesse, and by emptinesse; & as the same voidnesse is infinite, fo the faid bodies also bein number infinit; howbein these three qualities are incident unto them, figure, bigneffe, and waight: for DEMO CRITUS allowed them but twaine, to wit, bigneffe, and figure; but Epicurus added unto them a third, namely poile or ponderofitie: For these bodies (quoth he) must of necessitie moove by the permission of the weight; otherwise they could not possibly stirre: the figures also of their bodies, (line faid) were comprehensible and not infinit; and these were neither hooked nor three-forked, ne yet round in manner of a ring, for fuch formes are apt to breake: as for the Atomes themselves, they be impassible and 50 infrangible, having certeine figures, no otherwise perceptible, but by reason; and such a body is called Atomus, not in this regard, that it is the least of all, but for that it cannot be divided, as being impaffible, and admitting no vacuitie: and therefore he that nameth an Atome, faith as much, as infrangible, impaffible, and without vacuitie: now that there is such an indivisible body called Atomus, it is apparent, for that there be elements eternall, bodies void, and an

EMPEDOCLES, an Agrigentine, the fonne of Meton, faith: There be four eelements, fire, aire, water, and earth; also two principall faculties or powers, namely, accord, and discord, for Yung even he also erreth heerein; for that he declareth not what is this Infinitie whereof he speaketh, whether it be aire, water, or any other body? he faileth likewise in this, that he putteth downe a subject matter, but overthroweth the efficient cause: for this Infinity whereof he talketh, is no subject matter; and matter cannot atteine to perfection, nor come into act; unless thing else but matter; and matter cannot atteine to perfection, nor come into act; unless there be some mooving and efficient cause. Anaximens the Milesan, mainteineth that aire is the principle of the world; for that all things come of it, and returne unto it. Like as, are is the principle of the world; for that all things come of pipit and aire mainteine the Being (quoth he) our sould essent aire; keepeth us alive; even so spirit and aire mainteine the Being of the whole world: for spirit and aire be two words, signifying both one thing. But this Philosofther is out of the way as well as the rest, in that hee thinketh that living creatures be composed of a simple spirit, or uniforme aire: and impossible it is that there should be but one printed of a simple spirit, or uniforme aire: and impossible it is that there should be but one printed of all things, to wit, matter; but there ought withall to be supposed an efficient cause: for ciple of all things, to wit, matter; but there ought withall to be supposed an efficient cause; for come not unto it, the efficient cause, to wit, the gold-smith: semblably we are to say of brasse, wood, and all other forts of matter.

ANAXAGORAS the Clazomenian, is perswaded, and so teacheth: That the principles of the world, and all that therein is, are finall like parcels; which hee tearmeth Homacomeries; for hee thought it altogether abfurd and impossible, that any thing should bee made of that which is not; or beed iffolved into that which hath no being; for how foever we take our nourishmentsimple and uniforme; as for example; eat bread of corne, and drinke water, yet with this nutriment, are nourified, haires, veines, atteries, finewes, bones, and other parts of 20 the bodie, which being to: Confesse wee must (quoth hee) likewise, that in this food which wee receive are all things which have their Being; and that all things doe grow and encrease of that which hath Being: so that in this nourishment be those parcels which breed bloud, sinewes bones, and other parts of our body, which may bee comprehended by discourse of reafon; for we are not to reduce all unto the outward fenfe, to shew and proove that bread and water effect these things: but it may suffice, that in them these parts are conceived by reason: Inalinuch therefore as in nourithment there be parcels semblable unto that which they breed, in that regard he called them Homeomeries, affirming them to be the principles of all things; and even so he would have these semblable parcels, to be the matter of all things; and for efficient cause, he setteth downe a Minde or understanding, that ordereth and disposeth al. And thus 30 beginneth he to goe to worke, and reasoneth in this wife. All things at first were consumed and hudled together pell mell; but that Minde or understanding doth sever, dispose, and set them in order: in this one thing yet he hath done wel, and is to be commended, that unto the matter he hath adjoined a workman.

ARCHELAUS an Athenian, the sonne of Apollodorus, affirmeth, that the principle of all things was the infinit aire, together with the condenfation, and rarefaction thereof, of which the one is fire, and the other water: and these Philosophers, following by continuall succession one upon another after Thales, made that feet which is called Jonique. But from another head, PYTHAGORAS the sonne of Minefarchus, & a Samian borne, the first author of the name of Philosophie: held that the principle of all things were Numbers, and their symmetries, that 40 is to (ay, the proportions that they have in their correspondency one unto another; which hee calleth otherwife Harmonies: & those elements that be composed of them both, are tearmed by him Geometricall: furthermore, hee reckoneth among Principles, unitie, and Twaine indefinit; of which, the one tendeth and halteneth to an efficient and specificall cause, to wit, a Minde, and the same is God; the other unto a passive and material cause, namely, the visible world: Moreover, he thought that the Denarie or Ten, was the absolute nature and perfection of numbers; for that all men, as well Greeks as Barbarians, count untillten, and when they be thither come, they returne backe againe unto unitie: over and besides hee said: That all the power of ten, confifted within fower, and in a quaternarie; the reason is this: that if a man begin at one, and reckon on ftill, numbring upright unto foure, hee shall make up ten; surpasse 50 he once the quaternarie, he is gone beyond the denarie; as for example; one and two make three, three thereto arise to fixe, put thereto foure, and you have ten: insomuch as number collected by unities, resteth in ten; but the force and puissance thereof lighth in soure. The Pythagoreans therefore were wont to sweare by the quaternario or numbers of foure, which they held to be the greatest oath that they could take, as appeareth by this Distiction:

amitie and enmitie, of which, the one hath puissance to unite, the other to dissolve: and these be his words:

Foure seeds and rootes of all things that you see, Now listen first, and hearken what they be: Lord Jupiter with his ignipotence, And lady Junoes vitall influence, Rich Pluto, and dame Neitis weeping ay, Who with her teares, our feed-four fe weets alway.

By Jupiter hee meaneth fierie heat, and ardent skie; by Juno giving life, the aire; by Pluto, the earth; by Nessis and this humane fountaine of naturall feed, water.

SOCRATES the sonne of Sophroniseus, and PLATO the sonne of Ariston, both Athenians, (for the opinions of them both, concerning the world and all things therein, be the same) have set downe three principles, God, Matter, and Idea, that is to say, Forme: God is an univerfall spirit or Minde: Matter is the first and principall subject of generation and corruption: Idea, an incorporall fubstance, resting in the thoughts and cogitations of God, which God; is the generall foule and intelligence of the world.

ARISTOTELES of Stagira the sonne of Nichomachus, hath put downe for Principles these three, to wit, a certaine forme called Eutelettus, Matter, and Privation: for elements, foure, and for a fifth Quintessence, the heavenly bodie which is immutable.

ZENO the some of Manseas, a Citican borne, holdeth for two principles, God and Mtater. 20 whereof the one is an active and efficient cause, and the other passive; and besides, source elements.

CHAP. IIII.

How the the world was framed?

"His world then, became composed & formed in a round figure, bending and coping after this manner: those Atomes or indivisible bodies, having an accidentatie and inconsiderate motion, stirring continually, and most strictly, happen many of them to encounter one another and meet together; in which regard they differ in figures and magnitudes; now when they are thus gathered and heaped up together in one, the greater fort of them, and fuch as were 30 most ponderous, settled altogether downeward; as many of them as were small, round, even, fmooth, and flipperie, those being beaten upon by the encounter of these weightie bodies, were repulsed, driven backe, and forced upward; but when that force which drave them alost began to faile, and gave over once to fend them up higher, not being able to fall downward againe; for that they were empeached, they were of necessitie enforced to retire into those places which were able to receive them: to wit, such as were round about them; unto which, a mightic number of bodies being wound together in an heape, and by meanes of the repercuffion, enterlaced one within another, they engendred and brought forth the heaven; and afterwards others of the same nature; yet of divers formes (as hath been said before) being likewise driven up alost, accomplished the nature of Stars. Moreover, the multitude of those bodies yeelding a vapour 40 and exhalation, did beat forward and drive the aire; which by flitting and motion, being converted into wind, and comprising therewith the Starres, turned them about with it; and so maintaine unto this day, that revolution which they have aloft. Of those bodies then, which setled below, was made the earth; and of fuch as mounted on high, the heaven, the fire, and the aire: but round about the earth, by occasion that there was much matter yet left, and the same incrasfate and thickned, by the forcible driving of the winds, and the breathing of the starres: all that part thereof which was more fubtile, and of a thinner forme and confiftance, gathered round together, and engendred the element of water, which being of a liquid, and flowing nature ran downward to holow places lying low, which were able to receive and hold them: or else the water of it selfe where it stated and rested, made concavities and hollow places underneath. Thus 50 you fee after what manner the principall parts of the world were first engendred and made.

Whether All be one?

He STOIKE Philosophers held opinion that the world was one, which they called my, That is to fay, All, and the same of corporall substance. EMPEDOCLES

EMPEDOCLES affirmed, that the world indeed was one; but All and the world, were not both one: for the world quoth he, is but a small portion of All: and as for the rest beside, it is but an

PLATO proveth his opinion, that the world is but one, by conjecture; and gueffeth All to be one, by three prefumptions or probable arguments. First, for that otherwise the world were not perfect and accomplished, if it comprised not All within it felfe. Secondly, it should not be like unto the pattern, if it were not one and uniforme. Thirdly, it would not be incorruptible, in case there were any thing without it. But wee are to answere Plate and say against him, that the world is perfect, although it comprehend not all things: for man is perfect c-10 nough, and yet all things benot comprised in him. Moreover, there be many examples drawn from one pattern, as we may see in statues, houses, and pictures: and how is it persect, if any thing may turne without it? Finally, incorruptible neither is it, nor can it be, confidering it had a be-

Ms TRODORUS faith: That as it were an abfurd and impertinent speech to say, that in a great field there grew but one care of corne; so it were as strange a matter, that in this infinitic there should be but one world: and that there be in number infinite, it appeareth by this, that there be causes infinite: for if the world were finite, and all the causes infinite whereof it is made, it cannot chuse but of necessitie there should be likewise infinite: for where all the causes be, there must needs the effects follow: now the causes of the world, be either these Atomes or the

CHAP. VI.

From whence it came that Men had the notion of God?

"He Stoicke Philosophers define the Effence of God in this wife;namely, To be a spirit full 1 of intelligence, and of a fiery nature, having no forme, but transforming himselfe into whatfoever he will, and refembling all things. The notion and apprehension men had of him, first, by conceiving the beautie of those things which are object to their eies : for no beauti-30 full thing harh beene made by chaunce, and ar adventure, but composed & framed by some ingenious and operative Art: now that the heaven is beautifull, it appeareth by the forme, colour, and bigneffe thereof, by the varietie also of the starres disposed therein: moreover, the world is round in manner of a Ball, which figure of all other is principall and most perfect, for it alone resembleth all the parts; for being round it selfe, it hath the parts likewise round. For this cause Plato said, That our mind and reason (the most divine part of man) is lodged and seated in the head, which commeth neere unto a round figure: as for the colour, it is faire and lovely; for it flandeth upon the azure or blew, which being more darke than purple, hath notwithflanding a bright and resplendent qualitie, in such fort, as by the exceeding strength of that lightfome hew, it cutteth and pierceth thorow fo great an intervall and spaciousnesse of the aire, 40 as it may be evidently seene in so mightie a distance: in regard also of the greatnesse thereof, it is right beautifull; for; of all things that be of one and the fame kinde, that which invitoneth and conteineth the reft, is ever fairest; as we may see in a living creature, and a tree: besides, to confummate and accomplish the beautie of the world, there be the celestiall signes which appeare unto our cie; for the oblique circle of the Zodiake, is embelished with twelve divers and sundry

Befides an innumerable fort of other configurations of starres, which God hath made in the like arches and rotundities of the world; whereupon Euripides wrote thus:

The starrie splendour of the skie, which Leiver some do call, The woondrous worke of that most wife

Thus then we apprehended hecreby, the notion of God; for the sunne, the moone, and other Greatour, Lord of all. starres, after they have performed the course of their revolutions under the earth, come to rise againe all like in colour, equall in bigneffe, and reteining alwaies still the same places and times: whereupon, they who deliver unto us the maner of Gods service and worship, declare the same 10 unto us after three forts; the first, naturall; the second, fabulous; and the third, civill; that is to fay, restified by the statutes and ordinances of every city and State: the naturall is taught by philosophers; the fabulous, by poets; the civill and legall, by the customes of ech citie: but all this doctrine and maner of teaching, is divided into feven forts; the first confisteth in the celestiall bodies, appearing aloft in heaven; for men had an apprehention of God, by starres that thew above, seeing how they are the causes of great symphonic and accord, and that they keepe a certeine constant order of day and night, of Winter and Summer, of rifing and setting, yea, and among those living creatures and fruits, which the earth beneath bringeth forth: whereupon, it hath bene thought, that heaven was the father, and earth, the mother to thele; for that the powring downe of howers and raine feemed in flead of naturall feeds, and the earth as a mother, to 20 conceive and bring the same forth. Men also, seeing and considering the starres alwaies Storres, that is to fay, holding on their course, and that they were the cause that we did sweet, that is to fay, beholde and contemplate: therefore they called the funne and moone, &cc. Stile, that is to fay, gods, of the word 340, that is to fay, to run, and 340/40, that is to fay, to behold. Now they range the gods into a fecond and third degree; namely, by dividing them into those that be profitable, and tuch as are hurtfull, calling the good and profitable, Japater, Juno, Mercurie, and Ceres; but the noisome and hurtfull, mores, that is to say, maligne spirits, seerous, that is to say, furies, and Ares, that is to fay, Mars, whom they detelled, as badde and violent, yea, and devifed meanes to appeare and qualifie their wrath. Moreover, the fourth and fifth place and degree, they attributed unto affaires, passions and affections; namely, love, Venus, luft or defire: and as 30 for affaires, they had hope, jultice, good policie and equitie. In the fixth place, be those whom the poets have fained; for Hefodus being minded to let downe a father for the gods begotten and engendred, devised and brought in such progenitors as these, whereupon, all this kind is named Fabulous. But in the seventh place, are those who were adorned with divine honors, in regard of the great benefits and good deeds done unto the common life of mankind, although they were begotten and borne after the maner of men; and tuch were Hercules, Caftor, Pollux, and Bacehus; and thefe, they faid, had an humane forme: for that as the most noble and excellent nature of all, is that of gods; so of living creatures, the most beautiful, 40 is man, as adorned with fundry vertues above the relt, and fimply the belt, confidering the conflitution of his minde and foule: they thought it therefore meet and reasonable, that those who had done best, and performed most noble acts, resembled that which was the most beautiful and excellent of all other.

CHAP. VII.

What is God?

Ome of the philosophers, and namely, Diagor as of the isle of Melos, Theodor as the Cyrenze-Dan, and Euemer to of Teges, held resolutely, that there were no gods. And verily, as touching 50 Euemerus, the poet Callimachus of Cyrene, writeth covertly in Iambique verles, after this maner:

الم atroupe, into that chapell go, Without the walles, the city not far re fro; Whereas sometime that old vain-clorious affe, When as he had she image cast in broffe, Of Jupiter, proceeded for to write Those wicked books, which shame was to indite. Opinions of Philosophers.

And what books were they? even those, wherein he discoursed that there were no gods at all. And Euripides the tragaedian poet, although he durft not discover & fet abroad in open tearnies the same, for feare of that high court and councell of areopagus, yet he signified as much, in this maner; for he brought in Sifyphus as the principall authour of this opinion, and afterwards, favourizeth even that sentence of his, himselfe; for thus he saith:

The time was, when the life of man was rude, And as wilde beafts, with reason not endu'd, Disordinate, when wrong was done alway, As might and force in ech one bare the fway.

10 But afterwards, these enormities were laied away, and put downe, by the bringing in of lawes: howbeit, for that the law was able to repreffe injuries and wicked deeds, which were notorious and evidently seene, and yet many men notwithstanding, offended and finned secretly; then fome wife man there was , who confidered and thought with himfelfe , that needfull it was alwaies, to blindfold the trueth with fome devifed and forged lies, yea, and to perswade men, that AGod there is, who lives immortally,

Who heares, who sees, and knowes all woondrousty.

For away (quoth he) with vaine dreames and poeticall fictions, together with Callimach w, who faith:

If God thou knowest, wot well, his power divine, All things can well performe, and bring to fine.

For God is not able to effect all things: for fay there be a God, let him make fnow, blacke, fire, cold, him that fittethor lieth, to fland upright, or the contrary at one inflant: and even Plato himselfe, that speaketh so bigge, when he faith: That God created and formed the world to his owne pattern and likeneffe, finelleth heerein very strongly of some old *dotards soolerie: to *sourcesspeake according to the poets of the old comedie: For how could hee looke upon himselfe in forto. stri-(quoth he) to frame the world according to his owne fimilitude? of how hath he made it round keth m No. b. in manner of a globe, being himfelfe lower than a man?

ANAXAGORAS is of opinion, that the first bodies in the beginning stood still and stirred not: but then the minde and understanding of God, digested and aranged them in order, yea

30 and effected the generations of all things in the univerfall world. PLATO is of a contrary mind, faying: That there first bodies were not in repose but that they moved confutedly and without order: whereuppon God (quoth he) knowing that order was much better than disorder and confusion, disposed all these things; but as well the one as the other have hecrein faulted in common; for that they imagined and devifed, that God was entangled and encumbred with humane affaires; as also that he framed the world in regard of man, and for the care that he had of him: for furely (living (as he doth) happy & immortal, a complifhed with all forts of good things, and wholly exempt from all evill, as being altogether imploied and given to prefer and mainteine his owne bearitude and immortallity) he intermedleth not in the affaires and occasions of men; for so he should be as unhappy and miserable as some artizan, 40 mason or labouring workman, bearing heavie burdens travelling and sweting about the sabrick of the world Againe this god of who they speake, of necessity either was not before the creation of the world, at what time as those first bodies lay still unmoveable, or stirred consusedly; or else if he were before, he either flept or watched, or did neither the one nor the other: but as the former of these we may not admit, for that God is eternall; so the latter we cannot confesse: for if and this vicinity to death, are much distant a funder and cannot stand both together: but if wee fay, that God was awake all that while; either he was defectuous in his bleffed state of felicity; or els he enjoyed the same complet : but in the first condition God is not happy; for what lo-50 ever wanteth ought offelitity cannot be happy ; and verily in the second state he is not better: for if he were detective in nothing before, to what purpose busied he himselfe in such vaine enterprises? moreover if there be a God, and that by his prudent care, mens affaires be governed, how commeth it to paffe that wicked men profeer in the world, and finde fortune their indulgent mother, but the good and honelf fuffer the contrary, and feele her to be a curft stepdame? for king Agamemnon, as the poet faith,

God slept from all eternity and time out of minde, he was no better than dead; for what is eternal fleep, other than death? but firely God is not fubject to death: for the immortallity of God, was by an adulterer and adulteresse furprised and murdered trecherously: and Hereules one of his race and kinted, after he had tidde and purged the life of man from so many monsters that troubled his reposewas possened by Deianeira, and so by indirect meanes lost his life.

Aprinceriohi goood and gracious, A knight withall most valourous.

THALES faith, that God is the foule of the world.

ANAXIMANDER is of opinion, that the starres be celestiall gods.

DEMOCRITUS is perswaded, that God is a minde of a fierie nature, and the foule of the world.

PYTHAGORAS affirmeth, that of the two first principles, Unitie was God, and the soveraigne good; which is the very nature of one, and is Understanding it selfe: but the indefinite binatic, is the divell and evill, about which is the multitude materiall, and the visible world.

SOCRATES and PLATO doe hold, that he is one and of a fimple nature, begotten and borne of himselfealone, truly good: All which tearmes and attributes, tend unto a Minde: fo that, this minde is God, a forme separate apart, that is to say, neither mingled with any matter, nor entangled and joined with any thing passible whatsoever.

ARISTOTLE supposeth, that this supreme God is an abstract forme, seeled upon the round sphere of the universall world, which is an heavenly and celestiall body, and therefore tearmed by him, the sisth body or quinta essentia: which celestial body being divided into many spheres coherent by nature, but separate and distinct by reason and understanding, hee thinketh each of these spheres to be a kinde of animal, composed of body, and soule, of which twaine, the bodie is celestiall, mooving circularly; and the soule, reason, unmooveable in itselfe, but the cause 20 in effect of motion.

The Stoicksteach after a more generall manner, and define God, to be a working and artificiall fire, proceeding methodically and in order to the generation of the world, which comprehended in it felfe all the fipermaticall proportions and reasons of feed; according to which every thing by statall destinie, is produced and commeth foorth: also to be a spirit piercing and spreading through the whole world; howbeit, changing his denomination throughout the whole matter, as it passed by transition from the one to the other: Semblably that the world is God, the states likewise and the earth, yea, and the supreme minde above in heaven.

Finally, Epicurus conceiveth thus of the gods, that they all have the forme of man, and yet be perceptable onely, by reason and cogitation, in regard of the subtile parts, and fine nature 30 of their imaginative figures: he also affirmeth, that those other foure natures in generall be incorruptible, to wit, the atomes, vacuitie, infinitie, and resemblances, which also be called semblable parcels and elements.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Demons and demy-gods, otherwise named, Heroes.

To this treatile of the gods, meet it is to adjoine a discourse as touching the nature of Demones and Herees.

THALES, PYTHAGORAS, PLATO, and the STOICKS, hold that these Dæmons be spirituall substances: and the Heroes soule separate from their bodies; of which fort, there be good and bad: the good Heroes are the good soules, and the bad Heroes the bad soules; but EFICURUS admitteth none of all this.

CHAP. IX.

Of Matter.

Matter is the first and principall subject exposed to generation, corruption, and other mu- 50 trains.

The Sectaries of Thales and Pythagoras, together with the Stoicks, doe fay, that this Matter, is variable, mutable, alterable and fluxible, all wholly thorow the universall world. The disciples and followers of Democratus are of opinion, that the first principles be impassible; to wit, the small indivisible bodie, Atomos, Voidnesse, and Incorporall.

ARISTOTLE and PLATO doe holde, that Matter is corporall, without forme, shape, significant qualitie, in the owne nature and propertie; but when it hathreceived formes once, it becommeth becommeth (as it were) a nurse, a molde, pattern, and a mother. They who set downes for this Matter, water, earth, fire or aire, do not say, that now it is without forme; but that it is a very bodie: but such as affirme, that these Atomes and indivisible bodies be the said Matter, make it altogether formelesse.

CHAP. X.

Of Idea.

Dea is a bodileffe fubftance, which of it felfe hath no fubfiftence, but giveth figure and forme to fhapeleffe matters, and becommeth the very cause that bringeth them into shew and evidence.

SOCRATES and PLATO suppose, that these Idea bee substances separate and distinct from Matter, howbeit, substisting in the thoughts and imaginations of God, that is to say, of Minde and Understanding.

Arts to the admitteth verily these formes and Idea, howbeir, not separate from matter, as being the patterns of all that which God hath made.

The Stoicks, fuch as were the scholars of Zeno, have delivered, that our thoughts and conceits were the Idea.

CHAP. XI.

Of Causes.

A Caufe is that whereupon dependent or followeth an effect, or by which any thing hap-

Plano hath fet downe three kinds of Causes, and those are diftinguished by these tearmes; By which, Of which, and For which; but he taketh the most principall to be that, By which; that is to say, the efficient cause, which is the minde or understanding.

PYTHAGORAS and ARISTOTLE do hold, that the principall Causes be incorporall; and as for other Causes, either by participation or by accident, they are of a corporal substance: and so the world is a bodie.

30 But the Stoicks are of opinion, that all Causes are corporall, inasmuch as they be spirits.

CHAP. XII

Of Bodies.

A Bodie is measurable, and hath three dimensions, length, bredth and depth or thicknesses. Or thus: A Bodie is a masse that resisteth, touching naturally of itselfe; or that which occupieth a place.

PLATO faith, that a Body is neither heavie nor light of it felfe naturally, folong as it abideth in the owne proper place; but being once in a strange place, it hath first an inclination, and up-40 on it a motion and impulsion, either to weight or lightnesse.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that earth fimply is most ponderous, and fire lightest: that aire and water be of a middle or doubtfull nature betweene both, sometime heavie and otherwhiles light.

The Storens hold, that of the four elements, two be light; namely, Fire and Aire; other two be heavie; to wit, Water and Earth: for, light is that, which of the owne nature, and not by any compulfion or infligation remove th from the proper middle where it is: heavy also is that, which naturally tendeth to the faid middle; but the middle it selfe; is in no wise heavie.

EPICURUS faith, that Bodies are not comprehensible; that the first Bodies be simple; but all the compositions of them have their weight and ponderositie: also, that the ATOMES doe 50 move, some plumbe right downe; others, at one side; and some againe, mount alost, and that by impulsion and concussion.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the smallest Bodies.

EMPRDOCLES is of opinion, that before the foure elements, there were certeine small parcels or fragments, as one would say, elements before elements 3 and those were of semblable parts, and the same all round.

HERACLITUS

HERACLLIUS cometh in with (Iknow not what) petie scrapings or shavings, exceeding small, and the same not divisible into parts.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of Figures.

A Figure is the superficies, circumscription, and accomplished lineament of a bodie.

The PYTHAGOREANS affirme, that the bodies of the source elements be of a sphericke or round figure; onely the highest of them (to wit, fire) is pyramidall, or sharpe pointed 10 above.

CHAP. XV.

Of Colours.

A Colour is the visible qualitie of a bodie.

The Pythagoreans called Colour, the outward superficies of the bodie.

Empedocles defined it to be that which is sit and agreeable to the waies and passages of the fight. PLATO faith, it is a flame sent from bodies, having certaine parcels proportionable to the 20

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning the Section of Bodies.

He fecturies of Thales and Pythagonas, are of opinion, that bodies bee paffible and divisible infinitely.

DEMOCRITUS and EFICURUS hold, that this fection stateth either at the Atomes indivisible, or at those small bodies which have no parts, neither doth this division (say they) passe infinitely.

ARISTOILE faith, that divided they be in infinitum, potentially, but actually not.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Mixture and Temperature.

He auncient philosophers affirme, that this mixture of Elements is by way of alteration: but ANAXAGORAS and DEMOCRITUS, say, sit is done by apposition.

EMPEDOCLES composeth the Elements of smaller massles, which he supposeth to be the least bodies, and as a man would say, the Elements of Elements.

PLATO would have the threebodies (for hee deigneth not them, either to be called or to be, Elements) to be convertible one into the other, to wit, water, aire, and fire: but as for the earth, it cannot be turned into any one of them.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Voidnesse or Vacuntie.

The naturall philosophers of Thalbs his schoole, all untill you come to Plato, have generally disavowed and reprooved this Vacuitie: As for Empedocles thus he writeth:

In all the world so spacious,

Nought is void or superfluous.

Leucippus

LEUCIPPUS, DEMOCRITUS, DEMERRIUS, METRODORUS, and EPICURUS, hold, that the Atomes be infinit in multitude, and Voidnesse infinit in magnitude.

The STOICES affirme, that within the world there is no Voidnesse, but without there is infinitie.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that without the world there is no fuch Voidnesse, as that the heaven by the meanes thereof, may draw breath, for that it is of the nature of fire.

Of Place.

PLATO faith, that Place is that which is fusceptible of formes, one after another, which is by way of Metaphor or translation, to expresse the first matter, as a nurse receiving and embracing all.

ARISTOTLE taketh Place to be the extreame superficies of the continent, conjunct and contiguous to the content.

CHAP. XX.

Of Roome or Space.

THE STOTERS, and EPICURUS doe holde, that there is a difference betweene Voidnesse, and Roome: for Voidnesse (say they) is the solitude or vacuitie of a body: Place, that which is fully occupied and taken up with a body: but Roome or Space, that which is occupied but in part; as we may see in a rundlet or barrell of wine.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Time.

30 PYTHAOORAS faith, that Time is the sphære of that utmost heaven that comprise hall.
PLATO thinkethis to be the mooveable image of the exernitie, or the intervall of the worlds motion: but ERATOSTHENES affirmeth it to be the course of the sunne.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Effence of Time.

PLATO faith, that the Effence of Time is the mooving of heaven: but many of the Stotons hold it, to be the mooving it felte; and most of them affirme, that Time had no be-40 ginning of generation.

PLATO is of opinion, that engendred it is according to our conceit and capacitie.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Motion.

PYTHAGORAS and PLATO affirme, that Motion is a certeine difference and alteration in matter.

ARISTOTLE giveth out, that it is the actual operation of that which is mooveable.

50 DEMOCRITUS faith, that there is but one kinde of Motion, to wit, that which tendeth obliquely.

EPICURUS maintaineth twaine, the one direct and plumbe, the other fide-long.

EROPHILUS is of opinion, that there is one Motion perceptible in realon, and another

EROPHILUS is of opinion, that there is one Motion perceptible in reason, and another object to sense naturall.

HERACLITUS excluded all flation, reft and repose out of the world: For this (quoth hee) belongeth unto the dead, but perpenual Motionagreeth to eternall substances; and perishable Motion to substances corruptible.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of Generation and Corruption.

P ARMENIDES, MELISSUS, and ZENO, rejected wholy all Generation and Corrpution; for they thought the univerfall world to be unmooveable: but EMPEDOCLES and EPICURUS, and all those who held the world to be made of a masse and heape of small bodies hudled together, bring in and admit certeine concretions and diffipations; but in no wife Generations and Corruptions to Speake properly, saying, that these come not according to quali- 10 tic by way of alteration, but according to quantity by collection and heaping together.

PYTHAGORAS, and asmany as suppose matter to bee passible, hold, that there is properly indeed Generation and Corruption: for they fay that this is done by the alteration, mutation and resolution of the elements.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Necessitie.

HALES faith, that Necessities most potent and forcible, for it is that which ruleth the 20

PYTHAGORAS held, that the world was possessed and comapsied with Necessitie. PARMENIDES, and DEMOCRITUS were of opinion, that all things were made by Necessitie, and that destinie, justice, providence, and the Creatour of the world, were all one.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Essence of Nesessitie.

P Lay o referreth some events to providence, and others he attributeth to Necessitie. EMPEDOCLES faith, that the Effence of Necessitie is a cause apt to make use of the

* 20pail. fome principles and elements. rende obpar, Democritus affirmethit to be the reliftance, the * lation, motion, and permiffion of that is to fay, the matter.

PLATO holdeth it to be one while matter it felfe, and another while the habitude of that which is agent to the matter.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Destinie.

I ERACLITUS affirmeth, that all things were done by fatall Destinie, and that it and Necefficie be both one.

 $P_{\mbox{\scriptsize LAT}}$ o admitteth willingly this Destinic in the soules, lives, and actions of men; but hee inferreth withall a cause proceeding from our selves.

The STOICKES likewife according with the opinion of Plato, do hold, that Necessitie is a cause invincible, most violent and inforcing all things: also that Destinie is a connexion of causes interlaced & linked orderly: in which concatenation or chaine is therein comprised also that cause which proceedeth from us, in such fort as some events are destined, and others not.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the substance of Destinie.

TERACLITUS faith, that the substance of Destinie is the reason that pierceth throughout the fubitance of the univerfall worldgor has PLA TO affirmeth it to be an eternall reason, and a perpetual law of the nature of the whole world. CHRYS IPPUS

Sò

CHRYSIPPUS holdeth it to be a certaine puissance spirituall, which by order governeth and administreth all things. And againe in his booke of definitions hee writeth thus: Destinie is the reason of the world, or rather the law of all things in the world, administred and governed by providence: or elfe the reason whereby things past, have beene; things present, are; and future things, thall be.

The STOICKES are of opinion that it is the chaine of causes, that is to say, an order and connexion, which cannot be furmounted and transgressed Posidonius supposeth it to be the third after Jupiter : for that Jupiter is in the sirt degree; Nature in the second; and fatall Destinie in the third.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of Fortune.

P Laro defineth Fortune to be (in things proceeding from mans counfell and election) a cause by accident, and a verie casual consequence

ARISTOTLE holdeth it to be an accidentall cause in those things which from some deliberate purpose and impulsion tend to a certaine end, which cause is not apparent, but hidden and uncertaine. And he putteth a difference between Fortune and rash adventure: for that all Fortune in the affaires and actions of this world is adventurous: but everie adventure is not by and 20 by Fortune; for that it confifteth in things without action: againe, Fortune is properly in actions of reasonable creatures; but adventure, indifferently in creatures, as well unreasonable as reasonable, yea, and in those bodies which have neither life nor soule.

E PICURUS faith, that Fortune is a cause, which will not stand and accord with persons, times, and manners.

ANAXAGORAS and the Stoicks affirme it to be a cause unknowne, and hidden to humane reason: for that some things come by necessitie, others by fatall destinie; some by deliberate counsell, others by Fortune, and some againe by casualitie or adventure.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Nature,

MPEDOCIES holdeth that Nature is nothing; only that there is a mixture and divultion. or separation of Elements: for in this manner writteh he in the first booke of his Phisicks:

This one thing more I will yet say, of things that be humane And Mortall, mature none there is. and deaths end is but vaine. Amixture and divulsion, of Elements and of all,

Onely there is, and thu is that, which men do Nature call.

Semblably ANAXAGORAS faith, that Nature is nothing else but a concretion and diffipation: that is to fay, generation and corruption.

CHAP. I.

Of the World.

PYTHAOORAS was the first who called the Roundle that containeth and comprehendeth all, to wit, the World. Kinglish: for the orderly digestion observed therein.

THALE s and his disciples held, that there is but one World. DEMOCRITUS, EPICURUS, and their scholler METRODORUS affirme, that there be innumerable Worlds in an infinite space according to all dimensions and circumstances.

EMPEDOCLES faith, that the course and race of the Sunne, is the verie circumscription of the bounds and limits of the World; and that it is the verie confinement thereof, SELEUCUS held the World to be infinite.

DIOGENES affirmed, the universalitie to be infinite: but the world finite and deter-

The Stoleks put a difference betweene univerfall and whole : for they fay, that the univerfall together with voidneffe is infinite; and that the whole without voidnes is the World: fo as these termes, the Whole and the World, be not both one.

CHAP. II.

Of the figure and forme of the World. "He S roces affirme the World to be round: fome fay it is pointed or pyramidal : others that it is falhioned in manner of an egge; but Epicukus holdeth, that his Worlds may be round, and it may be that they are apt befides to receive other formes.

CHAP. III.

Whether the World be animate, or endued with a foule.

 $LLother Philosophers \, agree, that \, the \, World is an imate, & \, governed \, by \, providence: but$ ADEMOCRITUS, EFICURUS, and as many as maintaine ATONES, and with all bring 30 in Vacuity, that it is neither animate, nor governed by providence, but by a certaine nature void of reason.

ARISTOTIB holdeth, that it is not animate wholy and throughout all parts; nor fentitive, nor reasonable, nor yet intellectual or directed by providence : True it is (quoth he) thatceleftiall bodies be capable of all these qualities, as being compassed about with sphæres both animate and vitall; whereas bodies terrestriall and approching necreunto the earth, are endued with none of them: and as for the order and decent composition therein, it came by accident, and not by prepented reason and counsell.

CHAP. IIII.

Whether the World be incorruptible and eternall. PYTHAGORAS and PLAYO affirme, that the world was ingendred and made by God; and of the ownenature (being corruptible) shall perish: for sensible it is, and therefore corporall; howbeit, in regard of the divine providence, which preferveth and mainteineth it, perifh it XENOPHANES holdeth the world to be eternall, ingenerable, uncreated and incorruptible. ARISTOTIL is of opinion, that the part of the world under the moone, is paffible; where- 50 in the bodies also adjacent to the earth, be subject to corruption.

Whereof the World is nourished. RISTOY LE saith, that if the World be nourished, it is likewise corruptible, and wil perish, A but fo it is, that it hath no need of nouritire, and so by consequence it is eternall.

PLAT 0 is of opinion, that the world yeeldeth unto it felfe nouriture of that which perisheth, PHILOLAUS affirmeth, that there is a two-folde corruption; one while by firefalling from heaven, and another while by water of the moone, powred foorth by the circumgyration and turning about of the aire; the exhalations whereof become the food of the world.

CHAP. VI.

At which element began God the fabricke of the world?

"He Naturalists doe holde, that the creation of the world began at earth, as the very center thereof; for that the beginning of a sphære or ball, is the center.

PYTHAGORAS faith, that it began at fire, and the fifth element.

EMPEDOCLES faith, that the first thing separate apart, was the skie or fifth essence, called Aether; the second, Fire; after which, the Earth; of which being thrust close and pressed together by the violence of revolution, sprang Water, from which Aire did evaporate : also, that heaven was made of that Skie or Quinteffence; the funne, of Fire; and of the other elements, were constipate and felted (as it were) terrestrial bodies, and such as be neere the earth.

PLATO is of opinion, that this visible world was formed to the molde and pattern of the in-20 tellectuall: that of the visible world, the soule was first made; and after it, that which is corpulent: that of the fire and earth, first; that which standeth of water and aire, second.

PYTHAGORAS affirmed, that of the five folid bodies, which are also called Mathematicall; the Cube (that is to fay, a square bodie, with fixe faces) went to the making of the earth; of the pointed Pyramis, was made fire; of Octoedra or folide bodie with eight bafes, the earth; of Icofiedra with twentie fides, the water; of Dodecaedra with twelve faces, the fupreame fphære of the univerfall world: and himfelfe herein also doth Pythagorize.

CHAP. VII.

Of the order of the worlds fabricke.

PARMENIDES imagineth certeine coronets (as it were) enterlaced one within another, fome of a rare fubstance, others of a thicke, and the fame mixed of light and darknesse betweene; also that the bodie which conteined them all together, was as firme and solid as a wall.

LEUCIPPUS and DEMOCRIRUS enwrapped the world round about with a tunicle or membrane.

EPICURUS held, that the extremitie of fome worlds were rare; of others thicke; and that of them, fome were moveable, others immoveable.

PLATO setteth downe Fire first; secondly, the Skie; then Aire; afterwards, Water; and 40 last of all, Earth; but otherwhiles, he conjoineth the Skie unto Fire.

ARISTOTLE rangeth in the first place, the impassible Aire, which is a certeine fifth bodie; and after it, the Elements paffible, to wit, Fire, Aire, Water, and Earth the laft: of all which, unto the celestial bodies he attributeth a circular motion; and (of the others situate beneath them) unto the lighter kinde, the afcent or rifing upward; unto the weightier, defcent or fetling down-

EMPEDOCLES is of opinion, that the places of the elements are not alwaies steadie and certeine, but that they all interchange mutually one with another.

CHAP. VIII.

What is the cause that the world bendethor copeth forward.

DIOGENES and ANAXAGORAS affirme, that after the world was made, and that living creatures were produced out of the earth, the world bowed (I wot not how) of it felfe, and of the owne accord, to the Southerne or Meridionall part thereof; haply by the divine providence fo ordering all, that fome parts of the world should be habitable, others inhabitable, according to exceffive colde, extreame heat, and a meane temperature of both.

EMPEDOCLES

EMPRDOCLES faith, that by reason that the aire gave place to the violence of the Sunne, the two Beares or Poles * bended, and inclined: as for those parts which were northerly, they * Artick and were elevated and mounted aloft; but the foutherne coasts were depressed and debated as much; and so accordingly the whole world.

CHAP. IX.

Whether without the world, there be any vacuitie?

"He schoole of Pythagoras holdeth that there is a voidnesse without the world, to which, to and out of which the world doth draw breath; but the Stoteks affirme that into it, the infinite world by way of conflagration is resolved.

POSIDONIUS admitteth no other infinitie, than as much as is sufficient for the dissolution

In the first booke of vacuitie, ARISTOTLE faith, there is voidnesse.

PLATO affirmeth, that there is no emprinesse at all, either without or within the world.

CHAP. X.

 $\mathbf{P}_{ ext{Weft}}^{ ext{YTHAGORAS},\, ext{PLATO}, ext{and }}$ Aristotle dotake the East for the right part, and the EMPEDOCLES faith, that the right fide bendeth toward the fummers Tropick; and the left toward the Tropick of winter.

CHAP. XI.

Of Heaven, and what is the substance thereof.

NAXIMENES affirmeth the exterior circumference of Heaven to be earthy. EMPEDOCLES faith, that Heaven is folid, being made of aire condenfate by fire, after the manner of chrystall; and that it conteineth the fierie and airie nature in the one and the other hemisphære.

ARISTOTLE holdeth, that Heaven is composed of the fifth body above fire, or else of the

CHAP. XII.

Of the division of Heaven: and namely into how many Circles it is divided.

T Hales, and Pythagoras with his followers doe fay, that the sphære of the whole Heaven is parted into five circles, which they call certeine Zones cinctures or girdles; of which circles, one is called the Arctick, and is alwaies to bee feene of us; a fecond the fummer Tropick; a third Aequinoctiall; the fourth, winter Tropick; and the fifth the Antartick circle: which is evermore unfeene: as atouching the oblique or crooked circle, called the Zodiacke, which lieth under the other three middle circles above named, it toucheth them all three as it passeth, and every of them are cut in right angles by the Meridian, which goeth from pole to pole.

PYTHAGORAS was the first (men say) that observed the obliquity of the Zodiack: which invention nevertheleffe Oenopides the Chian, ascribeth to himselfe, as if he were the authour 50 of it.

CHAP. XIII.

What is the substance of the Starres, and how they were made and composed.

THALES affirmeth them to be terrestriall, and nathlesse fieric and ardent. EMPEDOCLES holdeth them to be enflamed by that fire, which the skie conteining within it felfe, did violently strike and fend foorth at the first excretion. An AXAGOR AS faith, that the sky which environeth, is indeed of the owne effence of a fiery nature; but by the violent revolution of it felfe, fnatcheth up ftones from the earth, and fetting them on fire, they become Starres.

Opinions of Philosophers.

DIOGENES thinketh, that Starresbe of the substance of a pumish stone, as be being the breathing holes of the world: and againe, the same philosopher saith, that they bee certaine blinde-stones not apparent; howbeit, falling often to the earth, are there quenched, as it hapneth in a place called aiges moraculis, that is to fay, Goats rivers, where there fell sometime a stoneflarre in forme of fire.

10 EMPEDOCLES holdeth, that the fixed Starres which wander not, be fastned to the christall skie; but the planets are loofe and at liberty.

PLAT o giveth out, that for the most part they be of fire, and yet neverthelesse they participate with other elements in maner of glue or foder.

XENOPHANES is of opinion, that they confift of clouds inflamed, which not with flanding are quenched every day, & afterwards againe be fiered in the night in maner of coles: as for the riling and setting of Starres, they be nothing else but their catching fire and quenching.

HERACLYDES and the PYTHAGOREANS hold, that every Star is a world by it felfe, conteining an earth, an aire, and a skie, in an infinit celeftiall nature; and these opinions goe current in the verfes of Orpheus, for they make of every Starrea world. EPICURUS reprooverh 20 none of all this, but holdeth still that old note of his: It may so be.

CHAP. XIIII.

The forme and figure of Starres.

T He Stoicks say, that the Statres be sphæricke or round like as the world, the sunne and moone. CLEANTHES holdesh them to bee pointed and pytamidall. ANXIMENES faith, they sticke fast in the christalline skie, like a number of nailes. Others imagine that they be fierie plates, like unto flat pictures.

CHAP. XV. Of the order and situation of Starres.

VENOCRATES supposed that the Starres moove upon one and the same superficies: but other Stoicks affirme that there be some afore others in height and depth. DEMOCRITUS raungeth the fixed Starres first; next the planets; and after them, the funne, the moone, and the day-starre Lucifer.

PLATO after the fituation of the fixed Starres, fetteth in the first place that which is called 40 Phænon, to wit, the Starre of Saturne; in the second, Phaethon, which is the Starre of Jupiter; in the third, Pyroeis, that is to lay, fierie or ardent, and it is that of Mars; in the fourth Phofphorus, and that is Venus; in the fifth Stilbon, which is Mexewie; in the fixth, the Sunne; and laft, in the feventh, the Moone. From whence the Starres have their illumination METRODORUS thinketh, that all the fixed Starres have their light from the funne.

HERACLYTUS, and the Stoicks fay, that the Starres bee nourifhed by exhalations 10 arising from the earth.

 $A_{RISTOTLE}$ opineth, that the celestiall bodies need no nouriture, for that they are not corruptible but eternall.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the two Starres named Dioscuri, to wit, Castor and Pollux.

X ENOPHANES doth mainteine that the lights like Statres which appeere otherwhiles upon fhips, are thinne and fubrill clouds, which after a kinde of motion doe fhine. METRODORUS faith, they be certeine glittering sparkels glauncing and leaping out of their eies who behold them with feare and aftonishment.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the fignification of Starres, and how commeth winter and summer.

P Laro faith, that the tokens & fignifications both of Winter and Summer, proceed from the rifing and ferring of Suna Manager 1 the rifing and fetting of Sunne, Moone, and other Starres, as well fixed as wandring. ANAXIMENES faith, that none of all this is occasioned by the Moone, but by the Sunne 30 onely. Eudoxus and Ararus affirme them to bee in common, by meanes of all the Starres: and ARATUS sheweth as much in these verses:

These radiant starres, and lights so evident, As fignes, God hath fet in the firmament, Distinct, in great foresight, throughout the yeere, To fhem how all the feafons ordered were.

XENOPHANES holdeth, that there is a certeine gathering of small fires, which by occasion of moilt exhalations, meet together; and they all (being collected) make the bodie of the Sun, or els (quoth he) is a cloud fet on fire.

The STOICES fay, that the Sun is an inflamed body * intellectuall, or humour inflamed, 50 proceeding out of the fea.

PLATO imaginethit to confift of much fire;

ANAXAGORAS, DEMOCRITUS, and METRODORUS suppose it to be a masse of yeon, ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that it is a sphære out of the fifth body.

PHILOLAUS the Pythagorean, is perswaded that it is in maner of a glasse, receiving the reverberation of all the fire in the world, and transmitting the light thereof unto us (as it were) thorow a tannife or streiner, in such fort, as that sierie light in heaven resembleth the Sun: then that which proceedeth from it, is in forme of a mirrour : and thirdly, there is a splendour, which by way of reflexion from that mirrour, is fpread upon us: and this call we the Sun, as it were the image of an image.

EMPEDOCLES is of this minde, that there be two Sunnes, the one an original and primitive fire, which is in the other hemisphære of the world; and the same filling this hemisphære of ours, as being alwaies fituate full opposit to the reflexion of the resplendent light thereof: as for this that we fee, it is the light in that other hemisphære, replenished with aire mixed with heat, & the same isoccasioned by refraxion from the earth, that is more round, entring into the Sun, 10 which is of a Crystalline nature, and yet is trained and caried away together with the motion of that fire. But to speake more plainly and succincily in sewer words, this is as much to say, as the Sunne is nothing els, but the reflexion of that light of the fire which is about the earth.

EPICURUS imagineth the Sun to be a terrestriall spissitude or thicknesse, yet spungeous (as it were) and hollow in maner of a pumish stone, and in those holes lightned by fire.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Sunnes magnitude.

 $\mathbf{A}^{\mathrm{Naximander}}$ is of opinion, that the Sunne is equall in bigneffe to the earth; but the circle from which he hath his respiration, and upon which he is caried, is eight and twentie times bigger than the whole earth.

ANAXAGORAS faid, it was by many degrees greater than all Peloponne fus.

HERACLITUS held, that it was a mans foot broad.

EPICURUS againe affirmed, that all above faid might be; or that it was as bigge as it appeared to be, at least wife a little under or over.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Solfticies or Tropiques of the Sunne.

NAXIMENES thinketh that the Starres are beaten backe by the thicke aire, and the same Amaking refisfrance.

ANAXAGORAS faith, that they are occasioned by the repulse of the aire, about the Beares or Poles, which the Sunne himselfe (by thrusting and making thicke) causeth to be more pow-

EMPEDOCLES ascribeth the teason thereof to the sphere, that conteineth and impeacheth him from paffing farther; as also to the two Tropique circles.

DIOGENES imagineth, that the Sun is extinct by the cold, falling opposit upon the heat. The Srore is affirme, that the Sunne paffeth thorow the tract and space of his food and pafture lying under him, which is the Ocean fea or the earth, upon the vapours and exhalation whereof he feedeth.

PLATO, PYTHAGORAS and ARISTOTLE holde, that this is occasioned by the obliquitie of the Zodiacke circle, thorow which the Sunne paffeth biase; as also, by reason of the Tropicke circles, which environ and guard him about: and all this, the very sphære it selfe doth evidently shew.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of the Sunnes eclipse.

"HALES was the first who observed the Sunnes eclipse, and said, that it was occasioned by the Moone, which is of a terrestrial nature, when as in her race, she comment to be just and plumbe under him; which may be plainly seene as in a mirrour, by setting a bason of water ANAXIMANDER faid, that the Sun became eclipfed, when the mouth or tunnill (at which the heat of his fire commeth forth) is closed up.

 $H_{\text{HRACLITUS}}$ is of opinion, that this hapnesh, when the bodie of the Sun which is made like a boat, is turned upfide downe, so as the hollow part thereof is upward, and the keele downward to our fight.

XENOPHANES affirmeth, that this commeth by extinction of one Sun, & the riling of another againe in the East: he addeth moreover, and reporteth, that there is an eclipse of the Sun, during one whole moneth; as also one entire and universall eclipse, in such maner, as the day feemeth to be night.

Others ascribe the cause thereof, to the thickenesse of clouds, which suddenly and after an hidden maner, overcast the rundle and plate of the Sunne.

ARIST AR CHUS reckoneth the Sunne among the fixed Starres, faying, that it is the earth 20 which rollethand turneth round about the Sunnes circle, and according to the inclinations thereof, the Sunnes lightfome bodie commeth to be darkened by her shade.

XENOPHANES holdeth, that there be many Sunnes and Moones, according to the divers Climats, Tracts, Sections, and Zones of the earth: and at a certeine revolution of time, the rundle of the Sunne falleth upon some Climate or Section of the earth, which is not of us inhabited; and so marching (as it were) in some void place, he suffereth eclipse : he also affirmeth, that the Sun goeth indeed infinitly forward stil, but by reason of his huge distance and retract from us, feemeth to turne round about.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the Moones substance.

NNAXIMANDER faith, that the Moone is a circle, xix, times bigger than the earth, and like as that of the Sunne, full of fire; that the fuffereth eclipse when her wheele turneth: for that he faith, that circle relembleth the wheele of a chariot, the movature or felly whereof, is hollow and full of fire; howbeir, there is an hole or tunnell, out of which the fire doth exhale.

XENOPHANES faith, that the Moone is a thicke, compact, and felted cloud.

The STOICKS hold, that the is mixed of fire and aire.

PLATO affirmeth, that the standeth more of afferie substance.

ANAXAGORAS and DEMOCRITUS do hold, that the Moone is a folid and firmebodie all fiery, containing in it, champian grounds, mountaines and vallies.

HERACLITUS is of opinion that it is earth overspred with mists.

PYTHAGORAS also thinketh that the bodie of the Moone is of the nature of fire.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Moones magnitude.

He Storeks pronounce flatly that the Moone is bigger than the Earth, like as the ANTIPHON affirmeth, that the thineth with her owne light: and whereas the is otherwhiles hidden, it proceedeth from the opposition of the sunne; namely, when a greater fire commeth to darken a leffe, a thing incident to other flarres.

THALES and his followers hold, that the Moone is lightned by the funne.

HERACLITUS supposeth, that the case of the sunne and Moone is all one, for that both of 20 them being formed like a boat, and receiving moult exhalations, they feeme in our fight illuminate; the funne brighter of the twaine, for that he goeth in a more cleere and pure aire, and the Moone in that which is more troubled, which is the reason that she seemeth more darke and muddy.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the Moones Ecclipse.

 $\mathbf{A}^{ ext{NAXIMENES}}$ faith, that the Moone is Ecclipfed, when the mouth of venting hole Anaximumlet* whereout iffueth her fire, is flopped.

BEROSUS is of opinion, that it is when that face and fide of hers which is not lightned, turneth toward us.

HERACLITUS would have it to be, when the convexitie or swelling part of the boat which the doth represent, regardeth us directly.

Some of the PYTHAGOREANS doe holde the ecclipse of the Moone to be partly a reverberation of light, and in part an obstruction; the one in regard of the earth, the other of the Antipodes, who tread opposite unto us. But the moderne writers are of opinion, that it is by occasion of the augmentation of the Moones stame, which regularly and by order is lightned by little and little, untill it represent unto us the full face of the Moone, and againe doth diminish and wane in proportion, untill the conjunction, at what time it is altogether extinct.

40 PLATO, ARISTOTLE, the STOICES, and MATHEMATICINAS, do all with one accord fay, that the occultations of the Moone every moneth, are occasioned by reason that she falleth in conjunction with the funne; by whose brightnesse the becommeth dimme and darkned: but the Ecclipses of the Moone be cansed when the commeth within the shadow of the earth, situate directly betweene both Starres, rather for that the Moone is altogether obstructed therewith.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the Moones apparition, and why she seemeth to be earthly.

He Pythagoreans affirme, that the Moone appeareth terrestriall, for that she is I inhabited round about, like as the earth wherein we are, and peopled as it were with the greatest living creatures, and the fairest plants; and those creatures within her, be fifteene times ftronger and more puiffant than those with us, and the same yeeld foorth no excrements, and the * day there, is in that proportion fo much longer.

ANAXAGORAS faith, that the inequalitie which is feene in the face of the Moone, pro-reade wires, that is to fay, ceedeth from the coagmentation of cold and terrestring mixed together, for that there is a $\frac{max}{n}$ certaine tenebrositie medled with the fierie nature thereof: whereupon this starre is said to be Pseudophores, that it to fay, to have a false light.

The STOICES are of opinion, that by reason of the diversitie of her substance, the composition of her bodie is not subject to corruption.

CHAP. I.

Of the Milke way or white circle Galaxia.

His Galaxia is a cloudie or miltie circle, appearing alwaies in the skie; and called it is the Milke way, of the white colour which it doth represent.

Of the Pythagoreans some say, it is the inflammation or burning out of some starre remooved, and falling out of his proper place, which hath burnt round about all the way as it paffed, from the verietime of Phaethon his conflagration.

Others hold, that in old time the race and course of the Sun was that way. Some are of opinion, that it is a specularie apparition, only occasioned by the reflexion of the Sun-beames against the cope of heaven, even as we observe it to fall out betweene the rainbow and thicke clouds.

METRODORUS affirmeth it to be caused by the passage of the Sunne: for that this is the so-

PARMENIDES is of opinion that the mixture of that which is thicke, with the rare or thin, engendreth this milkie colour. ANAXAGORAS

A NAX AGOR AS faith, that the shadow of the earth resteth upon this part of heaven, at what time as the Sunne being underneath the earth, doth not illuminate all throughout,

DEMOCRITUS is perswaded, that it is the resplendent light of many small starres, and those close together, shining one upon another, and so occasioned by their spissing and astriction.

ARISTOTLE would have it to be an inflamation of a drie exhalation; the fame being great in quantitie and continued: and so there is an hairy kind of fire under the skie, and beneath the POSSED ONEUS Supposethit to be a confishence of fire, more cleere and subtile than a starre, and yet thicker than a splendeur or shining light.

CHAP. II.

Ome of Pythagoras scholars affirme, that a Comet is a starre of the number of those Which appeare not alwaies, but at certaine prefixed feafons after some periodicall revolution

Others affirme it to be the reflexion of our fight against the Sunne, after the manner of those 20 refemblances which shew in mirrours or looking glasses.

ANAXAGORAS and DEMOCRITUS fay, that it is a concurse of two starres or more mecting with their lights together.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that it is a confishence of a drie exhalation enflamed.

STRATO faith, that it is the light of a starre enwrapped within a thick cloud, as we see it ordinarily in our lamps and burning lights.

HERACLIDES of PONTUS holdeth it to be a cloud heaved and elevated on high, and the fame illuminated by fome high light alfo : and the like reason giveth he of the bearded blazing flar called Pagonias. Others (like as all the Perepateticks) affirme, that the beame, the columne, and fuch other meteors or impressions are made after the same manner by divers congurations 30 of clouds in the aire.

EPIGENES supposeth a Cometto be an elevation of spirit or wind mixed with an earthly Substance, and set on fire.

BORTHUS imagineth it to be an apparition of the aire, let loofe as it were, and spred at large,

DIOGENES is perfwaded that Comets be starres. ANAXAGORAS faith, that the starres which are said to shoot, be as it were sparckles falling from the elementarie fire: which is the cause that they are quenched and gone out so quickly. METRODORUS supposeth, that when the Sunne striketh violently upon a cloud, the beames or raies thereof do sparkle, and so cause this shooting of starres as they tearme it.

XENOPHANES would beare us in hand, that all fuch Meteors and Impressions as these, be 40 conflictions or motions of clouds enflamed.

CHAP. III.

Of shunders, lightnings flashes, presters or fierie blastes, and tempstuous whirlwinds.

WAXIMANDER supposeth, that all these come by wind: for when it hapneth that it is A conceived & inclosed within a thicke cloud, then by reason of the subtilitie and lightnesse thereof, it breaketh forth with violence: and the rupture of the cloud maketh a cracke; and the divultion or cleaving, by reason of the blacknesse of the cloud, causeth a shining light.

METRODORUS faith, when awind chanceth to be enclosed within a cloud gathered thick and close together, the faid windby bursting of the cloud maketh a noise; and by the stroke and breach it shineth; but by the quicke motion catching heat of the Sunne, it shooteth forth lightning; but if the faid lightning be weake, it turneth into a Prester or burning blase.

ANAXAGORAS is of opinion, that when ardent heat falleth upon cold, that is to fay, when a portion of celestial fire lighteth upon the airie substance; by the cracking noise therof is caused thunder; by the colour against the blacknesse of the cloud, a slashing beame; by the plentie and greatnesse of the light, that which we call lightning : and in case the fire be more grosse and corpulent, there arifeth of it a whirlwind; but if the same be of a cloudie nature, it engendreth a burning blaft called Prefter.

The STOICES hold thunder to be a combat, and finiting together of clouds: that a flathing beame, is a fire or inflammation proceeding from their attrition: that lighning is a more violent flashing, and Prester, lesse forcible.

ARISTOTLE supposeth, that all these meteores come likewise of a dry exhalation, which being gotten enclosed within a moist cloud, seeketh meanes, and striveth forcibly to get foorth; now by attrition and breaking together, it caufeth the clap of thunder; by inflammation of the drie substance, a flashing beame; but Presters, Typhons, that is to say, burning blasts and whirlwindes, according as the store of matter is, more or lesse, which the one and the other draweth zo toit; but if the same be hotter, you shall see Prester, if thicker, looke for Typhon.

Of the Rainbow.

Mong those meteors or impressions engendred in the aire, some there be which have A a true substance indeed, as raine and haile: others againe, have no more but a bare appa- 30 rence, without any reall substitence, much like as when we are within a ship, we imagine that the continent and firme land doth moove: and among those which are in apparence onely, we must range the Rainbow, Plato faith, that men derive the genealogic of it from Thaumas, as one would fay, from wonder, because they marvelled much to see it according as Homer sheweth in this verse:

Like as when mightie Jupiter the purple rainbow bends, Thereby to mortall men from heaven, a wondrow soken sends, Which either tempe st sterrible, or wofull warre pretends.

And hereupon it is, that fome have made thereof a fabulous device, and given out, that fhehaving a bulles head, drinketh up the rivers. But how is this Rainbow ingendred, and how commeth it to to appeare? Certes, we fee by lines, either direct and streight, or crooked, or els rebated and broken; which though they be obscure, and appeare not evidently, yet are perceived by cogitation and discourse of reason, as being bodilesse. Now by rightlines we beholde things, fome in the aire, and others thorow transparent stones and hornes; for that all these consist of very subtile parts: by crooked and curbed lines, wee looke within the water; for our eie sight doth bend and turne againe perforce, by reason that the matter of the water is more thicke; which is the cause, that we fee the mariners oare in the fea a farre off, as it were crooked. The third maner of feeing, is by refraction, and so we beholde objects in mirrours; and of this fortis the Rainbow: for we must consider and understand, that a most vapour being listed up alost, is converted into a cloud; and then within a while by little and little, into small dew-drops: whenas therfore, the Sun descendeth Westward, it can not chuse, but every Rainbow must needs appercopposit unto it in the contrary part of the sky; and whe our fight falleth upon those drops, it is rebated and beaten backe; and by that meanes there is presented unto it a Rainbow: now those drops are not of the forme and figure of a bow, but represent a colour onely : and verily, the first and principall hew that this bow hath, is a light and bright red; the second, a deepe vermillion or purple; the third, blue and greene: let us confider then, whether the faid red colour appeare not, because the brightnesse of the Sunne beating upon the cloud, and the sincere light thereof reflected & driven back, maketh a ruddy or light red hew; but the fecond part more obfoure, and rebating the faid fplendon through thole down drops, cause tha purple tincture, which is(as it were)an abatement of red; and then as it becommeth more muddle ftill,& darkning that which diffinguisheth the fight, it turneth into a greene: and this is a thing which may be proved by experience; for if a man take water directly against the Sunne beames in his mouth, and spit the fame forward, in fuch fort, as the drops receive a repercussion against the faid raics of the Sunne, he shall finde that it will make (as it were) a Rainbow. The like befalleth unto them that are bleere-eied, when they looke upon a lampe or burning light.

ANAXIMENES supposeth, that the Rainbow is occasioned by the Sunshining full against to a groffe, thicke and blacke cloud, in fach fort, as his beames be not able to pierce and ftrike tho-row, by reason that they turne agains upon it, and become condensate.

ANAXAGORAS holdeth the Rainbow to beather afraction or repercussion of the Sunnes round light against a thicke cloud, which ought alwaies to be opposit full against him, in matter of a mirrour : by which reason, in nature it is said, that there appeare two Sunnes in the coun-

"Hefe rods and opposit apparitions of Sunnes, which are seene otherwhiles in the skie, happen through the temperature of a subject matter and illumination; namely, when clouds are seene, not in their naturall and proper colour, but by another, caused by a divers irradiation; and in all these, the like passions fall out both naturally, and also are purchased by accident.

te CHAP. VII.

Of Winds.

NAXIMANDER is of opinion, that the Winde is a fluxion of the aire; when as the most fubtile and liquid parts thereof be either stirred, or melted and resolved by the Sunne.

The STOICES affirme, that every blaft is a fluxion of the aire, and that according to the mutation of regions, they change their names; as for example, that which bloweth from the darknesse of the night and Sunne setting, is named Zephyru; from the East and Sunne rising, Apeliotes; from the North, Boreau; and from the South, Libs.

METRODORUS supposeth, that a waterish vapour being inchased by the heat of the Sun, produceth and raileth these winds: and as for those that be anniversary, named Etesia, they blow, when the aire about the North pole is thickened and congealed with cold, and so accompanie 40 the Sunne, and flow (as it were) with him, as he retireth from the Summer Tropicke, after the Activall Solftice.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Winter and Summer.

MPEDOCLES and the STOICES do hold, that Winter commeth, when the aire is pre-dominant in thickeneffe, and is forced upward; but Summer, when the fire is in that wife predominant, and is driven downward.

CHAP. XV.

Of Earthquakes.

HALES and DEMOCRITUS attribute the cause of Earthquakes unto water. The STOICES thus define and fay, Earthquake is the moisture within the earth subtiliated and refolved into the aire, and fo breaking out perforce.

A NAXIMENES is of opinion, that raritic and drineffe of the earth together, be the causes of Earthquake: wherof the one is engendred by excessive drougth, the other by gluts of raine. AN AXAGORAS holdeth, that when the aire is gotten within the earth, and meeteth with the superficies thereof, which it findeth tough and thicke, so as it cannot get forth, it shaketh it in manner of trembling.

ARITSTOTLE alledgeth, the Antiperistass of the circumstant cold which environeth is 30 about on everie fide, both above and beneath: for heat endevoreth and maketh hast to mount aloft, as being by nature light. A drie exhalation, therefore finding it felfe enclosed within and staied, striveth to make way through the cliffs and thicks of the Earth, in which busines it cannot chuse but by turning to and fro, up and downe disquiet and shake the earth.

METRODORUS is of mind, that nobodiebeing in the owneproper and naturall place can stirre or moove, unlesse some one do actually thrust or pull it. The earth therefore (quoth he) being situate in the owne place, naturally mooveth not: howsoever some placesthereof may remove into others.

PARMENIDES and DEMOCRITUS reason in this wife: for that the earth on everie side is of equall diffance, and confineth ftill in one counterpoife, as having no cause wherefore it 40 should incline more to the one fide than to the other: therefore well it may shake onely, but not stirre or remoove for all that.

EPICUR us keepeth his old tune, faying, it may well be, that the earth being shogged, and as it were rocked and beaten by the aire underneath, which is groffe and of the nature of water, therefore mooveth and quaketh. As also, it may be (quoth he) that being holow and full of holes in the parts below, it is forced to tremble and shake by the aire that is gotten within the caves and concavities, and there enclosed.

Of the Sca, how it was made and commeth to be bitter.

NAXIMANDER affirmeth, that the Sea is a refidue remaining of the primitive humidity, A whereof the Sunne hauing burntup and confumed a great part, the rest behind he altered and turned from the naturall kind by his excessive ardent heat.

ANAXAGORAS is of opinion, that the faid first humiditic being diffused and spred abroad in manner of a poole or great meere, was burnt by the motion of the funne about it: and when to the oileous substance thereof was exhaled and consumed, the rest setled below, and turned into a brackish and bitter-saltnesse, which is the Sea.

EMPEDOCLES faith, that the Sea is the sweat of the earth, enchased by the sunne, being bathed and washed all over aloft. Antiston thinkethittobe the sweat of heat, the mosture whereof which was within, being by much feething and boiling fent out, becommethfalt; a thing ordinary in all fweats. M B TRO DORUS supposeth the Sea to be that moisture, which running thorough the earth, reteined some part of the densitie thereof, like as that which passeth through ashes.

The disciples of PLATO imagine, that so much of the elementarie water which is congealed of the aire by refrigeration, is sweet and fresh; but whatsoever did evaporate by burning and 20 inflammation, became falt.

PYTHEAS of Marfeils, referreth the cause of Flowing to the full moone, and of Ebbing

PLATO attributeth all to a certeine rifing of the waters, faying, There is fuch an elevation, that through the mouth of a cave carieth the Ebbe and Flow to and fro, by the meanes whereof, the leas doe rife and flow contrarily. TIMAEUS alledgeth the cause hereof to be the rivers, which falling from the mountaines in Gaule, enter into the Atlantique sea, which by their violent corruptions, driving before them the water of the sea, cause the Flow, and by their ceasing and returne backe by times, the Ebbe.

SELBUCUS the Mathematician, who affirmed also, that the earth mooved, saith, that the 40 motion thereof is opposit and contrary to that of the moone: also that the winde being driven to and fro, by these two contrary revolutions, bloweth and beateth upon the Atlanticke ocean, troubleth the fea also (and no marvell) according as it is disquieted it selfe.

CHAP. I.

Of the rising and inundation of Nilus.

HALES thinketh that the anniverfarie windes called Eteliae blowing directly against Aegypt, cause the water of Nilus to swell, for that the sea being driven by these windes, entreth within the mouth of the faid river, and hindereth it, that it cannot discharge it selfe freely into the fea, but is repulfed backward.

EUTHYMENES of Marfeils, supposeth that this river is filled with the water of the ocean, and the great fealying without the continent, which he imagineth to be fresh and sweet.

ANAXAGORAS faith, that this hapneth by the snowe in Aethiopia, which melteth in sum-20 mer, and is congealed and frozen in winter.

DEMOCRITUS is of opinion, that it is long of the snowe in the north parts, which about the æstival folstice and returne of the sunne, being diffolved and dilated, breedeth vapors, and of them be engendred clouds, which being driven by the Etefian windes into Aethiopia and * Megypt toward the fouth, cause great and violent raines, wherewith both lakes, and the river also 2 ilus, be filled.

HERODOTUS the Historian writeth, that this river hath as much water from his fources and fprings, in winter as in fummer; but to us it feemeth leffe in winter, because the funne being then neerer unto Aegypt, causeth the said water to evaporate.

EPHORUS the Historiographer reporteth, that all Aegypt doth resolve and runne at it were 30 wholly into fwet in fummer time: whereunto Arabia and Libya doe conferre, and contribute also their waters, for that the earth there is light and sandy.

Eupox us faith, that the priefts of Aegypt affigne the cause hereof to the great raines and the Antiperistasis or contrarie occurse of seasons; for that when it is Summer with us, who inhabit within the Zone toward the Summer Tropicke, it is Winter with those who dwell in the opposit Zone under the Winter Tropicke, whereupon (saith he) proceedeth this great inundation of waters, breaking downe unto the river 2V ilau.

PYTHAGORAS faith, it is a certeine number moving it selfe; and this number he taketh for intelligence or understanding.

PLAT o supposeth it to be an intellectuall substance mooving it selfe, and that according to harmonicall number.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that it is the first Entelechia or primitive act of a naturall and organicall bodie, having life potentially.

DICE ARCHUS thinketh it to be the harmonic and concordance of the four elements. Asclepiades the Physician, defineth it to be an exercise in common of all the senses

CHAP. III.

Whether the Soule be a body, and what is the substance of it.

LI these Philsosophers before rehearsed, suppose that the Soule is incorporall, that of the owne nature it mooveth and is a spirituall substance, and the action of a naturall bodie, composed of many organs or instruments, and withall having life.

But the Sectaries of ANAXAGORAS, have given out, that it is of an airie fubstance, and a very body.

The STOICKS would have the Soule to be an hot spirit or breath.

DEMOCRITUS holdethit to be a certeine fierie composition of things perceptible by reason, and the same having their formes sphæricall and round, and the puissance of fire, and withall to be a body. EPICURUS faith, it is a mixtion or temperature of foure things, towit, of a certeine fire, of (I wot not what) aire, of an odde windie substance, and of another fourth matter, I cannot tel what to name it, and which to him was fenfible.

Heraclitus affirmeth, the Soule of the world to be an evaporation of humors within it: as for the Soule of living creatures, it proceedeth (quoth he) as well from an evaporation of humors without, as an exhalation within it felfe, and of the same kinde,

CHAP. IIII.

The parts of the Soule

 $\mathbf{P}_{\text{that GORAS}}$ and Plato, according to a more generall and remote divition, hold, that the Soule hath two parts, that is to fay, the Reafonable & the unreafonable; but to goe 20 more necre and exactly to worke, they fay, it hath three; for they subdivided the unreasonable part into Concupiffible and Irascible.

The Stoicks be of opinion, that composed it is of eightparts, whereof five be the senfes naturall, to wit, fight, hearing, fmelling, tafting, and feeling; the fixt is the voice; the feventh generative or spermaticall, and the eight, understanding, which guideth and commaundeth all the rest by certeine proper organs and instruments, like as the Polype fish by her cleies and hairy branches.

DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS fet downe two parts of the Soule; the Reasonable seated in the breft, and the Unreasonable spred and dispersed over all the structure of the body besides.

As for DEMOCRITUS, he affirmeth, that all things what foever, have a certeine kinde of 20 Soule, even the very dead bodies, for that alwaies they doe manifefuly participate a kinde of heat and sensitive facultie, notwithstanding the most part thereof be breathed foorth, and yeelded up.

DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS fay, that it is corruptible, and perisheth together with Some inter-

CHAP. VIII. Of the Senses and sensible objects.

He STOICKS thus define Sense: Sense (say they) is the apprehension of the sensitive organ. But Sense is taken many waies; for we understand by it, either an habitude or facultie naturall, or a fensible action, or elsan imagination apprehensive; which all are performed by the meanes of an instrument sensitive : yea, and the very eighth part of the Soule abovenamed, even that which is principall, to wit, the discourse of reason, by which all the rest doe confist: Againe, the spirits intellectuall, are called sensitive instruments, which from the said principall understanding reach unto all the organs.

The Sense (quoth EPICURUS) is that parcell of the soule which is the sensitive power it felfe, and the effect which proceedeth from it, so that he taketh Sense in two fort, for the power,

PLATO defineth Sense to bee the societie of the body and soule, as touching externall objects; for the facultie and power of Sense is proper to the soule, the instrument belongeth to the body; but both the one and the other apprehendeth externall things, by the meanes of the imaginative facultie, or the phantafie.

LEUCIPPUS and DEMOCRITUS doesay, that both Sense and intelligence are actuated by the meanes of certeine images represented from without, unto us, for that neither the one nor the other, can be performed without the occurrence of some such image, EMPEDOCLES and HERACLIDES fay, that particular Senses are effected according to the proportion of their pores and paffages; namely as the proper object of each Sense is well disposed and fitted.

CHAP. XI.

After what maner is effected Senfe, Notion and Resson, according to disposition or affection.

10 He STOICKS are of opinion and fay, that when a man is engendred, hee hath the prinipall part of his foule, which is the understanding, like for all the world unto a parchment or paper ready to be written in; and therein he doth register and record every several Notion and cogitation of his: for those who have perceived any thing by sense, (as for example fake, have feene a white thing) when the fame is gone out of their eie, reteine it still in memorie: now after they have collected together many femblable memories of the fame kinde, then they say, they have experience; for experience is nothing else but an heape or multitude of like forts: but of notions and thoughts, some be naturall, which are caused in manner aforesaid, without any artificiall meanes, others come by our studie, and by teaching, and such alone properly and indeed are called Notions; the other be named rather conceptions or anticipations; 20 and Reason for which we beare the name of Resonable, is accomplished by those anticipations in the first seven yeares: and intelligence is the conception in the understanding of a reasonable creature: for phantalie when it lighteth upon the reasonable soule is then called Intelligence, taking the denomination of understanding, which is the cause that these imaginations are not incident unto other creatures; but fuch as are presented unto gods and us both, those are onely and properly imaginations; whereas those which offer themselves unto us, are imaginations in generall, and cogitations in special! like as Deniers, Testons, or Crownes being confidered apart in themselves, are Deniers, Testons, & Crownes; but if you give them for the hire of a ship, then besides that they are Deniers, &c. they be also the fare, for ferry or passage.

CHAP. XII.

What difference there is betweene Imagination, Imaginable, Imaginative, and Imagined. HRYSIPPUS faith, there is a difference betweene all these fower : and first, as for * Imagination, it is a paffion or impression in the soule, shewing the selfe same thing that made and imprinted it: as for example; when with our cies we behold a white, it is a paffion or affection engendred by the fight in our foule, and we may well fay, that the faid white is the fubject or object that mooveth & affecteth us: femblably in finelling and touching, and this is called Phantafie, a word derived of odos or sos, which fignifieth light or electenesse; for like as the light the weth it felfe, and all that is comprised in it, so the Phantasie or imagination represent 40 teth it felfe, and that which made it.

*Phantalticke or Imaginative, is a vaine attraction; even an affection or passion in the soule, which commeth not from any object imaginable; like as we may observe in him that fighteth with his owne shadow, or in vaine flingeth foorth his hands : for in true phantasse or imagination, there is a subject matter named Imaginable: but in this Phantasticke or Imaginative there is no fuch object or subject at all.

Phantalme or * Imagined, is that unto which we are drawne by that vaine attraction; a thing usuall with those who are either furious, or surprized with the maladie of melancholy: for 50

Orestes in the tragedie of Europides when he uttereth these speeches,

CHAP. XIII.

Of Sight, and how we doe fee.

EMOCRITUS, and EPICURUS supposed, that Sight was caused by the intromission of certeine images: others by an infinuation of beames, returning to our eie-fight, after the occurrence of an object. EMPEDOCLE's hath mingled the faid images and beamestogether, calling that which is made thereof, the raies of a compound image. HIPPARCHUS holdeth, that the beames fentour and launced from the one eie, and the other comming to be extended, in their ends meet together, and as it were by the touching and clasping of hands, itaking hold of externall bodies, carie backe the apprehension of them unto the visive power.

 $\bar{P}_{\,L\,A\,T}\,o$ attributeth it to the corradiation or conjunction of light, for that the light of the cies reacheth a good way within the aire of like nature, & the light likewife iffuing from the vifi-20 ble bodies, cutteth the aire betweene, which of it felfe is liquid and mutable, and fo extendeth it together with the fierie power of the eie; and this is it which is called the conjunct light or corradiation of the Platonickes.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the Resemblances represented in mirrours.

E MPEDOCLES faith, that these apparitions come by the meanes of certeine defluxions, gathered together upon the superficies of the mirrour, and accomplished by the fire that 30 ariseth from the said Mirrour, and withall transmuteth the airethat is object before it, into which those fluxions are caried.

DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS are of opinon, that these apparences in Mirrours, are caused by the subfishence and stay of certaine images, which passing from us, gather together upon the Mirrour by way of rebounding and refultation.

The PYTHAGORE ANS attribute all this to the reflexion of the fight: for that the fight is extended and carried as farre as to the Mirrour of braffe or whatfoever, where refting and staying upon the thicke folditie thereof, and beaten backe by the polifhed smoothnesse of the Mirrour object against it, the same returneth againe upon it selse; much like as when our hand is firetched out and brought backe againe unto the shoulder.

All these points and opinions may serve very well, and be accommodate to that chapter and

CHAP. XV.

Whether Darknesse be visible.

He Storex's hold, that Darkneffe is visible; for that from the sight there is a splendeure going foorth that compaffeth the faid Darkneffe; neither doth the cie-fight lie and deceive us, for it feeth certeinly and in truth that there is Darkneffe *.

50 CHRYSIPPUS faith, that we doe fee by the tenfion of the aire betweene, which is pricked I reade thus by the vifuall fpirit, that paffeth from the principall part of the foule into the apple of the eie: much more and after that it falleth upon the aire about it, it extendeth the fame in a pyramidall forme, Darkneffe namely, when as it meeteth with an aire of the fame nature with it; for there flow from out of the domaggeeies certeine raies resembling fire, and nothing blacke or missie, and therefore it is that Dark-thermise nesse may be seene.

thereby make it dim : contrariwife, light doeth difgregate and conveyit as faire as to the visible objects, thorough the aire between, and therefore it feeth not in the darke, but is able to fee Darkneffe.

CHAP. XVI.

Of Hearing.

MPRDOCLES is of opinion, that Hearing is performed by the meanes of a spirit or winde gotten within the concavitie of the eare, writhed or turned in manner of a vice or fcrew, which they fay is fitted and framed of purpose within the eare, hanging up alost, and beaten upon in manner of a clocke.

ALCMAEON affirmeth, that we doe Heareby the void place within the eare; for he faith, 10 that this is it that resonndeth, when the said spirit entreth into it; because all emptie things do make a found.

DIOGENES supposeth, that Hearing is caused by the aire within the head, when it commeth to be touched, stirred, and beaten by the voice.

 P_{LATO} and his scholars hold, that the aire within the head is sinitten, and that it rebound deth and is caried to the principall part of the foule, wherein is reason, and so is formed the fense of Hearing.

20

LCMARON affirmeth, that reason, the principall part of the soule, is within the braine, and that by it we Smell, drawing in fents and fmels by respirations.

EMPEDOCLES is of this advice , that together with the respiration of the lights, odours alfo are intromitted and let in; when as then the faid respiration is not performed at libertic and case, but with much adoe, by reason of some asperity in the passage, we Smell not at all, like as we observe in them who are troubled with the pose, murre, and such like rheumes.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Taste.

LCM ABON faith, that by the moisture and warmth in the tongue, together with the softneffe thereof, all fmacks and objects of tafte are diftinguished.

DIOGENES attributeth the same to the spungeous raritie and softnesse of the tongue; and for that the veines of the body reach up to it, and are inserted and graffed therein, the favors are spread abroad and drawen into the sense and principal part of the soule, as it were with a spunge.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Voice.

PLAYO defineth the Voice to be a spirit, which by the mouth is brought and directed from the understanding; also a knocking performed by the aire, passing through the eares, the braine, and the bloud, as farre as to the foule; after an unproper maner & abusively we attribute Voice to unreasonable creatures, yea & to such as have no soule or life at al, namely, to the neighing of horses, and to other founds; but to speake properly, there is no voice but that which is articulate, and called it is com in Greeke, for that it declareth that which is in the thought,

EPICURUS holdeth the Voice to beea fluxion fent foorth by fuch as speake and make a noile, or otherwise doe found; which fluxion breaketh and crumbleth into many fragments of 50 the same forme and figure, as are the things from whence they come; as for example, round to round, and triangles whether they have three equall sides or unequall, to the like triangles: and these broken parcels entring into the cares, make the sense of the Voice, which is hearing; a thing that may be evidently seene in bottles that leake and runne out, as also in fullers that blow upon their clothes.

DEMOCRITUS faith, that the very aire breaketh into small fragments of the same figure, that is to fay, round to round; and roll together with the fragments of the Voice: for according to the old proverbe:

One chough neere to another chough, loves alwaies for to pearch, And Godhath fo appointed aie; that all their like should search.

For even upon the shores and sea-sides, stones are eventwore found together semblable, to wit, in one place round, in another long; in like manner when as folke doe winnow or purge come with the vanne, those graines alwaies are ranged and forted together, which be of one and the 10 fame forme; informach as beanes goe to one fide by themselves & rich peafe to another a part by their felves: but against all this it may be alledged and objected: How is it possible that a tew fragments of spirit and winde should fill a theater, that receiveth ten thousand men?

The STOICKS fay, that the aire doth not confift of small fragments; but is continuall throughout, and admitteth no voidnesse at all : howbeit, when it is smitten with spirit or winde, it waveth directly in circles infinitly, untill it fill up all the aire about, much after the manner as we may perceive in a pond or poole, when there is a flone throwen into it; for like as the water in it mooveth in flat circles, fo doth the aire in roundles like to bals.

ANAXAGORA'S faith, that the Voice is formed by the incursion and beating of the Voice against the solide aire, which maketh resistance, and returneth the Broke backe againe to the 20 eares, which is the mannerallo of that reduplication of the Voice or resonance called Eccho.

CHAP. XX.

Whether the Voice be incorporall? and how commeth the Ecchoto be formed.

PYTHAGORAS, PLATO, and ARISTOTLE do hold the Voice to be bodileffer for that it is not the aire but a forme in the aire, & a fuperficies therof, & that by a certaine beating which becommeth a Voice. Now this is certaine that no superficies hath a bodie. True it is indeed that it moveth and remove th with the bodie, but of it felfe without all doubt it hath no bo-30 dieat all: like as in a wand or rod that is bent, the superficies thereof suffereth no alteration, in respect of it selfe, but it is the verie matter and substance that is bowed. Howbeit the Stoicks are of another opinion and fay, that the Voice is a bodie: for what foever is operative and worketh ought, is a bodie: but certaine it is that the Voice is active and doth fomewhat: for we do heare and perceive when it beateth upon our eare, and it giveth a print, no leffe than a feale upon wax. Moreover, all that moveth or troubleth us, is a bodie: but who knoweth not that in Mufick, as good harmony affectth us; fo diffonance and difcord doth difquiet us; and that which more is; all that stirreth or moveth is a bodie: but the Voice stirreth and hitteth against smooth and polithed folid places, by which it is broken and fent backe againe, in manner as we do fee a tennis ball when it is smitten upon a wal: infomuch as in the Pyramides of AEgypt, one Voice di-40 livered within them, rendereth foure or five refonances or Echoes for it.

CHAP. XXI.

How the Soule commeth to be sensitive; and what is the principall and predominant part thereof.

"He STOICES are of opinion, that the fupreme and highest part of the Soule is the principall and the guide of the other: to wit, that which maketh imaginations, caufeth affents, performeth fenfes, and mooveth appetite: and this is it which they cal the difcourfe of reason. Now of this principall and foveraigne part, there be seven others springing from it, and which 50 are spred through the rest of the bodie, like unto the armes or hairie braunches of a poulp fish: of which seven the natural senses make five; namely, Sight, Smelling, Hearing, Talting, and Feeling. Of these, the Sight is a spirit passing from the chiefest part unto the eies: Hearing, a spirit reaching from the understand, to the eares: Smelling, a spirit issuing from reason to the nosethirls: Tasting, a spirit going from the foresaid principall part unto the tongue : and last of all Feeling, a spirit stretching and extended from the same predominant part, as farre as to the sensible superficies of those objects which are eafie to be felt and handled. Of the twaine behind, the one is called generall feed, and that is likewife a spirit transmitted from the principall part unto the genetories or members of generation: the other which is the seventh and last of all, Zeno calleth Vocall, and wee, Voice; a spirit also, which from the principall part passeth to the windpipe, to the tongue and other instruments appropriat for the voice. And to conclude, that misstresse her selse and ladie of the rest is seated (as it were in the midst of her owne world) within our round head, and there dwelleth.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Respiration.

In MPEDOCLES is of opinion, that the first Respiration of the first living creature was occaled flored, when the humiditie in young ones within the mothers wombe, retired, and the outward aire came to succeed in place thereof, and to enter into the void vessels one open to receive the same: but afterwards the naturall heat driving without forth, this aeric substance for to evaporate and breath away, caused exspiration; and likewise when the same returned in again, there ensued inspiration, which gave new entrance to that aerious substance. But as touching the Respiration that now is, he thinketh it to be when the blood is carried to the exterior superficies of the bodie; and by this suxion doth drive and chase the aeric substance through the nosethicles, and cause exspiration; and inspiration when the blood the aeric substance through the aire reentreth withall through the rarities which the blood hath lest void and emptie. And for to make this better to be understood, he bringeth in the example of a Clepsidre or water 20 houre-glasse.

As CLEPIADES maketh the lungs in manner of a tunnel, supposing that the cause of Respiration, is the aire, smooth, and of subtil parts which is within the breast, unto which the aire without, being thicke and grosses showed and runneth; but is repelled backe againe, for that the brest is not able to receive any more, nor yet to be cleane without. Now when as there remaineth still behind, some little of the subtile aire within the breast, (for it cannot all be cleane driven out) that aire without rechargeth againe with equall force upon that within, being able to support and abide the waight thereof; and this compareth he to Phiscians ventoses, or cupping glafes. Moreover as touching voluntarie Respiration, he maketh this reason, that the smallest holes within the substance of the lungs are drawen together, and their pipes closed up. For these 30 things obey our will.

HEROPHILUS leaveth the motive faculties of the bodie, unto the nerves, arteries and muskles: for thus he thinketh and faith, that the lungs only have a naturall appetite to dilation, and contraction, that is to fay, to draw in and deliver the breath, and fo by consequence other parts. For this is the proper action of the lungs, to draw wind from without; wherewith when it is filled, there is made another attraction by a second appetition; and the breast deriveth the faid wind into it: which being likewife repleat therewith, not able to draw any more, it transmitteth backe againe the superfluitie thereof into the lungs, whereby it is sent forth by way of exspiration; and thus the parts of the bodie reciprocally fuffer one of another, by way of interchange. For when the lungs are occupied in dilatation, the breaft is bufied in contraction; and thus they 40 make repletion and evacuation by a mutuall participation one with the other; in fuch fort as we may observe about the lungs foure manner of motions. The first, whereby it receiveth the aire from without; the secondaby which it transfuseth into the breast that aire which it drew and received from without; the third, whereby it admitteth againe unto it felfe that which was fent out of the breft; and the fourth, by which it fendeth quite forth that which fo returned into it. And of these motions, two be dilatations, the one occasioned from without, the other from the breaft: and other two, contractions; the one when the breft draweth wind into it: and the other when it doth expell the aire infinuated into it. But in the breaft parts there be but two onely, the one dilatation when it draweth wind from the lungs, the other contraction, when it rendreth it againe.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Passion of the body; and whether the soule have a fellow-feelling with it, of paine and dolour.

THE STOICES fay, that affections are in the passible parts, but senses in the principall part of the soule.

EPICURUS is of opinion, that both the affections and also the senses, are in the passible places: for that reason which is the principall part of the soule, he holdest to be unpussible.

STRATO contrariwife affirmeth, that as well the Paffions of the foule, as the fenses, are in the said principall part, and not in the affected and grieved places; for that in it constiteth patience, which we may observe in terrible and dolorous things, as also in searcfull, and magnanimous persons.

CHAP. I.

Of Divination.

PLATO and the STOICES bring in a fore-deeming and fore-knowledge of things by infipiration or divine inflinct, according to the divinity of the foule; namely, when as it is ravished with a fanaticall fpirit or revelation by dreames: and these admit and allow many kinds of divination.

20 XENOPHANES and EPICURUS on the contrary fide abolish and annull all Divination what foever.

 $\mathbf{P}_{\,\mathrm{Y\,T\,H\,AG\,O\,R\,AS}}$ condemneth that onely which is wrought by facrifices.

ARISTOTLE & DICEAR CHUS receive none but that which commet by Divine inspiration, or by dreames; not supposing the soule to be immortall, but to have some participation of Divinitie.

CHAP. II.

How Dreames are caused.

DEMOCRITUS is of of opinion, that Dreames come by the representation of images.

STRATO faith, that our understanding is I wot not how, naturally, and yet by no reafon, more sensative in sleepe than otherwise, and therefore sollicited the rather by the appetit and desire of knowledge.

HEROPHILUS affirmeth, that Dreames divinely infpired, come by necessitie; but natural Dreames by this meanes, that the soule formeth an image and representation of that which is good and commodious unto it, and of that which must be necessary to the sould be a mixt nature of both, they fall out casually by an accidentall accesse of images; namely, when we imagine that we fee that which wee desire; as it falleth out with those who in their sleepe thinke they have their paramours in their armes.

CHAP. III.

What is the substance of Matwall seed.

A Ristotle defineth Seed to be that which hath power to moove in it selfe for the effecting of some such thing, as it was from whence it came.

PYTHAGORAS taketh it to be the foame of the best and prinest bloud; the superfluitie and excrement of nouriture; like as bloud and marrow.

ALCMARON faith, it is a portion of the braine.

PLATO supposeth it to be a decision or deflux of the marrow in the backe bone.

50 E FIGURUS imagineth it to be an abstract of soule and body.

DEMOCRITUS holders, that it is the generate of the flethy nerves proceeding from the whole body, and the principall parts thereof.

CHAP. IIII.

Eucippus and Zeno take it to be a body; for that it is an abilitact parcell of the foulc.

Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle, acknowledge indeed and confesses, Bbbb.

that the power and force of Seed is bodileffe; like as the understanding, which is the author of motion; but the matter thereof fay they, which is shed and sent foorth, is corporall.

STRATO and DEMOCRITUS affirme thevery puillance thereof to be a body, howbeit, spirituall.

CHAP. V.

Whether femals send foorth Seed as well as males.

PYTHAGORAS, EPICURUS, and DEMOCRITUS hold, that the Female likewise dischargeth Seed: for that it hash seminaria was all a summed Levi chargeth Seed; for that it hath seminarie vessels turned backward; which is the reason that 10 the hath luft unto the act of generation. .

ARISTOTLE and Zeno be of opinion, that the Female delivereth from it a moilt matter, refembling the sweat which commets from their bodies, who wrestle or exercise together:

but they will not have it to be Seed.

HIPPON avoucheth that Femals doe ejaculate Seed no leffe than males, howbeit the fame is not effectuall for generation, for that it falleth without the matrix: whereupon it commeth to passe that some women, though very few, and widdowes especially, doe cast from them Seed without the company of men: and he affirmeth that of the male Seed, are made the bones, & of the female the flesh. 20

CHAP. VI.

The maner of Conception.

RISTOTLE thinketh, that Conceptions come in this maner: when as the matrix drawn A RISTOTLE thinketh, that Conceptions come in this maner; when as the matrix drawn before from the naturall purgation, and therewithall the monthly tearmes fetch some part of pure bloud from the whole maffe of the body, so that the males genetall may come to it, and to concurre to engender: Contrariwife, that which hindereth conception is this, namely, when the matrix is impure or full of ventolities; as it maybe by occasion of searc of forrow, or weaknesse of women; yea and by the impuissance and defect in men.

CHAP. VII.

How it commath that Males are engendred, and how Females.

 $\mathbf{E}_{\text{ADOCLES}}$ fupposeth, that Males and Females are begotten by the meanes of heat and cold accordingly: and hecreupon recorded it is in Histories, that the first Males in the world, were procreated and bome out of the earth, rather in the East and Southern parts; but Females toward the North.

PARMENIDES mainteineth the contrary, and faith; that Males were bred toward the Northern quarters, for that the aire there is more groffe and thicker than else where: on the other 40 fide, Females toward the South, by reason of the raritie and subtilitie of the aire.

HIPPONAX attributeth the cause heereof unto the seed, as it is either more thick or power-

ANAXAGORAS and PARMENT DES hold, that the feed which commeth from the right fide of a man, ordinarily is cast into the right side of the matrix; and from the left side likewise into the fame fide of the matrix: but if this ejection of feed fall out otherwise cleane crosse, then Females be engendred.

LEOPHANES of whom ARISTOTLE makethmention, affirmeth that the Males be en-

What is the reason that a woman though oftentime she companieth with a man doeth not conceive.

IOCLES the Phylician rendreth this reason, for that some doe send soorth no seed at all; 20 Dor leffe in quantity than is fufficient, or fuch in quality, which hath no vivificant or quickning power; or elfe it is for defect of heat, of cold, of moilture, or drineffe; or last of all, by occasion of the paralysic or resolution of the privy parts and members of generation.

CHAP. XII.

How it fallethout that children resemble others, and not their fathers and mothers.

He most part of the Physicians affirme this to happen by chaunce and aventure, but upon this occasion, that the feed, as well of the man as the woman waxeth cold, for then the 10 infants resemble neither the one nor the other.

EMPEDOCLES attributeth the forme and refemblance of young babes in the wombe. unto the strong imagination of the woman in time of conception; for many times it hath beene knowen, that women have beene enamoured of painted images and statues, and so deli vered of children like unto them.

The Storeks fay, that by a sympathic of the minde and understanding, through the insinuation of beames, and not of images, these resemblances are caused.

CHAP. XIII.

How it commet hthat some women be barren, and men likewise unable to get children.

PHYSICIANS hold, that women be barren by reason that the matrix is either too streight, overrare, or too hard; or else by occasion of carreins called the second of the se overrate, or too hard; orelie by occasion of certeine callosities or carnosities: or for that the women themselves be weaklings and heartlesse, or doe not thrive but millike; or else because they are fallen into some Cachexia and evill habit of body; or by reason that they are distorted, or otherwise in a convulsion.

Dioches faith, that men in this action of generation are impotent, for that some send foorth no feed at all, or at least wife in quantitie lesse than is meet, or such as hath no generative power; or because their genetals be paralyticall or relaxed; or by reason that the yerd is croo- 20 ked, that it cannot cast the seed forward; or for that the genetall members be disproportioned and not of a competent length, confidering the distance of the matrix.

The STOICKS lay the fault upon certeine faculties and qualities, discordant in the parties themselves that come together about this businesse; who being parted one from another, and conjoined with others, uniting well with their complexion, there followeth a temperature according to nature, and a childe is gotten betweene them.

CHAP. XIIII.

Why Mules be barrain.

LCMAEON is of opinion, that Mulets, that is to fay, male Mules be not able to engender for that their feed or geneture is of a thin fubltance which proceedeth from the coldnesse therof. The Females also, because their shaps do not open wide enough, that is to say, the mouth therof doth not gape sufficiently; for these be the verie tearmes that he useth.

EMPEDOCLES blameth exilitie or fmalneffe, the low positure and the over streight conformation of the matrix, being so turned backward and tied unto the belly, that neither seed can be directly cast into the capacitic of it, nor if it were caried thither would it receive the same. Unto whom DIOCLES also beareth witnesse faying, Many times (quoth he) in the dissection of Anatomics we have seene such matrices of Mules; and it may be therefore, that in regard of 50 fuch causes some women also be barrain.

"He Stoicks are of opinion that the most parts are formed all at once; but Aristo-I TE E faith the backe bone and the loines are first framed, like as the keele in a ship. A L C M AB O N affirmeth, that the head is first made, as being the seat of reason. PHYSICIANS will have the heart to be the first, wherein the veines and arteries are. Some thinke the great toe is framed first, and others the navill.

CHAP. XVIII.

What is the cause that Infants borne at seven moneths end, be livelike.

E MPEDOCLES thinketh, that when mankind was first bred of the earth, one day then, by reason of the slow motion of the Sunne was full as long, as (in this age of ours) tenne moneths: and that in processe of time, and by succession it came to be of the length of seven moneths: And therefore (quoth hee) infants borne either at ten or seven moneths end, doe ordina-50 rily live: the nature of the world being fo accustomed in one day to bring that fruit to maturitie after that night, wherein it was committed into the wombe thereof.

TIMABUS faith, that they bee not ten moneths, but are counted nine, after that the monethly purgations stay upon the first conception: and so it is thought that infants be of seven moneth whichs are not : for that he knew how after conceptio many women have had their menstruall flux.

POLYBUS, DIOCLES and the EMPIRICKS know, that the eight monethschilde also is vitall; howbeit in some fort feeble, for that many for feeblenesse have died so borne: in ge-Bbbb 3

nerall and for the most part ordinarily, none are willing to reare and feed the children borne at the feven moneth; and yet many have beene so borne and growen to mans estate.;

ARISTOTLE and HIPPO CRATES report, that if in feven moneths the matrix be growen full, then the infant feeketh to get foorth; and fuch commonly live and doe well enough; but if it incline to birth, and be not sufficiently nourished, for that the navill is weake, then in regard of hard travell, both the mother is in danger, and her fruit becommeth to millike and thriveth not : but in case it continue nine moneths within the matrix, then it commeth soorthac-

POLYBUS affirmeth it to be requisite and necessarie for the vitalitie of infants, that there should be 182, daies and a halfe, which is the time of fix moneths compleat; in which space 10 the funne commeth from one Solitice or Tropicke to another: but such children are said to be of seven moneths, when it falleth out that the odde daies left in this moneth, are taken to the feventh moneth. But he is of opinion, that those of eight moneths live not; namely, when as the infant halfneth indeed out of the wombe, and beareth downward, but for the most part the navell is thereby put to stresse and reached, & so cannot feed, as that should, which is the cause of food to the infant.

The MATHEMATICIANS beare us in hand and fay, that eight moneths be diffociable of all generations, but feven are fociable. Now the diffociable fignes are fuch as meet with fuch starres and constellations which be lords of the house: for if upon any of them falleth the lot of mans life and course of living, it fignifieth that such shall be unfortunate and short lived. These 20 diffociable figues be reckonned eight in number: namely . Aries with Scorpius is infociable; Taurus with Scorpius is fociable; Gemini with Capricorn; Cancer with Aquarius; Leo with Pifces; and Virgo with Aries: And for this caule infants of feven moneths and ten moneths be livelike, but those of eight moneths for the insociable diffidence of the world, perish and come to naught.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the generation of animall creatures ; after what maner they be engendred; and whether they be corruptible.

Hey who hold that the world was created, are of opinion, that living creatures also had their creation or beginning, and shall likewife period and state of their creation or beginning.

The Epicure ans according unto whom Animals had no creation, doe suppose that by mutation of one into another, they were first made; for they are the substantiall parts of the world like as ANAXAGORAS and EURIPIDES affirme in these tearmes: Nothing dieth, but in changing as they doe one for another, they shew fundry formes.

ANAXIMANDER is of opinion, that the first Animals were bred in moisture, and enclosed within pricky and sharpe pointed barks; but as age grew on, they became more drie, and in the end, when the faid barke burst and clave in funder round about them, a small while after they furvived.

EMPEDOCLES thinketh, that the first generations as well of living creatures as of plants, were not wholy compleat and perfect in all parts, but disjoined, by reason that their parts did not cohare and unite together: that the second generations when the parts begun to combine and close together, seemed like to images: that the third generations were of parts growing and arifing mutually one out of another: and the fourth were no more of femblable, as of earth and water, but one of another; and in some the nourishment was incrassfate and made thicke, as for others the beautie of women provoked and pricked in them a lust of spermatike motion. Moreover, that the kinds of all living creatures were distinct and divided by certeine temperatures; for fuch as were more familiarly enclined to water, went into water; others into the aire, for to draw and deliver their breath to and fro, according as they held more of the nature of 50 fire; fuch as were of a more heavie temperature were bestowed upon the earth; but those who were of an equal temperature, uttered voice with their whole breafts.

CHAP. XX.

How many forts of living creatures there beswhether they be all sensitive and endued with reason. Here is a treatife of ARISTOTLE extant, wherein he putteth downe fower kinds of A-👢 nimals, to wit, Terrestriall, Aquaticall, Volatile, and Celestiall: for you must thinke, that he calleth heavens, starres, and the world, Animals; even as well as those that participate of earth: yea and God he defineth to be a reasonable Animall and immortall.

DEMOCRITUS and ETICURUS doe fay, that heavenly Animals are reasonable.

ANAMAGORA'S holdeth, that all Animals are endued with active reason, but want the pasfive understanding, which is called the interpreter or truchment of the minde, PYTHAGORAS and PLATO do affirme, that the foules even of those very Animals which are called unreasonable & brute beasts, are endued with reason; howbeit they are not operative with that reason, neither can they achieve it, by reason of the distempered composition of their bodies, and because they have not speech to declare and expound themselves; as for example, 10 apes and dogs, which otter a babling voice, but not an expresse language and distinct speech.

DI OGENES supposeth that they have an intelligence; but partly for the groffe thicknesse of their temperature, and in part for the abundance of moisture, they have neither discourse of reason nor sense, but fare like unto those who be furious; for the principall part of the soule, to wit, Reason is defectuous and empeached.

CHAP. XXI.

Within what time are living creatures formed in the mothers wombe.

20 MPEDOCLES faith, that men begin to take forme after the thirtie fixed day; and are fini-fled and knit in their parts within 50. daies wanting one.

A SCLEPIADES faith, that the members of males, because they be more hot, are jointed. and receive shape in the space of 26, daies, and many of them sooner; but are finished and complet in all limbes within 50.daies: but females require two moneths ere they be fashioned. and fower before they come to their perfection; for that they want naturall heat. As for the parts of unreasonable creatures, they come to their accomplishment sooner or later, according to the temperature of the elements.

CHAP. XXII.

Of how many elements is composed ech of the generall parts which are in us.

MPEDOCLES thinketh, that flesh is engendred of an equall mixture and temperature of the fower elements; the finewes, of earth and fire, mingled together in a duple proportion; the nailes and cleies in living creatures come of the nerves refrigerat and made colde in those places where the aire toucheth them; the bones, of water and earth within : and of these fower medled and contempered together, fweat and teares proceed.

CHAP. XXIII.

When and how dot h man begin to come to his perfection.

ERACLITUS and the Stoic us suppose, that men doe enterinto their persection about the second septimane of their age, at what time as their natural seed doth moove andrunne: for even the very trees begin then, to grow unto their perfection; namely, when as they begin to engender their feed; for before then, unperfect they are, namely, folong as they be unripe and fruitleffe: and therefore a man likewife about that time is perfect: and at this septenarie of yeeres he beginneth to conceive and understand what is good and evill, yea, and to learne the fame.

*Some thinke that a man is confummate at the end of the third septimane of yeeres, what * This I find time as he maketh use of his full strength.

CHAP. XXIIII.

In what manner Sleepe is occasioned or death?

LCMEON is of this mind, that Sleepe is caused by the returne of blood into the conflu-Cant veines; and Waking is the diffusion and spreading of the said blood abroad: but

EMPEDOCLES holdern that Sleepe is occasioned by a moderate cooling of the natural heat of blood within us : and Death by an extreme coldnesse of the laid blood in the act

DIOGENES is of opinion, that if blood being diffused and spred throughout, fill the veines, and withall drive backe the aire feeled morabout into the break, and the interior belly under it, then ensuch Sleepe, and the breast with the precordiall parts are horser thereby : but with at acreous fubftanee in the veines exfpire altogether, and exhale forth, prefently followeth Death.

Prayoundthe Sreger Saffirme, that the caufe of Sleep is the remiffion of the first fenfirive, not by way of relaxation and different downward las in there to the earth; burrather by elevation aloft, namely, when it is carried to the marfile or place between the brower, the very feat of Lo reason : but when there light entire resolution of the spirit sensitive pines of necessitie Death doch enfuer ... regent or the but to cook in the contract regently regarded to the series of the partial graduation of the series of the se

Whether of the twaine it is, that Bopeth or dieth, the Soule or the Bodie?

RISTOTES verely supposed that Sleepe is common to Bodie and Soule both: and A the cause thereof is a certaine humiditie which doth steeme and arise in manner of a vapour out of the stomack and the food therein, up into the region of the head, and the natu- 20 rall heat about the heart cooled thereby. But death he deemeth to be an entire and totall refrigeration; and the same of the Bodie onely, and in no wife of the Soule, for it is immortall.

ANAXA GORAS faith, that Sleepe belongeth to corporall action; as being a paffion of the Bodie and not of the Soule: also that there is likewise a certaine death of the Bodie, to wit, the feparation of it and the Bodie afunder, which was a standard and the Bodie afunder.

L + u c 1 P Pus is of opinion, that Sleepe pertaineth to the Bodie onely, by concretion of that which was of fubtile parts; but the excessive excretion of the animall hear is Death; which both (faith he) be passions of the Bodie, and not of the Soule.

EMPEDOCLES faith, that Death is a separation of those elements whereof mans Bodie is compounded according to which polition, Death is common to Soule and Bodie: and Sleep 20 a certaine diffipation of that which is of the nature of fire.

CHAP. XXVI. How Plants come to grow and whether they be animate.

PLATO and EMPEDOCLES hold, that Plants have life, yea and be animall creatures which appeareth (fay they) by this, that they wag to and fro, and stretch forth their boughs like armes; also, that when they be violently strained and bent, they yeeld; but if they be let loofe they return again, yea in their growth are able to overcome waight laid upon them.

ARISTOTLE granteth that they be living creatures, but not animall: for that animal creatures have motions and appetites, are sensitive and endued with reason.

The STOICKS and the EPIGURE ANS hold, that they have no foule or life at all: for of animallereatures some have the appetitive & concupsicible soule, others the reasonable : but Plants grow after a fort cafually of their owne accord, and not by the meanes of any foule.

EMPEDOCLES faith, that Trees forang and grew out of the ground before animall creatures; to wit, ere the Sunne desplaied his beames, and before that day and night were distinct. Also that according to the proportion of temperature, one came to be named, Male, another, Female; that they thoot up and grow by the power of heat within the earth; in such fort, as they be parts of the earth, like as unborne fruits in the wombe, be parts of the matrice. As for 50 the fruits of trees, they are the superfluous excrements of water and fire: but such as have defect of that humiditie, when it is dried up by the heat of the Summer, lofe their leaves: whereas they that have plentic thereof, keepe their leaves on still, as for example, the Laurell, Olive, and Date tree. Now as touching the difference of their juices and fapors, it proceedeth from the diversitie of that which nouritheth them, as appeareth in Vines: for the difference of Vine trees, maketh not the goodnesse of Vines for to be drunke, but the nutriment that the territorie and foile doth affoord. CHAP,

CHAP. XXVII. Of Naurishment and Growth.

E MPRDOCLES is of opinion, that animall creatures are nourifhed by the substance of that which is proper and familiar unto them; that they grow by the presence of naturall heat; that they diminish, fade and perish through the default both of the one and the other. And as for men now a daies living, in comparison of their auncestos, they be but babes new borne.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How Animall creatures came to have appearte and pleasure.

MREDOCLES supposeth, that Lust and Appetites are incident to animall creatures, through the defect of those elements which went unto the framing of echone: that pleafures arise from humiditie: as for the motions of perils and such like, as also troubles and himderances, &cc. * * * *

CHAP. XXIX.

After what fort a Fewer is engendred, and whether it is an accessary to another malady?

RASISTRATUS defineth a Fever thus: A Fever (quoth he) is the motion of bloud, which is entred into the veines or veffels proper unto the fpirits, to wir, the atteries; and that against the will of the patient; for like as the sea when nothing troubleth it, lieth still and quiet; but if a boifterous and violent winde be up and bloweth upon it, contrary unto nature it furgeth and rifeth up into billowes even from the very bottom; fo in the body of man, when the bloud is mooved, it invadesh the vitall and spirituall vessels, and being set on fire, it enchasesh the whole body. And according to the fame phylicians opinion, a Fever is an accessary or consequent comming upon another discase.

But DIOCLES affirmeth, that Symptones apparent without foorth, doe Thewthat which 20 lieth hidden within: Now we fee that an Ague followeth upon those accidents that outwardly appeere; as for example, wounds, inflammations, impostumes, biles and botches in the share and other emunctories.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Health, Sicknesse, and old age.

LCM ABON is of opinion, that the equall dispensing and distribution of the faculties in A the body, to wit, of moisture, heat, drinesse, cold, bitter, sweer, and the rest, is that which holdeth & maintaineth Health: contrariwife, the monarchie, that is to fay, the predominant fo-40 veraignty, of any of them causeth sicknesse: for the predomination and principality of any one, bringeth the corruption of all the other, and is the very cause of maladies; the efficient in regard of excessive heat or cold; and the materiall in respect of superabundance, or defect of humors; like as in some there is want of bloud or brain; whereas Health is a proportionable temperature of all these qualities.

Diocins supposeth, that most diseases grow by the inequality of the elements, and of the habit and constitution of the body.

ERASISTRATUS faith, that fickneffe proceedeth from the exceffe of feeding, from crudities, indigeftions, and corruption of meat: whereas good order and fuffifance is Health.

The STOICES accord heereunto and hold, that Oldage commeth for want of natural 50 heat; for they who are most furnished therewith, live longest, and be old a great time.

ASCLEPIADES reporteth, that the Aethiopians age quickly, namely, when they be thirtie yeeres old; by reason that their bodies bee over-heat, and even burnt againe with the sunne: whereas in England and all Britaine, folke in their age continue 120. yeeres; for that those parts be cold, and in that people the naturall hearby that meanes is united and kept in their bodies: for the bodies of the Aethiopians are more open and rare, in that they be relaxed and refolved by the funnes heat. Contrariwife their bodies who live toward the North pole, bee more compact, knit and fast, and therefore, such are long lived.

ROMANE

ROMANE QUESTIONS,

THAT IS TO SAY,

AN ENQUIRIE INTO THE CAUSES OF MANIE FASHLONS

AND CUSTOMES OF ROME.

A Treatise fit for them who are conversant in the reading of Romane histories and antiquities, giving a light to many places otherwise obscure and hard to be understood.

It hat is the reason that new wedded wives are bidden to touch fire and water?

S it because that among the elements and principles, whereof are composed naturall bodies, the one of these twaine, to wit, fire is the male, and water the female, of which, that infuseth the beginning of motion, and this affoordeth the propertie of the fubject and matter?

2 Or rather, for that, as the fire purgeth, and water washeth; fo a wife ought to continue pure, chafte and cleane all her life.

Or is it in this regard, that as fire without humidity yeeldeth no nourishment, but is dry; and moisture without heat is idle, fruitlesse and barren; even so the male is feeble, and the female likewife, when they be apart and fevered a funder: but the conjunction of two maried folke yeeldeth unto both, their cohabitation and perfection of living together.

4 Or last of all, because man and wife ought not to forsake and abandon one another, but to take part of all fortunes; though they had no other good in the world common betweene them, but fire and water onely.

How is it that they use to light at weddings five torches, and neither more nor lesse, which they 40 call Wax-lights.

7 Hether is it as Parro faith, because the Prætours or generals of armies use three, and the Aediles two: therefore it is not meet that they should have more than the Prætours and Aediles together: confidering that new maried folke goe unto the Aediles to light their fire?

2. Or, because having use of many numbers, the odde number seemed unto them as in all other respects better, and more perfect than the even: so it was fitter and more agreeable for mariage I for the even number implieth a kinde of discord and division, in respect of the equal parts in it, meet for fiding, quarrell, and contention: whereas the odde number cannot be dividedio justes. equally, but there will remaine form what still in common for to be parted. Now among al odditionabers, it feemeth that Cinque is most nuprial, & best besteming mariage; for that Trey is the first odde number, & Deuz the first even; of which twaine, five is compounded, as of the male and the temale.

3 Onisitrather, because light is a figne of being and of life: and a woman may be are at the most five children at one burden; and so they used to cary five tapers or waxe candels?

4 Or lastly, for that they thought, that those who were maried had need of five gods and goddeffes: Romane questions.

goddeffes: namely, Jupiter * genial, Juno genial, Venu, Suade, and above all Diana; whom * Or, nuptrall. (last named) women in their labour and travell of childe birth, are wont to call upon for helpe.

What is the cause that there being many Temples of Dianain Rome, into that onely which standeth in the Parrician Street, men enter not.

I S it not because of a tale which is told in this maner: In old time a certeine woman be-I ing come thither for to adore and worthip this goddeffe, chaunced there to bee abused 10 and fuffer violence in her honor : and he who forced her, was torne in pieces by hounds: upon which accident, ever after, a certeine superstitious feare possessed mens heads, that they would not prefume to goe into the faid temple.

Wherefore wit, that in other temples of Diana men are woont ordinarily to fet up and fasten Harts hornes; onely in that which is upon mount Aventine; the hornes of oxen and other beefes are to be feene.

May it not be, that this is respective to the remembrance of an ancient occurrent that fometime befell? For reported it is that long since in the Sabines countrey, one Antion 20 Coratino had a cow, which grew to be exceeding faire and woonderfull bigge withall above any other: and a certeine wizard or foothfaier came unto him and faid: How predestined it was that the citie which facrificed that cow unto Diana in the mount Aventine, should become most puissant and rule all Italy: This Coratius therefore came to Rome of a deliberate purpose to facrifice the faid cow accordingly: but a certaine houshold fervant that he had, gave notice fecretly unto king Servine Tulline of this prediction delivered by the abovefaid foothfaier: whereupon Servius acquainted the priest of Diana, Cornelius, with the matter : and therefore when Antion Coratins presented himselfe for to performe his facrifice, Cornelius advertised him, first to goe downe into the river, there to wash; for that the custome and maner of those that facrificed was fo to doe: now whiles Antion was gone to wash himselfe in the river, Ser-30 vim steps into his place, prevented his returne, facrificed the cow unto the goddesse, and nailed up the hornes when he had so done, within her temple. Juba thus relateth this historie, and Varrolikewise, faving that Varro expressely setteth not downe the name of Antion, neither doth he write that it was Cornelius the priest, but the sexton onely of the church that thus beguiled the Sabine.

Why are they who have beenefally reported dead in a strange countrey, although they returne bome alive, not received nor suffred to enter directly at the dores, but forced to climbe up to the tiles of the house, and so to get downe from the rouse into the house?

40 Arro rendreth a reason heereof, which I take to be altogether fabulous: for hee writeth, that during the Sicilian warre, there was a great battell fought upon the fea, and immediately upon it, there ranne a rumour of many that they were dead in this fight; who notwithftanding, they returned home fafe, died all within a little while after: howbeit, one there was among the rest, who when he would have entred into his owne house, found the dore of the owne accord falt shut up against him; and for all the forcible meanes that was made to open the same, yet it would not prevaile: whereupon this man taking up his lodging without, just before his dore, as he flept in the night, had a vision which advertised and taught him how he should from the roofe of the house let himselfe downe by a rope, and so get in: now when he had so done, he became fortunate ever after, all the rest of his life; and hee lived to be a very aged man : and 50 heereof arose the foresaid custome, which alwaies afterwards was kept and observed.

But haply this fashion may feeme in some fort to have beene derived from the Greeks for in Greece they thought not those pure and cleane who had been carried foorth for dead to be enterred; or whose sepulchre and funerals were solemnized or prepared: neither were such allowed to frequent the company of others, nor fuffred to come neere unto their facrifices. And there goeth a report of a certaine man named Arithinus, one of those who had been epossessed with this superstition, how he sent unto the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, for to make supplication and praier unto the god, for to bee delivered out of this perplexed anxietie that troubled him by occasion of the faid custome or law then in force: and that the prophetesse Pythia returned this Looke what foever women doe in childbed newly laid, Unnotheir babes, which they brought foorth, the verie fame I flay

See that be done to thee againe:
and after that be fure,
Unto the belifted goods with hands to facilite, most pure.

Which oracle thus delivered, \(\alpha \) is finus having well pondered and confidered, committed himselse as an infantnew borne unto women for to be washed, to be wrapped in swalling clothes, and to be suckled with the brest-head: after which, all such others, whom we call Hysteropotmus, that is to say, those whose graves were made, as if they had beene dead, did the semblable. Howbeit, some doe say, that before \(\alpha \) is flusure was borne, these creremonies were observed about those Historopumi, and that this was a right annotent custome kept in the semblable case: and therefore no marvell it is, that the Romans also thought, that such as were supposed to have beene once buried, and raunged with the dead in another world, ought not to enter in at the same porch, out of which they goe, when they purpose to facrifice tunto the gods, or at which they reenter when they returne from sacrifice: but would have them from above to de-20 seend through the tiles of the rouse into the close house, with the aire open over their heads: for all their purifications ordinarily they performed without the house abroad in the aire.

Is a smolt men thinke, for that women being forbidden to drinke wine, the manner was brought up: That when foever they met their kinsfolke, they should kisse their lips, to the end they might not be unknowen, but convicted if they had drunke wine? or rather for another reason, which drisse the philosopher hath alledged? for as touching that occasion, which is so so so so and commonly voiced in every mans mouth, yea, and reported of divers and sindrie places; it was no doubt the hardy attempt executed by the dames of Troie, and that upon the coasts of Italy; for when the men upon their arrivall were landed; the women in the meane while set fire upon their ships, for very desire that they had to see an end once, one way or either of their long voiage, & to be delivered fro their tedious travel at seabut searing the sury of their men, when they should returne, they went forth to meet their kinssolke and friends upon the way, and welcomed them with amiable embracing & sweet kisses of their lips; by which means having appeased their angric mood, and recovered their favours, they continued ever after, the cultome of kindgreeting and loving salutation in this manner.

Or was not this a priviledge granted unto women for their greater honour and credit; name-40 ly, to be knowen and feen for to have many of their race and kinred, and those of good worth and reputation?

Or because it was not lawfull to espouse women of their blood and kinred, therefore permitted they were to entertaine them kindly and familiarly with akiffe, so they proceeded no farther; infomuch as this was the onely marke and token left of their confanguinitie. For before time, they might not marrie women of their owne blood 3 no more than in these daies their aunts by the mothers fide, or their fifters : and long it was ere men were permitted to contract marriage with their coufin germains; and that upon fuch an occasion as this. There was a certaine man of poore estate and small living, howbeit otherwise of good and honest carriage, and of all others that managed the publike affairs of State most popular and gracious with the com- 50 mons: who was supposed to keepe as his espouled wife a kinswoman of his and cousin germain, an inheritreffe; by whom he had great wealth, and became verie rich: for which he was accufed judicially before the people; but upon a speciall favour that they bare unto him, they would not enquire into the cause in question; but not onely suppressed his bill of enditement, and let her go as quit of all crime, but also even they, enacted a statute; by vertue whereof, lawfull it was for all men from that time forward to marrie, as far as to their coulin germains, but in any higher or neerer degree of confanguinitie, they were expresly forbidden. Wherefore

Wherefore uit not lawfull either for the husband to receive a gift of his wife, or for the wife of her husband.

Ay it not be, for that, as Solon ordained that the donations and bequests, made by those that die shall stand good, unlesse they be such as a man hath granted upon necessitie, or by the inducement and flatterie of his wife: in which proviso, he excepted necessitie, as forcing and constraining the will; and likewise pleasure, as deceiving the judgement; even so have men suspected the mutuall gifts passing between the husband and the wise, and thought them to be to of the same nature.

Community and good wilk (for even firingers and fuch as beare no love at all use in that fort to be giving) and in that regard they would be different for the parties should be free and without respect to the parties should be free and without respect of falatic and gain even for it selfe and nothing else in the world.

in Orbecause wooner commonly admit and entertaine strainingers, as corrupted by receiving of presenting and gifts archeir hands, it was thought to stand more with honour and reputation, that wives should love their owne husbands, though they gave them nothing by way of gift.

Or rather, for that it was meet and requifit, that the goods of the husband (fould be common to the wife) and to the wife likewife of the husband; for the partie who receive that thing in gift, doth learner to repute that which was not given, to be none of his owne, but belonging to another in man and wife in giving never to little one to another; despoile and defraud themselves, of all that is beside.

What might be the cause that they were forbidden to receive any gift either of * Sonne in law, * Daughters

This may paffe about the returne unto the wife: and of the Father in law, because it was supposed * This may seemen and just, that he who gave not, should not likewise receive ought.

feeme to have fome tellifee fome tellifee to the former quellion,

What should be thereason that the Romans when they returned from some voyage out of a sarre and sorraine countrey, or onely from their ferme into the citie; if their wives were at home, used to send a messenger unto them before, for to give warning and advertisement of their comming?

I ther it was because this is a token of one that beleeveth and is verily perswaded that his wise intendeth no lewdnesse, nor is otherwise busied than well: whereas to come upon her at unwates and on a sodain, is a kind of forlaying and surprize. Or for that they make haste to send to them good newes of their comming, as being affured that they have a longing desire, and doe expect such tidings.

Or rather because themselves would be glad to heare from them some good newes, to wit, whether they shall find them in good health when they come, and attending affectionately and with great devotion, their returne.

Or elle because women ordinarily, when their husbands be away and from home, have many petie businesses and house affaires: and other whiles there fall out some little jarres and quartels within doores with their servants; menor maidens: to the end therefore all such troubles and inconveniences might be overblowen; and that they might give unto their husbands allowing and amiable welcome home, they have intelligence given unto them before hand of their 45 arrivall and approch.

What is the cause that when they adore and worship the gods, they cover their heads: but contravivise when they meet with any honourable or worshipfull persons, if their heads haplie were then covered with their cover, they discover the same, and are bare headed.

Por it feemeth that this fashion maketh the former doubt and braunch of the question more difficult to be affoiled: and if that which is reported of Aeness betrue; namely, that as Cccc Diomeder

Diomedes passed along by him whiles he sacrificed, he covered his head, and so performed his facrifice; there is good reason and consequence, that if men be covered before their enemies, they should be bare when they encounter either their friends, or men of woorth and honour: for this maner of being covered before the gods, is not properly respective unto them, but occasioned by accident, and hath, since that example of Aeneas, beene observed and continued.

But if we must fay fomewhat else beside, consider whether it be not sufficient to enquire onely of this point; namely, why they cover their heads when they worthip the gods, feeing the other consequently dependent heereupon: for they stand bare before men of dignitic and authoritie, not to doc them any more honor thereby, but contrariwise to diminish their envie, for feare they might be thought to require as much reverence and the fame honor as is exhibit 10 ted to the gods, or fuffer themselves, and take pleasure to bee observed and reverenced equally with them: as for the gods they adored them after this fort; either by way of lowlinefle and humbling themselves before their majestic, in covering and hiding their heads; or rather because they seared lest as they made their praiers, there should come tunto their hearing, from without, any finiter voice or inaufpicate and ominous offer; and to prevent fuch an object they drew their hood over their eares: And how trie it is that they had a carefull eie and regard to meet with all fuch accidents, it may appeare by this, that when they went to any oracle forto berefolved by answer from thence upon a scrupulous doubt, they caused a great noise to be made all about them, with ringing of pannes or brafen basons.

Or it may well be, (as Cafter faith, comparing in concordance the Romane fashions with the 20 rites of the Pythagoreans) for that the Damon or good angell within us; hath need of the gods helpe without, and maketh supplication with covering the head, giving thus much covertly to understand thereby, that the soule is likewise covered and hidden by the bodie, but and

S it because Aeneas first brought up this fashion of covering the head at sacrifice; and the I facrifice to Saturnus is much more auncient than his time?

Or, for that they used to be covered unto the celestiall gods: but as for Saturne he is reputed 20 a Subterranean or terrestrial god?

Or, in this respect, that there is nothing hidden, covered, or shadowed in Trueth? For among the Romans, Saturne was held to be the father of Veritie.

Why doe they repute Saturne the father of Trueth.

S it for that (as some Philosophers deeme) they are of opinion that * Saturne is * Time? and Time you know well findeth out and revealeth the Truth.

Or, because as the Poets fable, men lived under Saturnes reigne in the golden age: and if 40 the life of man was then most just and righteous, it followeth confequently that there was much tructh in the world.

What is the reason that they sacrificed likewise unto the god whom they tearmed Honor, with bare head? now a man may interpret Honor to be as much as Glory and Reputation.

T is haply because Honor and glory is a thing evident, notorious, and exposed to the knowledge of the whole world: and by the fame reason that they veile bonet before men of worthip, dignitie, and honor, they adore also the deitie that beareth the name of Honor, with the headbare.

What may be the cause, that somes cary their Fathers and Monhers soorsh to be enterred, with their heads hooded and covered; but daughters bare beaded, with their haires detressed and hanging downe loofe.

S it for that Fathers ought to be honored as gods by their male children, but lamented and L bewailed as dead men by their daughters, and therefore the law having given and graunted unto either fex that which is proper, hath of both together made that which is beforming and

Or, it is in this regard, that unto forrow and heavineffe, that is best beseeming which is extraordinarie and unufuall: now more ordinarie it is with women to go abroad with their heads veiled and covered : and likewife with men, to be discovered and bare headed. For even among the Greeks when there is befallen unto them any publike calamitie, the manner and cuftome is, that the women should cut off the hayres of their head, and the men weare them long: for that otherwife it is usuall that men should poll their heads, and women keepetheir haire long, And to prove that somes were wont to be covered; in such a case, and for the said cause, a man may to alledge that which Parro hath written; namely, that in the solemnitie of funerals, and about the tombs of their fathers, they carry themselves with as much reverence and devotion as in the temples of the gods: in fuch fort, as when they have burnt the corps in the funeral fire, so soone as ever they meet with a bone, they pronounce, that he who is dead, is now become a god. On the contrary fide, women were no wife permitted to vaile and cover their heads. And we find upon record, that the first man who put away and divorced his wife was Spurius Carbilius, because she bare him no children; the second, Sulpition Gallon, for that he saw her to cast a robe over her head; and the third Publius Sempronius, for flanding to behold the folemnitic of the fu-

How it commeth to passe, that considering the Romans esteemed Terminus a god, and therefore in honour of him celebrated a feast called thereupon Terminalia, yet they never killed any beaft in sacrifice unto him?

T is because Romulus did appoint no bonds and limits of his countrey, to the end that he I might lawfully fet out & take in where pleafed him, and repute all that land his owne fo far as, (according to that laying of the Lacedamonian) his speare or javelin would reach? But Numa Pompilius a just man and politick withall, one who knew well how to govern, and that by the rule of Philosophie, caused his territorie to be confined betweene him and his neighbour nations, and called those frontier bonds by the name of Terminus as the superintendent, over-secrand keeper of peace and amitie between neighbours; and therefore he supposed, that this Terminus 30 ought to be preserved pure and cleane from all blood, and impollute with any murder.

What is the reason that it is not lawfull for any maid servants to enter into the temple of the goddeffe * Leucothea? and the Dames of Rome, bringing in thither one alone and no more * Or Maura. with them, fall to cuffing and boxing her about the eares and cheeks.

S for the wench that is thus buffered, it is a fufficient figne and argument, that fuch as Ashe, are not permitted to come thither: now for all others they keepe them out in regard of a certaine poeticall fable reported in this wife: that ladie Inobeing in times past jealous of her husband, and suspecting him with a maid servant of hers, sell mad, and was enraged against 40 her owne sonne: this servant the Greeks say, was an Actolian borne, and had to name Antiphera: and therefore it is that heere among us in the citie of Charonea, before the temple or chappell of Matuta, the fexton taking a whip in his hand crieth with a loud voice: No man fervant or maid fervant be so hardie as to come in heere; no Aetolian hee or thee presume to enter into this place.

What is the cause that to this goddesse, folke pray not for any blessings to their owne children, but for their nephewes onely, to wit, their brothers or fifters children?

Ay it not be that Ino being a ladic that loved her fifter wonderous well, in fo much as the Muckled at her owne breaft a sonne of hers: but was infortunate in her owne children? 50 Or rather, because the said custome is otherwise very good and civill, inducing and moving folks hearts to carie love and affection to their kinreds:

For what cause were many rich men want to consecrate and give unto Hercules the Disme or

Hy may it not be upon this occasion, that Hercules himselfe being upon a time at placewhere * Rome, facrifice the tenth cow of all the drove which he had taken from Gerion?

* By Prolepfis,

Or for that he freed and delivered the Romans from the tax and tribute of the Difmes which they were wont to pay out of their goods unto the Tuskans.

Or in case this may not go current for an authenticall historie, and worthie of credit; what and if we say that unto Hereules as to some great bellie god, and one who loved good cheere, they offered and facrificed plenteoufly and in great liberalitie? Or rather, for that by this meanes they would take downe and diminish alittle, their excessive riches which ordinarily is an eie-fore and odious unto the citizens of a popular state, as if they meant to abate and bring low(as it were) that plethoricall plight and corpulency of the bodie, which being growen to the height is daungerous : supposing by such cutting off, and abridging of superfluities, to do honour and service most pleasing unto Hercules, as who joied to highly in frugalitie: for that in his life time he flood contented with a little, and regarded no delicacie or excesse whatsoever.

m Or}$ in old time the moneth of March was reckoned first, as a man may collect by many other conjectures, and by this especially, that the fift moneth in order after March was called ${\it Qain}$ tilis, and the fixt moneth Sextilis, and all the rest consequently one after another until you come to the last, which they named December, because it was the tenth in number after March: which giveth occasion unto some for to thinke & say, that the Romans (in those daies) determined and accomplished their compleat yeere, not in twelve moneths but in ten: namely, by adding unto 20 everie one of those ten moneths certain daies over and above thirtie. Others write, that December indeed was the tenth moneth after March; but Januarie was the eleventh, and Februarie the twelfth: in which moneth they used certaine expiatorie and purgatorie facrifices, yea, and offered oblations unto the dead(as it were) to make an end of the yere. Howbeit afterwards they transposed this order, and ranged Januarie in the first place, for that upon the first day thereof, which they call the Calends of Januarie; the first Confuls that ever bare rule in Rome were enstalled. immediatly upon the deposition and expulsion of the kings out of the citie. But there seemeth to be more probability & likelihood of truth in their speech, who say, that Romalus being a martiall prince, and one that loved warre and feats of armes, as being reputed the sonne of Mars, set before all other moneths, that which caried the name of his father: howbeit Wuma who fuccee- 30 dednext after him, being a man of peace, and who endevored to withdraw the hearts and minds of his subjects and citizens from warre to agriculture, gave the prerogative of the first place unto Januarie, and honoured Janus most, as one who had beene more given to politick government, and to the husbandrie of ground, than to the exercise of warre and armes.

Confider moreover, whether Numachofe not this moneth for to begin the yeere withall, as best forting with nature in regard of us; for otherwise in generall, there is no one thing of all those that by nature turne about circularly, that canbe faid fust or last, but according to the feverall inflitutions and ordinances of men, some begin the time at this point, others at that. And verely they that make the Winter folftice or hibernall Tropick the beginning of their yeere, do the best of all others: for that the Sunne ceasing then to passe farther, beginneth to 40 returne and take his way againe toward us: for it feemeth, that both according to the course of nature, and also in regard of us, this season is most besitting to begin the yeere: for that it increafeth unto us the time of daie light, and diminisheth the darknesse of night, and causeth that noble starre or planet to approch neerer and come toward us, the lord governour and ruler of all substance transitorie and fluxible matter whatsoever.

Why do women when they dreffe up and adorne the chappell or shrine of their feminine goddesse; whom they call Bona, never bring home for that purpose any branches of Myrtle tree: and yet otherwise have a delight to employ all sorts of leaves and flowers?

Ay it not be, for that, as fome fabulous writers tell the tale, there was one* Flavius a footh-Or Phaulius. Majer had a wife, who used secretly to drinke wine, and when she was surprised and taken in the manner by her husband, the was well beaten by him which myrtle rods: and for that cause they bring thither no boughs of myrtle: marry they offer libations unto this goddesse of wine, but forfooth they call it Milke.

Or is it not for this cause, that those who are to celebrate the ceremonies of this divine service, ought to be pure and cleane from all pollutions, but especially from that of Penus or lechery? For not onely they put out of the roomewhere the service is performed unto the said goddesse Bona, all men, but also whatsoever is besides of masculine sex; which is the reason that they fo detest the myrtle tree, as being consecrated unto Venue, infomuch as it should feeme they called in old time that Venus, Myrtea, which now goeth under the name, of Murcia.

What is the reason that the Latines doe so much bonour and reverence the Woodpecker, and sorbeare altogether to doe that bird any harme?

S it for that Pieus was reported in old time by the enchantments and forceries of his wife, to have changed his owne nature, and to be metamorphozed into a Woodpecker; under which forme he gave our oracles, and delivered answeres unto those who propounded unto him any demaunds? Or rather, because this seemeth a meere fable, and incredible tale: there is another storie reported, which carieth more probabilitie with it, and foundeth necrer unto trueth. That when Ronnilus and Remus were cast foorth and exposed to death; not onely a female woolse gave them her teats to fucke, but also a certeine Woodpecker flew unto them, and brought them food in her bill, and fo fedde them: and therefore haply it is, that ordinarily in these daies wee 20 may fee, as Nigidius hath well observed; what places foever at the foot of an hill covered and flaadowed with oakes or other trees a Woodpecker haunteth, thither customably you shall have a woolfe to repaire.
